

TROUBLE IN THE TRIANGLE

CHRISTIANS, JEWS AND MUSLIMS IN CONFLICT

A CRITICAL REASSESSMENT OF THE RELATIONSHIP BETWEEN CHRISTIANITY, JUDAISM AND ISLAM

IAN FRY

EACH NEW CRISIS IN THE MIDDLE EAST attracts a lot of attention. Everyone knows, by now, that there are common themes running through them. Oil, power politics and religion.

The question is: are they a series of isolated, bloody incidents, like log chips flying in all directions, or are they pieces of a jigsaw puzzle, each one slotting into place to form a big picture?

Trouble in the Triangle sets out to show that they are like the pieces of a jigsaw puzzle and that the picture is now pretty well complete. It's on the front cover.

As each piece fits into place it provides a view of another segment of our history which is often unexpected, sometimes unsettling, always challenging to conventional Western wisdom, and never dull.

Trouble in the Triangle places Western history in a new light. It questions the basis of Western self-understanding and long-accepted views of the 'proper' relationships between the Cold War powers of the East and West; between the power brokers of the consuming West and the resource producers of the Developing Third World; and between Christians and the rest of the world

There is trenchant criticism of the leaders of the West over a long period, especially through the colonial era, the two world wars, and since the establishment of the State of Israel which the author describes as "the central fact of the Christian Era."

The impact of major decisions taken by the leaders of Britain and the United States as they used their own people and other countries as pawns in the power games to maintain or to extend the privileges enjoyed by their own countries will be quite new to most readers.

Now, as all of the pieces of the jigsaw puzzle fall into place, the consequences of those decisions are becoming apparent. The chickens are coming home to roost!

Trouble in the Triangle is a book about religion. But it is a book you may find hard to put down.

CC BY-NC-ND 4.0 Creative Commons Attribution-NonCommercial-NoDerivatives 4.0 International. Trouble in the Triangle © 2000 by Ian Fry is licensed under CC BY-NC-ND 4.0. To view a copy of this license, visit <https://creativecommons.org/licenses/by-nc-nd/4.0/>

Consolidated edition copyright © 2025

First published 2000 by Compton Arch Pty. Ltd.
Fitzroy, Victoria

Copyright © Ian Fry 2000

National Library of Australia Cataloguing-in-Publication data:

Fry, Ian, 1935- .

Trouble in the triangle : Christians, Jews and Muslims in conflict : a critical reassessment of the relationship between Christianity, Judaism and Islam.

Includes index.

ISBN 1 876677 26 0 (set).

ISBN 1 876677 14 7 (book 1).

ISBN 1 876677 20 1 (book 2).

1. Christianity and other religions - Islam. 2.
Christianity and other religions - Judaism. 3. Islam - Relations - Christianity. 4. Islam - Relations - Judaism.
5. Judaism - Relations - Christianity. 6. Judaism - Relations - Islam. I. Leahy, Peter, 1966- . II. Title.

291.172

Printed in Australia

Acknowledgment: The symbol of the Ecumenical Movement is used by kind permission of the World Council of Churches.

Trouble in the Triangle was originally published in 2000 as two books covering three volumes.

This consolidated 2025 PDF edition has been released for academic study and archival purposes. Some charts and notes were not available electronically and are provided here as images of the original.

This edition retains references to the three volumes and two books. All in-text page numbers refer to the printed 2000 edition. The indexes been retained for informational purposes and similarly refer to pages in the 2000 printed edition.

TROUBLE IN THE TRIANGLE

This work is a critical reassessment of the development of the doctrines of the Christians church, Christian self-understanding, and the triangle of Abrahamic faiths – Judaism, Christianity and Islam – which are, in reality, parallel streams of one faith. Yahwism. The author proposes a process for the reassessment of messianic theology with Jews, Christians and Muslims working in collaboration, and maintains that the repudiation of the Doctrine of the Trinity is the first vital step towards reconciliation between Jews, Christians and Muslims. This, in turn, is a prerequisite to world peace and stability.

The narrative of that development is set out chronologically in three volumes. The first two volumes are included in book one. Volume three is printed separately, as a matter of reader convenience, in book two.

This is book one.

Volume I traces developments from the occupation of Jerusalem about sixty years before the birth of Christ by a Roman general, Pompey, to the occupation of the city by a British general, Allenby, in 1917 in the wake of the Balfour Declaration. It is set out in three parts.

Part 1, Starting from scratch, explains the way in which the triangle of Abrahamic faiths was formed. The followers of Jesus of Nazareth broke away from the religious system of the Jewish community, Judaism, to form the Christian Church. The church then progressively developed its own identity and doctrines, became linked into the political system of the Roman Empire, and abused its authority as it used the military might of Rome to evangelize the region of the empire, including North Africa. The subsequent mission and ministry of the Prophet Muhammad, and the establishment of Islam, was a response to that abuse. The triangle was then complete.

Part 2, The Years of Challenge, illustrates the interaction between the three parallel streams of faith during the next eleven hundred years. That period was packed with challenges to the church's theology and its self-understanding by scientists, reformers and philosophers. It included the Crusades, the Inquisition in response to the work of the Spanish Jewish scholar Maimonides, the Reformation ('the one that got away'), the beginning of the European Colonial Era, and the American War of Independence. It reached a climax with the French Revolution and the rule of Napoleon.

Part 3, Exploitation and Oppression, covers the period of European overseas expansion and consolidation, the industrial revolution, the challenges of Darwin and Marx, the debasement of the Jewish community across Europe as anti-Semitism plumbed new depths, and Britain's Balfour Declaration.

Volume II, in one part, Can anyone read the plans?, discusses the state of Europe as the Western Alliance powers sought to crush the Bolshevik Revolution in the wake of the First World War, the growth of the Ecumenical Movement, Vatican efforts to tighten its grip on the religious and civil life of the world through a system of concordats and social encyclicals. Hitler's inspired parody of the amorphous Christian gel, Mein Kampf, is discussed in some detail, together with the British government's pathetic manipulation of a whole range of international and interfaith relationships as it manoeuvred its way through the failed Evian Conference and Munich towards war with Germany and then progressively escalated the war in its unsuccessful effort to retain its empire.

See book two for Volume III which is in three parts.

Part 5, There must be a Final Solution, discusses the relationship between the Qur'anic prophesy of the Night Journey, Hitler's Mein Kampf, and his role as the Scourge of the Night Journey; the Holocaust, the relationship between the powers of evil, Gog and Magog; the way in which the United States was manoeuvred into the war, its motives for staying there and for using the atomic bomb; MacArthur's Christian reconstruction of Japan; the establishment of the United Nations; the way in which the Qur'anic Night Journey and the expectations of Maimonides converge in the establishment of the State of Israel; and the way in which that event – the central fact of the Christian Era to date – illustrates that the irrevocable Covenant of Sinai is firmly in place and that the Christian church is not the be-all-and-end-all of Divine intervention in the affairs of humanity.

Part 6, Fifty Wasted Years, asks what has happened to the Messianic Age since the coincidental establishment of the State of Israel and the World Council of Churches. It briefly traces the Cold War, the early wars between Israel and its neighbours, and the collapse of the European Colonial system. It then discusses the Yom Kippur War, the oil embargo and the changing relationships between the three Abrahamic faiths in more detail before moving to the search for a New International Economic Order, the consequences of globalization, and the rash of interfaith wars in its wake.

Part 7, Reflections in a Wine Glass, discusses the implications of the changing relationships, the way in which the church must reassess its own position and its role as it moves into the process of the reassessment of messianic theology in collaboration with Jews and Muslims, and it suggests a few proposals for the way ahead.

Contents

Trouble in the Triangle.....	i
About this book.....	v
Foreword.....	viii
Foreword.....	xii
Terms used in this work.....	xiv
Jerusalem: strictly for the faithful.....	xvi
Volume I
Part 1
1. Growing pains: from a mini-sect to a major competitor.....	3
2. An instrument of state: from persecution to power.....	25
3. To hunt a heretic.....	68
4. Call it a City of God.....	89
5. The lost opportunity: from Rome to Medina.....	127
6. Turn back the clock!.....	153
Volume I
Part 2
7. On the Roman Road.....	201
8. A challenge with a difference.....	226
9. When the coffer rings.....	278
10. The one that got away.....	321
11. Follow the leaders.....	354
12. Let's make a new start.....	371
13. Paddle your own canoe.....	412
14. Let's try another revolution!.....	447
Volume I
Part 3
15. Let's find a new home.....	514
16. Next year in Jerusalem.....	586
Volume II
Part 4
17. It's time to design the perfect society.....	695
18. Hitler's blueprint wins support.....	773
19. Who does own the Middle East?.....	892
20. Jerusalem now!.....	923
21. No. We mustn't risk an empire.....	976

Volume III

Part 5

22. Gog and Magog go to war.....	1053
23. A pause to regroup ... or cause for reflection?.....	1160
24. Cause for reflection.....	1241
25. Gog and Magog regroup.....	1424
26. The grand design ... or ... it's my turn to play policeman.....	1592
27. We've made it ... thanks to Hitler's gentle persuasion.....	1650

Volume III

Part 6

28. Here comes the Messianic Age !.....	1826
29. What has happened to the Messianic Age?.....	1893
30. Embargo! Not for want of warnings. New order or disorder?.....	2112
31. To God be the Glory!.....	2253

Appendices

A Proposal.....	2338
Selection of Alliances, Agreements & Organisations.....	2346

Notes

Notes to Volume I & II.....	2356
Notes to Volume III.....	2453
Index to Volume I & II.....	2543
Index to Volume III.....	2555

ABOUT THIS BOOK

The purpose of this book is to encourage people to talk about religion. In particular, to talk about the need for leaders and scholars of the three Abrahamic faiths to reassess messianic theology in collaboration with each other, and for the Christian church to repudiate the Doctrine of the Trinity.

Some people ask: “Why bother? Religion is a dead issue but the church hasn’t realized it yet. Nobody is interested in religion anymore.”

Perhaps. But the reality is different.

People all over the world are tearing each other apart over religion. Many of them do not understand what it is all about. They only know that it is Muslim versus Christian in, for example, Indonesia’s Ambon; or Muslim versus Jew in Palestine and Israel; or Christian versus Christian in Ireland; or Christian versus Muslim in Kosovo. Occasionally some other faith is involved, such as in Sri Lanka, Hindu versus Buddhist; or Chechnya, Communist versus Muslim; or Fiji, Christian versus Hindu; or Tibet, Communist versus Buddhist. The list goes on.

So, if every religion seems to be involved, why focus on Christianity? The answer is simple. The root cause of inter-religious conflict is the Christian church’s Doctrine of the Trinity or, more precisely, the things which Christians have done over a very long time because of the way they have understood themselves as Christians. The history of Europe and the history of the European Colonial Era is a history of the abuse and oppression of people, and the irresponsible exploitation of nature and natural resources. These things have occurred, in large measure, as a consequence of the church’s self-understanding and the abuse of its authority and its teaching over a very long period. Two world wars and a lot of lesser ones can be attributed directly to those issues so that the world is now in a deeply fragmented state. But certain relationships have changed during the past two generations, since the establishment of the State of Israel, and the backlash has started.

Is that the reason to begin a reassessment of religious belief at this time? To check the backlash and to stabilize world relationships just as they were previously so that the white Western Christian world can continue to sit astride the human pile?

No, not at all. But it may be that the backlash is now sufficiently strong for people to say: “This hurts. Let’s stop the action, do some talking, work out what’s wrong, and then redirect the action.”

The shift in relationships and the fact that the church’s theology was involved became apparent in 1973 when an oil embargo was imposed by certain countries against the United States in association with the Yom Kippur War between Israel and its neighbours. At that time, with the help of a few colleagues I endeavoured to persuade my own church to take the initiative to establish a process which would bring leaders and scholars from each of Judaism, Islam and Christianity together to reassess the issue around which the triangle of Abrahamic faiths formed: messianic theology and the Christian Doctrine of the Trinity. We were not successful.

However I was then invited to participate in a consultation on the crisis in the Middle East at the World Council of Churches in Geneva in 1975 and that gave me the opportunity to pursue discussions with religious leaders, scholars and politicians in a number of countries of the Middle East during the following three months. Influential figures in both the Muslim and Jewish communities responded warmly to the proposal for three-way reassessment of messianic theology. However they all put much the same qualification on being involved. The church, or one wing or another of it, had to initiate the process. They felt that Christian dominance of world affairs was such they had little hope of initiating the process, and in any case, because it was the Christian interpretation of messianic theology which had led to the crisis, the responsibility to begin to unravel it lay with the church.

Unfortunately, Christian churchmen who may have been in a position to influence such a decision would not budge. Their responses have varied all the way from: "The church's theologians cannot have been wrong for two thousand years," to "Yes. We know you are basically right, but can't we adjust the way we interpret and present the doctrine without repudiating it?" The answer to that question is "No!" It might not have mattered if the church's teaching was a bit skewed and if people were a little unclear about their relationship with God if it did not affect their actions and their relationships. The fact is that great damage has been caused by actions which they have taken in the light of the church's doctrine. For that reason the doctrine and the teaching which flow from it must be put right. That cannot be done in isolation. It must be done in collaboration with Jews and Muslims.

It became quite apparent that no steps would be taken unless there was strong public interest. The logical way to find whether that interest existed appeared to be through a little book. Trouble in the Triangle is that book.

Trouble in the Triangle sets out, very frankly, the history of the development of the relationship between the three faiths, the factors which have influenced it, and the consequences of the formation of a very unequal triangle. The lily has not been gilded. If the reassessment is to take place, and if the world is to benefit from it, then it must be carried out with complete openness and honesty. The truth often hurts. The consequences of the concealment of facts, suppression of the truth, manipulation of public information (especially during the critical twentieth century) and the gross misrepresentation of modern history to serve the perceived purposes of the Christian West all become distressingly apparent as the story unfolds. The final chapter sets out a few ideas about what we can expect, and proposals for the way ahead. What ever we do must be aimed at reconciliation between Christians, Jews and Muslims. That is a pre-requisite for world peace and stability. To me the way ahead seems obvious. I hope readers agree.

A word of appreciation. There was a time in 1996, when my wife and I returned to Australia after five years in Papua New Guinea, that I feared this work would never be completed. My health was very poor indeed and, until the cause of my debilitation was identified and corrected, I simply could not pick up the threads where I had left them hanging in 1991. Fortunately Peter Leahy, who had been working with me on research from his home in Canberra for two years prior to our return was able to continue working with me for another couple of years. His support, encouragement and ability to see critically through a web of issues was vital in enabling me to press ahead and complete the task.

There are a host of other friends who deserve recognition for help in typing (before the days of personal computers), proof reading, preparation of the index, proper compilation of the end notes and references, and for support and encouragement in many other ways. I shall thank them personally lest they be damned by association for any errors and interpretations which readers find to criticize. Every effort has been made to identify and acknowledge all references and sources of published information. However with the work spanning twenty five years, some references have inevitably been misplaced and if I have inadvertently quoted from any works without acknowledging them, I apologize.

I.R.Fry,
Fitzroy, August 2000

FOREWORD

Trouble in the Triangle is a veritable tour de force: a grand sweep across more than 2000 years of history, a penetrating examination of the three Abrahamic faiths, and a remorseless critique of the Christian Church as institution.

In this very large, thoroughly researched book the reader will find much that is fascinating, thought-provoking, indeed provocative. Fry's intention, clearly stated from the outset, is to question the conventional wisdom in Christian discourse, or to put it more simply the self-understanding of Christianity and the West more generally. The author identifies the doctrine of the Trinity as lying at the heart of the misconception and misinformation which have surrounded the Church's definition of its mission, and poisoned relations with both Judaism and Islam. This proposition will no doubt prove unpalatable, even distressing to some, and misguided to others. But whatever one's intellectual judgment so far as Trinitarian thought is concerned, Fry's methodical interpretation of the sequence of events merits the closest consideration. It is rich in historical detail, grounded in careful textual analysis, and animated by a profoundly religious conviction.

Central though doctrinal issues may be to Fry's argument, one does not have to agree with every aspect of his interpretation to conclude that there is much that sheds new light not only on the history of the three faiths and their interaction, but the evolution of the entire world system, especially over the last two hundred years. It is perhaps this latter dimension of Trouble in the Triangle which makes it such a unique and timely contribution to public debate. The peace process in the Middle East, the future of Jerusalem, the precarious relationship between Islam and the West are all placed in context, and so are the complex circumstances which have brought us to the present delicate conjuncture. The religious and economic roots of anti-Semitism are examined with unerring clarity. Striking parallels emerge between developments in late nineteenth century Europe and the inter-war years. Similar factors may well be at work in the current resurgence of anti-Semitic sentiment and xenophobia more generally in Europe and other parts of the western world. Equally instructive is the assessment we are offered of Pax Americana: the gradual emergence of US imperial ambitions and interests, the unashamed pursuit of those ambitions at the height of the Second World War, and the way the imperial project coloured relations with the defeated powers on the one hand and the allies on the other. We are rightly reminded more than once that this project has yet to run its course. The politics of Middle Eastern oil, the demonization of so-called rogue states, and the attempt to depict Islam as the seat of religious extremism are but different manifestations of the same imperial outlook.

Beginning with a highly readable but well researched account of the early Church, Fry traces the numerous steps – each seemingly small yet cumulatively far-reaching – by which it sought to achieve theological uniformity across an ever expanding domain. Indoctrination, excommunication, and even Inquisition became accepted instruments for eliminating dissent and enforcing Rome’s authority. The convening of Councils became convenient, thought not always successful, forums for stamping out divergence of opinion on a range of doctrinal and ecclesiastical issues. Difference was presumably attacked with such venom, not merely because Rome was psychologically discomfited by it, but presumably because it saw theological conformism as an indispensable source of power. The standardization of doctrine, the punishment of heresy and persecution of Jews thus become in Fry’s vivid account simply different manifestations of the same drive to power. At stake here is the impact of the arrogance of dogma on the relationship between organized religion and the state as well as that between organized religion and faith itself. On the one hand, religious intolerance, to be sustained, must have recourse to the powerful arm of the state. On the other hand, such intolerance also provides the state with the legitimacy it needs to sustain its own structure of power. In the process a symbiotic relationship develops in which both State and Church come to depend on each other for the attainment of their respective institutional goals and strategies. In that sense theological pluralism and religious tolerance are sacrificed at the altar of power. It is perhaps ironic but nonetheless tragic that Augustinian theology should have, wittingly or otherwise, paved the way for the subordination of the City of God to the City of Man.

The author insists more than once on the pivotal role which the Doctrine of the Trinity, by which he means primarily the divinity of Christ, played in the polarization between the three monotheistic faiths. While there is much to support this proposition, it is arguable that Trinitarianism is itself but a metaphor for a deeper and wider theological current which seeks to elevate certain interpretations either of sacred scripture or of revelation more generally to the status of dogma. What is in question here is the attempt to freeze in time, place and civilizational or cultural setting a set of beliefs which of necessity must evolve as part of humankind’s spiritual journey. In that sense, evolution must be understood as an integral part of pilgrimage. All Christian churches have to a greater or lesser degree succumbed at different times to the temptation to build an ecclesiology and even a code of individual morality on dogmatic foundations. Nowhere has that temptation proven more difficult to resist than in the Catholic Church, or at least at its authoritative centre which is the Papacy. Though some of the more obvious excesses of the past, be it the Inquisition or the sale of indulgences, may no longer be practised, the underlying mindset which made them possible cannot be said to have been altogether abandoned. The detailed examination we are offered of the reigns of Pius XI and Pius XII make abundantly clear that Catholicism in the first half of the twentieth century, at least as understood in Rome, remained powerfully drawn to the theory and practice of authoritarianism, not to say fascism. The second half of the century, especially the aggiornamento ushered in by the Second Vatican Council, pointed to a new beginning which the present pontificate has sadly and rudely interrupted. In that sense, Fry's call for a major reappraisal of the Church's self-understanding is both timely and well-founded.

Not everyone will agree with the author's prescriptions as to how this reassessment is to proceed or what its conclusions should be. Claims that the Jewish community is "the primary and continuing instrument of god's will" and that the establishment of the state of Israel is consistent with prophecies in the Judaic, Christian and Islamic traditions are contentious to say the least. Equally the interpretations we are offered in Trouble in the Triangle both of Muhammad's vision of the Night Journey, and Maimonides' teachings are matters for considerable debate. Some may argue that the author's own theological convictions have been allowed to colour too strongly his recommendations for the way ahead. If the critical question is how to forge a new spirituality, there is perhaps insufficient attention in the book to the part that the world's other faiths and ethical traditions have already made and are likely to make in the future, and too much emphasis on the contribution of the three Abrahamic religions. Whatever might be the power of their prophecies and visions of a Messianic age, there is no denying that their practices over the centuries leave a great deal to be desired. There are obvious dangers in viewing any or all of these three faiths as a unique and privileged source of divine revelation, of viewing any or all of these faith communities as God's "chosen people" in any permanent or exclusive sense.

Of the three religions, only Islam can be said to be firmly grounded in the Third World, in the experience of profound suffering and continuing humiliation at the hands of Western dominance. The illusions and confusion that preceded the Second World War were the product of the politics of greed. Yet the ethical foundations of the post-1945 period, notwithstanding the idealism of the UN Charter and the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, were not as solidly built as was often imagined. The ethos and procedures of the war-crimes tribunals and the structures of Bretton Woods institutions both spoke of victors' justice. Precisely for this reason it is largely in the Third World that we are most likely to find the fertile ground for such renewal. In this sense it is hardly surprising that the theology of liberation should have originated primarily in Latin America and Africa.

There is yet another dimension to human evolution which bears close attention, namely the development of a range of ethical and philosophical insights which we associate with secularization. Concepts of human dignity, human rights, democracy, economic and social justice may in some loose sense have their roots in the Judaic-Christian tradition, but they owe their force and clarity primarily to the Renaissance, the Enlightenment, the French Revolution, and the other revolutionary struggles of the nineteenth and twentieth centuries. Presumably any genuine dialogue of civilizations will somehow have to incorporate these insights, and the agencies in which they are currently embedded. As with the religious so with the secular tradition, there is a deeper spiritual strand and a baser materialism predicated on wealth and power. We need therefore a praxis for dialogue that is capable of distinguishing between these strands, yet is encompassing of all those who can contribute to a renewed global spirituality.

Messianism itself may have to be placed under probing scrutiny; it can and must contribute to the dialogue, but it cannot monopolize it.

Yet none of this is to diminish Fry's enormous achievement: the depth of his analysis of our present predicament, or the clarity with which he has identified the foundation stones for a new theological, intellectual, political and economic agenda. Trouble in the Triangle rightly points to the strategic importance of the Middle East, the centrality of oil in the world's energy economy, and the potentially explosive relationship between the West intent on maintaining its dominance and a resurgent Islam conscious of its glorious past and intent on articulating a new vision for the future. Placed in this context a rediscovery by the three Abrahamic faiths of their nobler prophetic traditions, especially if it should proceed by way of mutually reinforcing dialogue, has become a moral imperative. By illuminating past trends and drawing attention to future possibilities Trouble in the Triangle has accomplished a great and enduring service for which we are all deeply indebted.

Joseph A. Camilleri

FOREWORD

Trouble in Triangle is obviously not a small book. Running into 3 sizeable volumes, it has taken Mr Ian Fry some 25 years to complete. To have sustained his interest in the subject for such a long time, despite fundamental changes in his health, employment and physical environment, is an indication of his passionate commitment to solving the riddle of the trouble in the triangle of three faiths, Judaism Christianity and Islam – a riddle that affects more than half of the human race living in Europe and Asia.

To find a cure, one needs to identify the cause. In order to do that, Ian Fry has analyzed 2000 years of history of the Judeo-Christian and Islamic worlds. He begins the history at 60 years before the birth of Christ and brings it up-to-date, identifying the political and religious threads in historical developments and how they intertwine. In following his narrative one sees how the religious thread becomes subservient to the political one. In his broad sweep of history he has covered a very vast period and an equally vast territory, dealing with political developments and their underlying currents from US, to Europe, to the Middle East and Russia. It has been a mammoth task.

It is Ian Fry's quite sincere view that the three Abrahamic religions are aspects of a single religious faith, and that they "became divided into separate streams as a consequence of the adoption of certain beliefs about the person of Jesus of Nazareth ..." Since he has a burning interest in bringing about a common understanding between the Abrahamic faiths, viewing it as crucial to ushering in the Messianic Age, Ian Fry has had to delve into the revealed texts and theological writings of these faiths. Through it he has come out with understandings which he has made central to his analysis of the trouble in the triangle and the solution to it, and which have not previously occurred to the traditional members of the three streams of faith. This is particularly so with his reading of the Qur'anic chapter of the Night Journey. I am sure some Muslim readers would be fascinated by it, but many others perhaps may equally be puzzled by it. It should nevertheless make them pause and think.

In his analysis of the trouble Ian Fry is highly critical of his own Christian tradition and the articulation by its theologians of Christian fundamentals in terms of a trinity. Along with Zionism, which Fry views as a direct outcome of trinitarian beliefs, the doctrine of the trinity is presented as a stumbling block to relations of mutual understanding and harmony which should otherwise be a natural thing among what are essentially three streams of a single faith. Whilst at previous occasions in history Christian theologians failed to respond to the challenge of the times – at the advent of Islam, for instance – Ian would like Christian thinkers at this crucial stage in human history, when the chances for a gigantic catastrophe are very high indeed, to officially repudiate the idea of the trinity and adopt a perception of Christ that is close to the Qur’anic concept of him. While great many Christians today, including theologians, share with Ian Fry his theological position, his call to Christians for a radical rethink of Christian theology would surely be met with a strong resistance, if not sheer hostility. I hope nevertheless that they read the book Trouble in the Triangle with an open mind.

Abdul Khaliq Kazi

TERMS USED IN THIS WORK

THE CHRISTIAN COMMUNITY

The expression ‘the Christian community’ is used to refer to the total community of people who acknowledge an allegiance, whether by baptism, formal membership or otherwise, to one or other of the organized churches which regard themselves as Christian, whether adhering to Trinitarian belief or not, and whether being regular in attendance at services of worship or not.

THE CHURCH

Unless it is used with reference to a particular denomination, the expression ‘the church’ is normally used in this work to refer to the administrative, preaching, teaching and service functions of all churches which regard themselves as Christian, and the persons who are ordained to fulfill any function in mission or ministry, staff, trained lay workers and others who work and serve within those functions.

THE VATICAN

The context in which the term ‘the Vatican’ is used will normally indicate whether it refers to the territorial seat of the Roman Catholic Church (the State of Vatican City), within which the principal functions of the papacy are carried out, or to the ordained clergy who are appointed to positions of authority within the Curia (the network of agencies which include the Secretariat of State, certain congregations, tribunals, councils and offices), Pontifical Commissions or other bodies within the governing hierarchy of the Roman Catholic Church, and the functions which they fulfill.

THE AMORPHOUS CHRISTIAN GEL

This expression is used to encompass the total Christian presence: all of the organizations and functions of ‘the church’; the functions or policies which governments, commercial or civil bodies pursue as a consequence of the influence of the church, whether formal (through concordats, constitutional or other legal arrangements including statutes and acts) or informal (through the teaching and preaching functions of the church, and the personal influence of either resident or expatriate Christians); the religious, social, economic, commercial and political conduct and influences which they exert and which are regarded within a community as being “Christian”; and the evolved ‘Christian ethic’ as it is understood from one country or one region to another, especially in as much as it may differ from the previously accepted norm, and has become woven into the fabric of the society.

In earlier times the term ‘Christendom’ was used to describe ‘the Christian world’. It could mean either all countries which were under the rule or domination of Christian powers, whether under some form of papal authority or not, or the sum of people who considered themselves to be Christians or were of Christian heritage wherever they may be. The term is now rarely used and is of little relevance.

DĀR AL-ISLĀM

The Islamic sphere of dominion. At times the expression has been applied only to regions governed under the Caliphate or subject to Islamic law. At other times, notably when colonial powers administered territories which had previously been within the Caliphate or directly under Islamic rule, or when countries which had a majority Muslim population did not adopt Islamic law, the expression was applied to the region of dominant Muslim religious influence. Therefore, noting that some countries which are members of the Islamic Conference have not adopted Islamic law as the basis of their constitutions or the exclusive basis of their civil and criminal law, the expression is used in that sense, the region of dominant Muslim influence, in this work except where a particular period in history is referred to.

THE JEWISH COMMUNITY

The expression is used in the broad sense to refer to all persons in a community who acknowledge a Jewish heritage, whether or not they describe themselves as adherents of Judaism and active members of a congregation, and inclusive of all streams of Judaism: Orthodox, Conservative and Reformed. The term ‘Jewry’ is used to encompass the world wide Jewish community.

THE DIASPORA

Originally the term referred to Jews who were living in exile, but during the Christian Era its use has been adapted so that for a long period it referred to all who were living anywhere other than in the region of Palestine, and now, since the establishment of the State of Israel, it refers to all Jews living in a country other than Israel. Thus the term Diaspora is used in a different sense to ‘world Jewry’ which encompasses all Jews including those who live in Israel. At present about one third of world Jewry lives in Israel and two thirds in the Diaspora. The United States is home to almost half of world Jewry.

THE TERMS CHRISTIAN, JEW AND MUSLIM

Unless qualified, these are used to refer to persons who adhere to Christianity, Judaism and Islam respectively, regardless of the stream within their faith with which they are personally associated.

AN OVERVIEW

JERUSALEM: STRICTLY FOR THE FAITHFUL

The world has celebrated a new millennium. Or at least a large part of it has. But every day the media headlines carry both hope and foreboding. Side by side. Signs of technical and commercial progress come together with news of increasing conflict, disaster, and despair. For a brief period towards the end of the twentieth century the end of the Cold War held the prospect of a more peaceful New International Order. Fifty years of nuclear standoff which followed the Second World War had ended. But, to everyone's disappointment, the early good news stories of emancipation and democratic reform were soon overshadowed by tales of economic crisis, international instability and tragedy. At the same time, however, new scientific and technological breakthroughs in medicine, biotechnology, computing and communications, plus the potential for rapid increases in agricultural productivity raised hopes of a more prosperous future in which hunger, disease and ignorance would be things of the past.

However, even as humanity's capacity to command the resources of nature increases daily, the question of who controls these resources and the uses to which they are put casts a dark shadow over the world's affairs and the gap between the world's rich and poor continues to widen. A tiny proportion of the world's population spends billions of dollars each year on pet food, cosmetics and candies – growing obese and suffering psychological disorders under great stress quite disproportionately – while the vast majority of the world's population lives somewhere between moderate and abject poverty, unable to meet even their most basic human needs to live with dignity. In spite of the evident abundance of material wealth, the vision, the leadership and even the interest to mount the concerted global effort which is required to face the challenge of such immense human need is inadequate. In the West, at political leadership level, it is rarely seen.

Newspaper columnists debate the pros and cons of globalization, while academics ponder the rise of the multinational corporation as a potential rival to the nation state. Nightly television news images provide graphic testimony of the AIDS pandemic threatening millions in Africa, while governments debate with corporations on their rights to “own” and exploit segments of the human genome for private profit, and to stimulate investment in research and development aimed at rich Western markets. Radical coalitions of anarchists, labour groups and Civil Society Organizations (otherwise NGOs) in the West disrupt meetings on international free trade in the name of social justice and the global environment, while those whose interests they claim are driving their campaigns – the developing countries – criticize their actions as self-serving and hypocritical. The development of the internet suggests an explosion in global democratic participation and that the end of the tyranny of exclusion may be in sight, while multinational media and telecommunications corporations merge and remerge in ever more ambitious bids to solidify, expand and impose their influence on global news, entertainment and the way people think and act. Trillions of “virtual” dollars fly instantly around the globe, untaxed and with their manipulators responsible to no one, to mould the fate of national governments.

Yet the needs of the poorest for adequate water, food, and shelter remain unmet, and interfaith and ethnic conflict tears nations and communities apart across Europe, Africa, Asia and the Pacific, and millions of innocent civilians are displaced and killed in calculated and sustained acts of genocide.

Meanwhile, the stability of the international financial system which underpins the Western World’s dominance is in serious doubt and the world’s leading powers weigh up – more often in private but sometimes in public – moral issues for and against the political and economic consequences of intervention. Key international relationships blow hot and cold with each new issue or change of leadership, while others slowly solidify, glacier-like, into supra-national entities or blocs of influence. And despite what seems to be a never ending process of summit meetings and shuttle diplomacy, the tantalizing prospect of lasting peace between Israel and the Arab world continues to recede into the distance like a mirage in the desert, threatening to explode again at any time into confrontation and all-out war. At the same time the once dormant OPEC, whose influence was written off by some vocal experts, undergoes a dramatic resurgence. In addition, the world is treated to the image of a frail Pope making a courageous but flawed attempt to apologize for the past wrong doing of the Catholic Church during a pilgrimage to the Holy Land while the Western mass media, as well as many serious intellectuals, continue to feed the spectre of Islam replacing the old Soviet Communist foe in a looming war of the cultures with the Christian West.

Where is order in this bewildering kaleidoscope? What are the threads that connect the seemingly random cascade of headlines and sound bites? Confronted with this daily barrage of news and information, where are we to look for guidance about the meaning and direction of human history? And how are we to respond?

For the peoples of the three major Monotheistic faiths – Judaism, Christianity and Islam – the answer to the first question should be simple. History is the progressive unfolding of God’s Plan for humanity. In times past – simpler times, perhaps – people of faith, and Western Christians in particular, would never have even asked the question. The answer would have been obvious. The meaning of history was to be found within the teachings of the Church.

Christ's Victory on the Cross was to be realized in history in the triumphal march of the true faith to the ends of the earth, until the Day of Judgment. The response was straightforward: hold fast to the faith, do not challenge the authority of the Church on matters of doctrine, and be a loyal and law abiding subject or citizen of the legally constituted – and religiously consecrated – government. Things became a little complicated when the Church itself fragmented, and there was some dispute over the issue of which fragment was in fact the “true faith.” And then there were questions about all those people of other faiths, especially Jews and Muslims, who had their own understanding of God and their own understanding of the march of history. Where did they fit in? What was their fate? For most Christians, secure in their own version of the Truth, these issues were usually of little consequence. Christianity was safe in its position of dominance in world affairs, and all was proceeding according to God's Plan.

They were certainly simpler times. For many Jews and Christians the traumatic and horrific events of the twentieth century have destroyed their basis for believing any longer in a Divine Power that oversees human affairs. Sustained attack from high profile secular thinkers has seriously undermined the notion of any kind of “meaning” in history at all. In the face of the enormous challenges posed by the modern world, traditional religion, at least in the secular West, holds less and less relevance to the average person. Despite the best efforts of many committed people, the traditional churches have little new to offer, and each week church attendance drops. People who seek religious guidance and a spiritual understanding of history are increasingly looking for alternatives. Some are rejecting monotheism entirely, embracing pre-Christian or Eastern traditions and looking to the dawn of a new consciousness in a coming new age of peace and enlightenment. Many others are flocking to fundamentalist charismatic meetings to escape the desiccated doctrines and stale rituals of traditional denominations in search of a simple personal road map for a rapidly changing and all too confusing world. There, perhaps, they can find solace in a world cast in black and white, where the acquisition of great wealth may not be regarded as an issue to challenge the conscience, or where prophetic speculation about the end times flourishes, with television ministers competing to be the first to factor the latest world events into their reading of biblical prophecy in their weekly countdown to Armageddon. But that is not the case for Muslims. They are absolutely convinced that God is real and is to be obeyed.

The traditional Christian churches are in crisis today. They struggle to provide a spiritual framework with which to help make sense of contemporary trends and historical events. At the same time, their efforts to help bring justice and peace to a troubled world are fatally hamstrung by divisions within and between them; their inability to recognize the legitimacy of other faiths; and by their refusal to take the steps necessary to erase the legacy of hundreds of years of oppression and persecution. In such circumstances, the position of leadership which the Church wishes to claim for itself, and which a suffering world yearns for, can never be realized. In spite of the enormous shocks that have shaken the doctrinal edifice of the Christian faith in the twentieth century, organized Christianity still refuses to alter its basic self-understanding and its understanding of the unfolding of Divine Will in human affairs. In present circumstances, the potential consequences of that refusal are immense.

But history offers more than just a random story. And the threads of that story converge at one place. Jerusalem.

No other name inspires quite such a reaction as Jerusalem. Being a city of only about 500,000 people it should be dwarfed into insignificance by New York with its unequalled commercial activity, overpowering physical presence and vibrant night life. Tokyo's immense industrial capacity and fantastic transport systems should make it sound like a country town. It ought to lack the inspiration of parliamentary traditions developed at Westminster or the religious traditions developed at Rome. And yet it overshadows all of them.

No other city has been destroyed in military conquest as often or known the bloody slaughter of its people so often. By all normal reasoning it should have been deserted and forgotten long ago. It should simply be a note in a history book by now, but it is not, and no other city beckons a person with an interest in the welfare of mankind quite so irresistibly. It is the ultimate rallying point for the faithful of three religious traditions.

I spent a few days there in 1975 making on-the-spot enquiries following a consultation on the crisis in the Middle East at the World Council of Churches in Geneva. A casual observer would probably have assumed that the conference had been called to discuss 'the Jewish Question' and in a simplistic way there is a sense in which that is correct. The Jewish question came to a head with World War II. The world could no longer ignore it, and the organized persecution of one group of people to satisfy the ego or the craze of another was no longer acceptable. The partition of Palestine to establish a national home for the Jews would compensate for Hitler's atrocities and it would also make up for the long period of persecution which Europe's Jews had endured while most of the world passed by on the other side of the road. In short it would solve the Jewish question for all time.

At least they were the sentiments implicit in the votes of thirty-three governments which decided the issue at the United Nations in November 1947. Their decision took effect with the partition of Palestine in May 1948, just three years after the surrender of Nazi Germany. Those thirty three governments knew there were difficult problems still to be solved because Palestine was the scene of a continuing struggle which had become progressively more bitter ever since the British government declared in favor of a Jewish state thirty years earlier. They simply crossed their fingers in the hope that the problems of partition would be less serious than the problems with any alternative plan. But they misjudged the situation completely. They were unwittingly setting the scene for far-reaching changes in world relationships. As each of the wars involving Israel and its neighbours came and went in 1948, 1956 and 1967 they were widely represented as localized struggles between Jews and Arabs or between Arabs and Arabs for control of a small piece of territory.

We have been told repeatedly by politicians and commentators that these wars in the Middle East are no more important than the wars in Korea or Vietnam, except that they involve a threat to the world's oil supplies which could mean more economic disruption. There have been many groups with particular vested interests eager to show that any involvement in the Middle East by the Western powers has been constructive and minor, and that in spite of their interest in canals and oil their concern was for the welfare and peace of the people in the region. Perhaps they were playing for time to find effective solutions or perhaps they were indulging in wishful thinking. However it could be that as they cynically played their cards for their sectional benefit they failed to grasp the wider significance of the conflict which centres on Jerusalem.

There, in Jerusalem, we have the key.

With a few hours to spare one evening during my visit I took a stroll to explore the Old City without the hustle of day time crowds. The peacefulness of the Kidron Valley enticed me out through the Lion's Gate and I wandered along Ha-'Ofel, pausing now and then to ponder the string of churches dominated by the Intercontinental Hotel high on the Mount of Olives, then Zechariah's tomb and Bethlehem tucked behind the hills in the distance.

Then I slipped in through the Dung Gate and climbed the steep stone steps to the battlements along the city wall which has been silent witness to more sorrow and upheaval than happiness. I tried to put myself in the shoes of a Roman legionary baffled by the Jews arguing the finer points of religious belief with a condemned man up there on Mount Moriah, their sacred temple Mount. I had been there during the morning but all I could recognize now, in the evening light, was the Islamic Museum and the El-Aqsa Mosque, the largest and most revered in the Holy Land, nestling on the edge of the great cliff of hewn rock, towering in front of me.

There had been three of us up there on Mount Moriah that morning, together with hundreds of tourists and a few pilgrims of course. There was the man whose religious faith forbade him to set foot on the Temple Mount. There would, he believed, come a time when he and his fellows would be allowed – indeed would be required – to go up there to worship, but the time was not yet right. Yet there he was in green battle dress with a rifle slung loosely over his shoulder, ready for instant use. He was one of three Jewish Israeli Soldiers standing guard at the Bab-el-Maghariba gate high above the Wailing Wall where scores of their fellow faithful were at prayer, mourning the destruction of the Temple and awaiting the Messianic Age. We chatted for quite a while.

There was the second man sitting hunched on the bottom step around a circular fountain. He was quite unconcerned by the curious onlookers in Western style garb around him. They need not have been within miles for all he cared. Quite elderly and dressed in traditional Arab garb, I took him to be a Palestinian but he could have been a pilgrim from any part of the Muslim world community. I did not chat with him. For one thing, I cannot speak Arabic and I doubted whether he would speak English. For another thing he was so deeply and so earnestly engrossed in his ritual ablutions, washing not only his face but also his head, hands, forearms and his feet before entering the mosque to pray that I would have found it quite irreverent to disturb him.

Then there was me, a Westerner with a camera slung over my shoulder. I was easy prey for every souvenir and colour-slide kiosk between Bab-el-Quattanin and Bab-el-Ghawanima just like the tourists every day. And I was also on my way to pay my dollars one by one as I paraded through the Church of the Holy Sepulchre, aghast at the naked commercialism and showmanship deemed necessary in an effort to finance the maintenance of the building, billed as Christendom's most sacred shrine, with its displays of relics and exalted sites.

As a Christian I completed the triangle of faiths which is the basis of all the tensions and conflicts in Jerusalem. It is a huge triangle spreading well beyond Jerusalem to affect the whole world and it is not nearly complete with just the three pieces representing three Abrahamic faiths. It is more like a crude jigsaw puzzle or even a witch's brew with the other ingredients being politics, arrogance, greed and exploitation, bigotry, fear, suspicion and militarism. They do not mix very well either but, according to recent generations of Western Christians who have sheltered behind the adage, politics and religion do not mix anyway.

For most of the period since World War II the trouble in the triangle was overshadowed by ideological conflicts between the Capitalist "West" and the Communist "East" with everyone's eyes and ears tuned for any cracks and creaks in the iron curtain which separated the countries of the NATO and Warsaw Pacts. That confrontation was regarded universally as the key issue which the world's leaders had to resolve and it was therefore quite natural that most people believed that a new era had dawned when the Berlin Wall – the substance of the curtain – was completely dismantled by deliberate decision in 1989. The subsequent collapse of the Soviet Union four years later seemed to confirm their expectations. In any case religion had tended to become a dead issue in the West as the church's credibility and support slipped. Materialism and consumerism were the new gods to be worshipped, and few people were very concerned about a bit of religious tension in a region which seemed to be of no direct interest to them.

It therefore came as a bit of a shock to the system in 1973 when an international oil crisis resulted from the Yom Kippur War. People began to realize that religious conflict had been the basis for the Middle East conflict all along and that it threatened the very fabric of Western economic and political structure, life style and culture. But, as we know quite well, the Western World, led by the United States, survived that crisis. After a while its people settled back to watch the Muslim Iranians and Iraqis batter each other to pulp. The oil crisis of the mid 1970s was treated as a thing of the past and a bit of a side event which had even brought some benefits for the West, and the people of the West tended to forget about the Middle East as an area with potential for a major crisis – until Iraq invaded Kuwait in 1991.

Far from being a series of localized conflicts in which major powers became involved through their own political decisions which they ought to be able to explain, like Korea or Vietnam, the crisis in the Middle East involves the whole world community in two basic relationships which are changing whether they like it or not. One is the economic and political relationship between two of the world's "blocks" of people. In the Western World block are those countries which are mainly white, mainly of European Christian heritage, technically advanced and now economically dependent on maintaining a consumer society. In the Third World block are those countries which are mainly non-white, non-Christian, non-European, struggling to develop technically and not dependent on maintaining high consumer spending for their "stability." Over a number of generations the Third World countries became little more than pawns in the power game of the Western group. They provided markets for the surpluses of the West and they saw their raw materials extracted for the industries of the West. The Third World has watched helplessly as foodstuffs needed desperately by its own people have been shipped off to the banquet tables of the West, often to finance facilities required for the resource exporters rather than for their own people, and they have even been required to provide armies to fight wars they had nothing to do with.

Now all that is changing. The change began at a great pace with the 1973 crisis in the Middle East and the oil embargo. Without as much as a face-to-face war the Third World group began to edge towards the stage when it would be able to call the tune. But then the Western Group reacted. It reinforced its resistance to change, dug its heels in and developed all sorts of economic and political manoeuvres to offset the threat of the loss of its privileged position. As a consequence the change stalled and the economic gap between the Third World and the Western World has become even wider since the oil crisis of 1973. However, already, the Third World can bring the West to its knees through concerted action if its leaders coordinate their planning and act together. They have simply been persuaded that such a course would be counter-productive and that it is therefore not in their interests. However, of greater importance is the opportunity which will become more apparent during the coming few years: the opportunity for it to achieve technical, economic, cultural and human development without the constraints of Western domination and within a framework of self determination. For its part the West faces the task of adjusting to the new situation and to the loss of privilege which this involves even if it appears, at this point, to have gained a position of greater invincibility through the rapid dismantling of Eastern Europe's Communist regimes. It must plan to live within a new pattern of relationships and without the capacity to exploit the rest of the world. It can resist the process of change for a time but it cannot reverse it. The die has been cast. The harder it resists, the more traumatic the change must be.

There is a third group of countries sitting in a peculiar grey area between the West and Third World, able to dramatically influence the course of the next few years by either delaying or speeding up the process of change and by encouraging either harmony or dissent as the West and the Third World work out their relationships. That group includes Russia, China, Japan and the greatly exploited Christianized countries of Latin America, and their influence is linked to military and political power, resource demand, resource production capacity and their relationship with people in the two main blocks.

The other relationship which is changing is that between the Christian Church and its partners in the triangle: Judaism and Islam. But the situation is not a simple one in which Christianity will simply be superseded as the dominant partner by one of the others. We are moving relentlessly and inevitably towards the development of a universal and unifying monotheism.

The crisis in the Middle East, and both of the changing relationships, result from the intimate relationship between the Western World and the Christian Church. That relationship is coupled with the church's self-understanding and the impact of doctrines and policies which it has developed over a very long period, and all of these are equally intimately linked with the crisis in the Middle East and none can be resolved independently of the others. They were brought into focus by the events of 1973.

An embargo against the supply of oil to the United States of America was imposed by a group of countries in the Middle East. It was a relatively simple event. It did not require great armies, a navy or nuclear weapons. It was an administrative action taken against a country with which the oil producers were not even at war. But it was taken in connection with a war between the state of Israel and its Arab neighbours and it was a direct consequence of that war. As we look further along the chain of events we find that the Israel/Arab wars have been a consequence of the enforced establishment of the modern state of Israel. This, in turn, was a consequence of the misconduct of both the Christian Church and the countries of the Western World and this misconduct occurred either because of, or under the umbrella of, the church's misunderstanding of itself and the erroneous doctrines with which it has built a wall around itself.

We are now locked into a three-way confrontation involving the power blocks linked with Judaism, Christianity and Islam. The USA, which is without a doubt the most powerful country linked with Christianity, has made itself dependent for its economic and political stability on the prevention of another war in the Middle East. Camp David summits are not held out of a sense of responsibility for the welfare of people in conflict. They are held in desperation as exercises in self-preservation. They are a re-run of Britain's Round Table Conferences in London in the 1930s which were just that: efforts made in desperation to avoid the haemorrhaging of the British Empire. Many other countries have also become dependent on stability in the Middle East, but to a lesser extent. There are many factors involved but the key factor is dependence on supplies of oil from the allies of the Palestinian people who have suffered greatly from the decision to arbitrarily partition their country in order to appease the Western Christian conscience. At first sight it appears to be a simple matter to break that dependence but three quite separate groups have been concerned to see that it is not broken. On the surface they appear to make a most unlikely alliance, and their coincidence of interests has been purely circumstantial.

Firstly – the predominantly Muslim Palestinians and their allies. For them the threat to the economic stability of the USA is the main means by which diplomatic and political pressure can be brought to bear on Israel to force it to negotiate an acceptable settlement of the Palestine and Jerusalem questions. If that threat to the stability of the United States were to be removed the confrontation between the Palestinians and Israel would immediately become more direct. On their own, that is a confrontation in which the Palestinians cannot achieve their aims. For that reason, United States policy has been consistently directed at the isolation of the Palestinians and the acceptance of the notion that they are a small community whose demands do not need to be taken too seriously.

Secondly – the Jewish state of Israel. Blackmail again becomes a shield. If the economic and political stability of the USA were no longer tied to peace in the Middle East then Israel would lose its ability to coerce the USA into providing the military, political and economic support which is vital for its stability and for its own political stand which is otherwise unacceptable. Israel would find itself in direct confrontation with its neighbours without the assurance of re-supply if and when its military arsenal became depleted. It would have lost its shield. In a desperate situation desperate people resort to desperate measures.

Thirdly – the oil industry. Here we see blackmail of the very worst kind. Those who control the oil industry in the USA have followed the well-trodden path of exploitation and extortion. They use the threat to the stability of their own country as a lever to gain further commercial advantage and to strengthen their power, both within that industry and in related energy and petro-chemical industries in all free-enterprise countries.

The complications which flow from this unlikely three-way coincidence of interests are immense. They prevent any quick and simple resolution of the crisis. Stated briefly, Israel is the meat in the sandwich in a process of change which involves the whole world but which mainly affects the Christian West and the Third World. The short term effects are to the disadvantage of the Western World in terms of current social and economic conventions. The long term benefits will flow from stability in world affairs.

While the people of Israel were forced into their present predicament by the conduct of the Christian West they stay there in part because of their own decisions and their determination to pursue a position of privilege at the expense of other people. This is where we come back to the issue of religious faith. Israel's major decisions are now and have been from the time of its establishment based on the principles of political Zionism and not the teachings of Judaism.

Irrespective of what other negotiations may take place between the groups involved in the three-way confrontation, the crisis in the Middle East cannot be resolved until Zionism ceases to be an issue. This is because three key decisions – to demand Palestine as a National Home for Jews; to reject the concept of the establishment of a separate Palestinian state; and to prevent the administration of Jerusalem by an international commission (each being proposals made by responsible international bodies), were Zionist decisions. The government of Israel could have, and still could, act to implement the second and third clauses if it wished and if it could sustain the support of its electorate in doing so. The probability of war on an unprecedented scale continues to increase as patience runs out on all sides and people take matters into their own hands.

This presents a bigger challenge to the Christian Church than to the Jewish Community because modern Zionism evolved as one of the consequences of the church's spurious self assessment, of its erroneous doctrines, and of the abuses of non-Christians which those things have involved. From this it follows that there is absolutely no possibility of Zionist philosophy being dismantled until the Christian Church has thoroughly re-assessed its understanding of itself and its doctrine.

In this sense the Doctrine of the Trinity is critical. There is a chicken-and-egg relationship between the church's view of itself and its doctrine which, put simply, says that God the Father, Christ the Son, and the Holy Spirit are one integrated God with shared authority and responsibility. The early church drew up that doctrine to formalize and to justify what its dominant personalities and parties had already been saying and doing. It then proceeded to use that doctrine as the basis and the justification for all its subsequent decisions and doctrines. It continues to build its claims and to define its role on that doctrine. The Second Vatican Council defined the church, in part, as being "present in figure at the beginning of time"; "the human body of Christ"; "the spotless spouse of the spotless lamb"; "filled with the riches of Christ's glory" and "the pillar and mainstay of truth."¹

In much less flamboyant terms and in a more submissive mood the International Congress on World Evangelization in 1974 described the church as "the community of God's people ... (which) ... must not be identified with any particular culture, social or political system, or human ideology" and God's "appointed means of spreading the Gospel." Its 2,473 participants from 135 Protestant denominations in 150 countries affirmed their belief in "the one eternal God, Creator and Lord of the World, Father, Son, and Holy Spirit" but they went on to recognize that the church becomes a stumbling block "when it betrays the Gospel or lacks a living faith in God, a genuine love for all people and scrupulous honesty in all things including promotion and finance."²

While this shows a significant difference in emphasis from one section of the church to another it is clear that if the doctrine of the Trinity is dismantled and the theology which underpins it is reformulated, the church in its present form must also be substantially dismantled and reformed. Stripped to its basics the church's claim to be the exclusive representative of God because it is the body of Christ on earth is totally insupportable if Christ is not God. And if the church is not the exclusive representative of God then Christ's role as Messiah takes on a completely different meaning. It looks remarkably like Muhammad's teaching about Jesus the Messiah.

The church's arrogant and lethal insistence that its self-assessment was correct prevented it from properly assessing the views of both the Prophet Muhammad and the thirteenth century Spanish-born Jewish scholar, Maimonides. It ought to be a sobering thought for the church and for Zionists that at a time when the Jewish people were all dispersed over Asia Minor, North Africa and Europe and when they were therefore in no position, as a community, to do anyone any harm, Muhammad foreshadowed the possibility that they would again transgress and again be scourged.³ It ought also be sobering for Christians to remember that Maimonides expected that the Messianic Age would be little different, materially, from the age in which he lived; that it would involve a society with moral and intellectual conduct patterned on a clearer human understanding of God; that it would involve the return of the Jewish people to Israel; and that it would be associated with a war involving two forces of evil: Gog and Magog.⁴

An examination of the circumstances which pushed the world into the coincidence of events during the first half of the twentieth century in which the Prophet Muhammad and the scholar Maimonides were both proven correct compels us to consider the conclusion that the establishment of the State of Israel is the central fact of the Christian Era to date. If we reach that conclusion then it logically follows that there is a challenge to the church in the crisis in the Middle East and it is not simply a challenge to go through another Reformation like the last one. It is a challenge to go right back to basics, to forget all about the doctrine of the Trinity, and to start all over again in a fresh examination of the relationship between Jesus of Nazareth and God.

But this is not the first time that the church has faced precisely this challenge. In fact the challenge was posed to the Yahwists of Judea, ordinarily known as Jews, even before their religious community split into the two basic streams of Judaism and Christianity. It was posed during the life of Jesus of Nazareth, by the life of Jesus of Nazareth and even by Jesus in his own conversations. According to one of the few written third-hand records which are available to us (Matthew, chapter 16, verse 16), Jesus asked Peter, one of the small group of people who worked with him, "But you, who do you say I am?" And that issue was central to the debate at his trial during which, according to the writer of John's Gospel, Pilate put to Jesus the question "Are you the king of the Jews?"

The first challenge, in a doctrinal sense, came from its parent religion while the enthusiastic and dedicated Christian community, which later established the church, was still a sect within Judaism. The Christians were widely tolerated until they began to claim that Jesus was God. It was that claim which led to their persecution, their exclusion from the synagogues and the establishment of Christianity as a separate religion.

The next challenge came at the time that Christianity was linking into the political and imperial power structures of Rome as its state religion. It started as an internal challenge when Arius and his supporters spoke out against the concept that Christ was God in person. It was then that the church formalized the majority decision in terms of the Doctrine of the Trinity and declared anyone who thereafter disputed it to be a heretic. The challenge then shifted from internal to external as waves of people moving into Europe adopted Arianism and became a political factor in the disintegration of the Roman Empire.

As that one was finally being laid to rest by political means another challenge developed. It came from Muhammad and Islam, and while it has usually been represented as a military challenge from Arab Nationalism it began, in reality, as a dynamic reformation movement aimed squarely at the church's Trinitarian beliefs. The best known of the church's responses to that challenge was the crusades.

Then came Maimonides with his challenge which was largely responsible for another program which the church prefers to gloss over: the Inquisition. The church had no other answer to the brilliance of Jewish thought in its European Golden Age under the protective umbrella of Islam.

By the time the Inquisition had run its course internal pressures were beginning to build up in the church like a pressure cooker with a stuck valve. They all related to the church's self-understanding and some of the things it did because of its view of itself. Finally the lid blew off and the world experienced the Reformation and its aftermath, with fragmentation of the church and denominational intrigue. While it broke the direct political power of the church and ended the abuse of its civil authority the Reformation proved to be more organizational than theological because of the circumstances of the time and the way it was triggered. In the early stages there were moves by a number of reformers to go right back to square one and drop the doctrine of the Trinity but they soon got the chop like all their predecessors and the reformed churches kept to the basis which their parent church had already determined.

With the repressive authority of the church broken, scientific and philosophical reason got its first real chance and threw out its challenge to the church's doctrines and its view of itself. The challenge was spearheaded by Nicolaus Copernicus and Galileo Galilei with their new view of the universe, and it was strengthened enormously during the years of the Enlightenment, but it reached its first peak with Karl Marx' new look at the community, human relations and authority, coupled with Charles Darwin's re-appraisal of the development of mankind. The church shook to its foundations, conceded a shift or two in its stance, but doggedly refused to go back and start all over again.

However, now we have reached the current complex of challenges and this time there is no way the church can sidestep them. All of the factors involved in the previous challenges have come together progressively to generate the crisis in the Middle East and the rules of the game have changed.

The church no longer has the political or civil capacity to reject or destroy the challenge. Each time it has beaten off a challenge in the past it has taken action which has triggered a chain reaction and the effects have all come together as ingredients in the trouble in the triangle. There is the confrontation between the powers of the Christian West and the Third World inspired by the determination, success and support of the Muslim countries, with Israel forced into the position of the meat-in-the sandwich. There are numerous socio-political and advanced scientific developments. Among the most important of these – bringing the philosophical and scientific challenge to a new peak – are the development of the 'Big Bang' theory to explain the origins of the universe, the study of human sexuality, the identification of DNA, and the completion of the basic human genome program. Then there are the practices and excesses of commerce, the recognition of human rights, and militarism. Over-arching them all to provide the leverage to squash the sandwich flat there is the burning issue of globalization. And there is political Zionism preventing any easy cop-out.

We have therefore reached the point at which political Zionism must be dismantled. However that is dependent upon the achievement of a common view of the Messiah, and that requires the church to go back to square one, to rethink the basis for its existence and to re-define its Trinitarian doctrine.

Unfortunately that is not going to be a simple or speedy process. The church has put a great deal of time and effort into indoctrinating itself and its adherents with its self-image and its doctrines. It has also put an immense effort into suppressing the influence and aspirations of its partners and into strengthening its worldly position. It is not likely to throw everything away and to start again without a strong fight. It is no different to any other large institution. It is made up of human beings – no more and no less.

In any large body, such as a government instrumentality or multi-national corporation, corrupt and exploitative policies or erroneous principles which have become ingrained over long periods are seldom corrected by inside management action. Outside investigation and pressure are necessary. So it is with the church. Judaism and Islam, as the other two partners in the triangle, have already exerted outside pressure in their previous challenges. So have some of the thinkers of the Age of Enlightenment. Others were committed Christians and therefore their work is more correctly regarded as a dual internal-external challenge. Individually they achieved little and the internal audit of the Reformation was not strong enough either. It is going to take the whole lot working in concert as a consequence of the crisis in the Middle East.

The church has only two options. It can re-assess itself now and in doing so neutralize the crisis in the Middle East, or it can continue to resist, suffer the consequences and go through far greater trauma as it reforms in an environment loaded with bitter antagonism and denigration. After all it is not the church which is the be-all-and-end-all of God's plan for salvation. It is the Messiah. "The Jewish Question" which the major powers thought to solve by a United Nations resolution in 1947 has not been around for thirty years or sixty years or even 2,000 years. It has been around for 4,000 years. It is that long since Abraham decided to leave home and go for a stroll in the desert. The church itself is merely a segment of that question.

Because of the two long migrations which tradition tells us he made (from Ur on the lower Euphrates in modern Iraq, to Haran in modern Turkey, and later to Canaan), we tend to think of Abraham as a man of the country and overlook any contact he may have had with urban populations or great imperial powers. This is unfortunate because it tends to distract us from thinking of the situations which may have influenced the very earliest Jewish religious thought and the course of divine intervention, and encourages the belief that it developed spontaneously in isolation.

However recent discoveries in Syria suggest new importance for Abraham's migration. The circumstances in the country though which, or perhaps from which, he migrated must have had a strong impact on him. For almost forty years investigations have been in progress on extensive ruins about 180 miles north of Damascus. Archaeologists unearthed an urbanized empire which predates the previously known empires of Babylon and Mesopotamia. With a population of a quarter of a million at its peak between 2,600 BCE and 2,240 BCE, Ebla, the city seat of the empire, traded with towns from the Mediterranean to the Persian Gulf and dominated the upper sections of the Euphrates and Tigris Rivers. Its massive army extracted ‘tributes’, levies and alliances from rulers in those valleys and enforced preferential trading arrangements. It appears that when a king of Mari withheld his tribute and seized an Eblaite commercial colony a general was dispatched from Ebla to teach him a lesson. The general’s report to his monarch of his march to Mari lists towns on the route with the boast that he had gathered “piles of corpses.”⁵

When Sargon was establishing his empire of Akkadia in Sumer lower down the twin rivers about 2,400 BCE he moved very early to tackle the rulers of Ebla. He seems to have reversed the tribute-paying roles short of total conquest although his grandson later reduced the city to ruins. However, even he must have been more lenient with the people of Ebla than its rulers had been as imperial overlords because Ebla was soon rebuilt – to be destroyed again about 2,000 BCE and then rebuilt a second time. Apparently Ebla and its Syrian empire were in a state of decline about 1,800 BCE and they disappeared completely a couple of hundred years later. Abraham, whose faith and experience of Yahweh were the starting points for each of Judaism, Christianity and Islam, has been thought by most historians and theologians to have travelled via Syria in a long journey from Mesopotamia to Palestine about 1,800 BCE. If he did, then he must surely have had contact with Ebla and its decaying empire and he could not fail to be influenced by what he saw of its social conditions and attitudes. However evidence unearthed at Ebla suggests either that he passed that way several hundred years earlier, possibly while the empire was at its most oppressive height, or that he may have been born in Syria at that time and not Mesopotamia at all.

In fact it does not really matter from where and in what exact period Abraham came to settle in Palestine. The human values of people in developing urban civilizations which he experienced were crying out for Yahweh to reveal “That which I shall be I shall be” and some basic rules for the conduct of mankind’s personal and community relations. Abraham’s descendants grew in their understanding of Yahweh through the hard experience of their own repeated transgression, rejection and repentance, and they developed their particular national self-understanding at the same time that the human population increased and the development of urban civilizations continued in other regions around the world. As these became more and more complex and highly developed in a technical sense the potential for oppressive anti-social and degrading human relationships became greater and people oppressed each other in larger measure using more sophisticated and more ghastly methods.

Assurnasirpal II who reigned in the second Assyrian Empire about 900 BCE described one of his victories with the words “I cut off their heads; I burned them with fire; a pile of living men and of heads over against the city gate I set up; men I impaled on stakes; the city I destroyed ... I turned it into mounds and ruin heaps; the young men and maidens ... I burned.” Successive empires each seemed to have added their particular touch of sadism in disposing of their enemies, such as Rome with its lions and gladiators, although it took the church with its Inquisition to refine the techniques of torture for those who might be permitted to live.

Then we come to the present day. At one stroke advanced technology provides the alternatives of either a worldwide community of love and harmony or a world of torment, exploitation, hunger and excess, all supplied as a package deal complete with gas chambers, napalm, nuclear weapons and a civilization self-destruct-button built in.

We face questions of civilization, urbanization – and greed. A nomadic people can be, and often are, highly civilized. An urbanized people can be, and often are, selfish, exploitative and irresponsible. In short they are often less civilized. Since humans began to evolve from elementary beginnings, possibly in Ethiopia three or four million years ago, they have never faced as great a crisis as humanity faces today with all of the world's resources and mind-boggling technology at its command. The need for mankind to know Yahweh has never been greater. That is what the trouble in the triangle is all about. The question of who should occupy a small piece of land at the eastern end of the Mediterranean and who should have the right to worship at a particular mountain top are not the real issues. They are simply the focal points drawing mankind inevitably towards a proper understanding of God and of humanity. Humanity has got a lot of living to do.

There is quite clearly a hard road ahead because at this stage not everyone even agrees that there is a triangle. Jews do and Muslims do, but many Christians find the thought abhorrent. That takes us back to the church's self-understanding. It continues to deny the idea of being one part of a triangle or of sharing its responsibility with other bodies. Before Muhammad it did not even like the idea of being one member of a partnership in which Judaism was the other partner. Only reluctantly does it admit some sort of continuing kinship with Judaism which it cannot deny as its divinely revealed predecessor. The pope's use of the words "our senior brothers" in public in reference to Jews when he called – again – for a special internationally-guaranteed status for Jerusalem was a major development.⁶ The church has long wished Judaism would quietly fade into history. No such luck. It has repeatedly refused to lie down and die even though the church has given it every encouragement.

But Islam – well that is a different matter. The church has never been able to come to grips with the relationship between them. The Second Vatican Council declared that "The church has also a high regard for Muslims" and went on to recognize that "they esteem an upright life and worship God."⁷ Consultations aimed at developing good relations between Christians and Muslims have since been stepped up both by Rome and the World Council of Churches, working in parallel and in consultation to some extent but seldom jointly. Even that has been a very important development. If the church as a total community cannot come to grips with the relationship between Rome and other units of the church, it can hardly be expected to readily grasp the relationship between itself and the other faiths in the triangle. The fact is that when it properly understands its own role it will then be able to recognize that relationship and move do to something about it. Then the basis for the triangle will no longer exist and it will begin to merge into one cohesive whole instead of fragments.

That has raised another vital question. In this situation, who makes up the church? The short answer is an uncomfortable alliance of the Roman Catholic, Orthodox and Reformed Churches which are each heavily implicated in the trouble in the triangle.

The Roman Catholic Church with an estimated 550 million adherents is the largest segment. It continues to regard itself as “the sole Church of Christ ... entrusted (by the Saviour) to Peter’s pastoral care ... and governed by the Successor of Peter” with a door held open in the hope that separated churches with their “many elements of sanctification and of truth” might return to Catholic unity.⁸ It also wields the most direct political power through a system of concordats or legal agreements between the Vatican and sovereign governments around the world, and an autocratic clerical establishment with relatively little lay involvement in its government. But even more important in consideration of the trouble in the triangle are its direct links with the historical abuse of the church’s role and the denial of human rights which set the scene for the establishment of both Islam and modern Zionism.

The Reformed Churches, with an estimated 330 million adherents, have traditionally had the strongest base of lay involvement and through this the strongest economic “muscle.” But it is through that lay involvement that they are also most closely linked to contemporary Western political influence and the twentieth century exploitation of the Third World. Some of them, notably the Church of England, still enjoy the status of the ‘established church’ in the countries in which they were founded, but they have rarely entered into concordats.

With an estimated 90 million adherents (prior to the announcement of Perestroika and the return to normal church life in the Soviet Union) the Orthodox Churches make up the smallest main stream division, but they are the most nationalistic in their attitudes. They are also the most priestly in their liturgy and they hold the most extreme views of the divinity of Christ to which the other partners in the triangle take strong exception. Being based in the Eastern Mediterranean and Russia they are geographically and politically in the front line of both day-to-day-contact and dialogue with major communities of both Judaism and Islam. Their joint involvement with Muslim fellow Arabs in organizations such as the Arab League and the Palestine Liberation Organization is therefore of very great significance.

However the answer is not as simple as that. During the nineteenth century a number of significant new religious groups formed under the general banner of Christianity and during the twentieth century there has been an absolute proliferation of such groups. This development is actually another strong challenge to the main stream churches because each new group has formed as a result of disagreement over one or more doctrinal, theological or social issues, and a large number of these ‘fringe’ churches do not fit comfortably in any of the main stream divisions. Neither are they members of the World Council of Churches. But they are important because they will have a significant role in the debate which will progressively resolve the trouble in the triangle. Estimates vary widely for the number of people who are affiliated with, or who acknowledge some attachment to, each of the major world religions, but a reasonable estimate appears to be that close to two billion people, or one third of the world population, are in some way associated with Christianity

Fortunately there are now the World Council of Churches, effectively established in the same year as the State of Israel, the Christian Peace Conference, the World Conference on Religion and Peace, the Council for a Parliament of the World's Religions, and a number of other ecumenical, confessional and inter-faith bodies which are already involved in interfaith dialogue and which can take significant initiatives.

Trouble in the Triangle traces the evolving relationship between the three unwilling partners and the nature of that relationship as streams of one faith. It shows that it was the actions and reactions which have flowed from the Christian Church's doctrines and its view of itself which resulted in – or required – the inspired ministry of the Prophet Muhammad and the development of Islam as a separate stream. It cannot start with the UN vote in 1947 or Britain's Balfour Declaration in 1917. It starts at the point where the West's ancestors began to fiddle in the affairs of Abraham's successors and moves forward more or less chronologically. It traces the growth of the early church, the development of its erroneous doctrines and dogma, its power struggles and its heresy hunting.

It then takes a close look at the life and times of the Prophet Muhammad, the nature of his call, and the development of Islam. It looks, in particular, at the Qur'anic prophecy of the Night Journey and the way in which this confirms the permanence and irrevocable nature of the Covenant of Sinai, provides a clear indication of the nature of divine predestination and the role of the Jewish community as an instrument of God's Will, and provides an insight to enable us to understand and interpret the traumatic events of the twentieth century. Put simply, the Night Journey includes a prophecy that if the Jewish community were to transgress against its neighbours, it would suffer the consequences. It would be scourged, but it would not be rejected and it would still have a role to fulfill. At that time, being scattered around the Mediterranean, it was in no position to transgress against any other community. Unfortunately the church's arrogant refusal to recognize the prophetic mission and ministry of Muhammad made it quite incapable of understanding either the direct message of the Qur'an or its wider implications.

Trouble in the Triangle then traces the life and times of Maimonides and the church's pathetic, and tragic, attempts to silence him. In particular it looks closely at the way in which Maimonides' prophetic understanding of the circumstances in which a Jewish community would return to Israel relates to the Qur'anic Night Journey. In that context it considers the Covenant of Sinai and the Mosaic Law which provide the foundation for belief in God by the people of all three faiths. That Covenant is fundamental to Jewish self-understanding but the church, overall, rejects the notion that it has currency and maintains that a New Covenant in Christ superseded the Covenant of Sinai. That theological position is the origin of anti-Semitism within the Christian churches and, in a manner parallel to the case of the Prophet Muhammad, it was the set of blinkers which prevented the church from recognizing the work of Maimonides.

Then, progressively, Trouble in the Triangle traces the development of the threads which bind together the amorphous Christian gel of religion, racism, politics and economics which is known as “the Christian Western World.” It traces “the Christian reconstruction” of the Third World during the European Colonial Era and it looks at the response of the church to each of the challenges to its doctrines and its self-understanding along the way. The ground work which has brought together the complex factors in the confrontation in the Middle East can be clearly traced from the time of the Napoleonic Wars, but there are so many of them that it takes a very broad canvas to get them all in the picture.

It could be argued that the present challenge in the Middle East dates from Napoleon’s Great Sanhedrin of 1806; or from the work of the writers who began to develop modern Zionist philosophy in the 1830s; from the Tsarist excesses of the 1880s; from Bismarck’s anti-Semitic pact with the Vatican; from the Dreyfus Affair and the formation of the World Zionist Organization in the 1890s; or from the Balfour Declaration which was issued by Britain in a desperate bid to influence the course of the Great War. However there is no single incident which can be taken as a starting point for the crisis in the Middle East. Neither is there a single action or a single policy decision which can be taken to resolve it. But from that point – the Balfour Declaration – from discussion of Hitler and his inspired parody of the church, Mein Kampf, the Allies’ conduct through the Second World War and the establishment of the State of Israel, the way in which the Qur’anic Night Journey and Maimonides’ expectation of how the return of the Jewish community to Israel would occur converge becomes increasingly apparent. So does their significance. So does the tragedy of the church’s failure to recognize both Muhammad and Maimonides. The Covenant of Sinai has not been annulled. The Jewish community continues as the principal instrument through which humanity will come to understand its relationship with God, and nothing the church can do or attempts to do can ever revoke it. The community’s role is certainly unfolding in a manner quite different to that which its people may have anticipated or hoped it would, but it is vital.

The trouble in the triangle is as much an aspect of mankind’s evolution as is its biological evolution. But instead of the development of physical characteristics and capacity it has to do with the development of community, of relationships between people, and of humanity’s understanding of God. This also becomes quite apparent when we consider the very short time frame of the evolution of humanity – and the development of systematic religion – in relation to the long time frame of the origins of the universe as it is currently understood. The history of humanity from the spark of its evolution is not yet a pinprick in elapsed universal time as we now understand it, and the role of the three partners in one stream of Yahwism is to enable humanity to develop “community” and to then live in harmony for a very long time. While that concept was, broadly speaking, understood and accepted by the Jewish community, it was not understood at all by the Christian church or the people of the amorphous Christian gel at the beginning of the twentieth century.

Britain, as the controller of what was then the greatest empire the world had known, could only see the patchwork of challenges in terms of economics, politics and power. Like other great empires before it, it showed a complete disregard for the immorality of manipulating other people, and every step it took to protect its position added new complications to a highly complex situation. In that sense it was little different to other Christian Western governments but it was in one of the principal roles as the trouble in the triangle unfolded. Every step it took influenced a lot of other people. The Jewish community, responding to the immense pressures on it, readily adapted to the lift in its political influence which came with Britain's Balfour Declaration. Its reluctance to embrace Zionism, which had been so evident before the Great War in spite of the oppression it had experienced, rapidly waned. It lost sight of its irrevocable obligations under the Covenant of Sinai (which the church said was no longer valid anyway), became arrogant and militant in its demands for Palestine as a National Home. It adapted its theology to legitimize Zionism, and it even forfeited the opportunity to develop an autonomous region in Russia in order to boost its claims to Palestine.

But the vital fact is that the Jewish community was only responding to circumstances and the pressure upon it when it allowed itself to become a transgressor in Palestine in contravention of the Covenant of Sinai and in the terms of the Qur'anic Night Journey. Unfortunately neither Christians nor Jews recognized the fact. Events moved with great speed. Neither Britain nor Germany under Hitler would modify its basic foreign policy except that Britain, out of self-interest, modified its approach to Palestine. Before long Gog and Magog went to war. Hitler very obligingly acted out his parody of the church, and took the role of the scourge from the Night Journey to administer the consequences of transgression, but still neither Jew nor Christian bothered to read the lines. However once Hitler was out of the way the Christians of Europe began to think about the challenge of Mein Kampf. They certainly did not think about the challenge of the Night Journey because they did not acknowledge the Qur'an. Their consciences began to prick. The Jewish community was quick to take advantage of their temporary pain, and the Zionist aim of an independent Jewish State of Israel in Palestine became a reality. In historical terms Hitler had simply been the means by which the challenge to the church was pressed home after Britain had tried to back away from the issue.

Both Muhammad and Maimonides were being proved right – so far. The missing link is that we have not yet sighted Maimonides' interpretation of the Messianic Age although the authority roles of the three faiths have changed dramatically. It is the Palestinian people who have experienced a long period of oppression as the State of Israel became a parody on Herzl's concept of Zionism. And it is the Jewish community and the people of Islam who now have the opportunity, together, to show that through submission to the will of God the Messianic Age can follow the establishment of the State of Israel.

Taking advantage of the self-imposed economic dependence of the Western World on resources in the hands of the Muslim community, the Islamic Conference has made a valiant effort to remodel world political, economic and personal morality along the lines it believes right and, especially, for the benefit of the Third World. But the conflicts of interest which its members experience in their complex dealings with the Western World make the task overwhelming. Western leaders and propagandists have been quick to take advantage of the religious divisions which have affected the Muslim world community as well as the Christian world community. The result has been a backlash of frightening proportions against Christian communities in many countries.

Many Muslim leaders, including both politicians and academics, have a more acute perception of the historical perspectives of the triangle than their Jewish and Christian counterparts. They are acutely conscious of their responsibility as Muslims in the strictest Yahwist tradition to lead mankind towards that relationship with his fellows which is the will of God. But they cannot do it in isolation. There is no isolation. They are only one of the partners in the triangle and they have no more of a monopoly on the right answers than have either their Jewish or Christian partners. And the affairs of all three are more intimately entwined than ever before. In fact they have reached a stage of such economic and political interdependence that it is no longer possible to simply dismantle the triangle. Neither can the triangle be isolated from the affairs of the rest of the world. The whole world watches, apprehensively, for every move in the triangle. And as yet-another Camp David Summit fails to find a solution, and as the Muslim backlash against a history of oppression at the hands of the amorphous Christian gel becomes more violent there is a growing understanding of the consequences for the whole world of a complete breakdown in relations in the Middle East. But there should also be a growing awareness of the brighter future for mankind which is possible if the partners in the triangle all pull together.

It has been the manipulation of Muslim countries in the Middle East by countries of the Christian West, in order to exploit their oil supplies, which has brought the world to its present state of tension and dependence on the religious and political stability of the region for their own economic and political stability. And it has been the negative effect of the church's arrogant refusal to respond to a succession of challenges to its doctrines, its self-understanding and its involvement in the denigration and oppression of its partners in the triangle, which has now focused world attention on Jerusalem and on both the concept and the person of the Messiah. These things, together, guarantee that the world cannot enjoy Maimonides' understanding of the Messianic Age until the church responds positively to the challenge to reassess its doctrines and its self-understanding. Not until then can the rest of the world's people be confident that the Christian West will live in submission to God's will as it is fulfilled in the life of the Messiah and illustrated in the Gospel. Not until then can a minority Jewish community be confident that it will be free of persecution in a Christian community.

It is a damning indictment of the church that Jerusalem is the centre of world attention because of the negative and destructive things which it has done rather than because of the peace, love and harmony expected of the Messianic Age. When we grasp the flow of events which has brought us to the present situation it becomes a lot easier to put the world's current economic and military problems in perspective and to think our way through the times ahead.

Cause and effect relationships continue to run right through history but because of the pressures which we work under we tend to make our decisions based only on the most pressing current factors. As our situation becomes more and more pressing our tendency to make ad hoc or circumstantial decisions becomes more and more marked. We seldom think through the factors which have brought us to a point of decision with enough care, and we seldom wonder whether those factors may still be latent, lurking just beneath the surface, or what undesirable long term effects our decisions may bring. We simply hope that if there are any we will be able to tackle them when they arise – or that our successors can.

These attitudes are seldom more apparent than when we make economic or political decisions from a position of strength which is under challenge. We tend to assume that the current power-block relationships will continue and that if our self-interest, greed and arrogance show through we will be able to prevent a backlash because of our position. When our market researchers or business and political analysts come up with an assessment which displeases us we simply look for some temporary expedient to get around it and press on regardless with only our own interests in mind.

That is what the trouble in the triangle in the Middle East is really all about – the issue of human relationships and one person's responsibility to another, and one community's responsibility to another. It is time to stop the action, do a bit of talking for a while and then redirect the action. We are at a turning point in history and it is vital that we make the right decisions. Because of the way in which the church and the people of the Christian West have led the world into the present crisis it is on them that basic responsibility rests to find a solution. But we have our triangle and we have our sandwich with Israel as the meat in the middle – with the Covenant of Sinai irrevocably in place and complete in all respects – and the triangle has been so dramatically redesigned that all of the initiative is no longer linked to the responsibility. The United States, like Britain when it sought to manipulate the Jewish community for its own ends by means of the Balfour Declaration, is caught between a rock and a hard place. It cannot move in a military or political sense to prevent Muslim attacks on Christians or Jews even though it is supposed to be leading the Judeo-Christian world within the established framework of the Christian Era – the time of the Messiah. If it attempts to, no star wars gigs will help it. It will simply encourage greater cohesion within dar-al-islam and precipitate the response already indicated. On the other hand it cannot try to placate the Muslim community by moving against Israel to force it to accept the establishment of a State of Palestine and share the city of Jerusalem.

The pattern of economic and political power now enjoyed by the supporters of Israel is such that, in the event of the Western powers moving to dump Israel in order to get themselves off the political or economic hook, the friends of Israel can bring any Western power to its knees. They can start either with the United States or any other country and neither pre-emptive military action nor community oppression of the Mein Kampf style can get the Christian West off the hook. Any such action would simply bring the ultimate in self-degradation because of the military and economic consequences. Recognition of that fact provides both a sobering influence which ought to curb the passions of anti-Semites, and a safety valve in great-power decision making.

However, although the power at Israel's disposal can be used destructively in a defensive exercise it can also be used constructively. By a momentous and yet simple decision to swap its American defensive umbrella for a meaningful working understanding with the Muslim World, Israel, and the world Jewish community, would make that umbrella totally unnecessary. It would also usher in the Messianic Age as both Maimonides and the Messiah himself would probably define it. That understanding requires three basic components: a home for the Palestinian people; a new understanding of, and a new approach to, the status of Jerusalem; and the redirection of the Jewish community's economic muscle. That redirection of economic muscle would involve two things. First: partial withdrawal of the economic and political support which is actually helping to maintain the present American umbrella. Second: collaboration with Third World authorities, including Muslim leadership groups, to use that economic muscle where it will most effectively redress the wrongs perpetrated as part of the Christian reconstruction of the Third World during the European colonial era and since.

In spite of the fact that the initiative in generating world change now rests with Israel and its supporters it is not the Jewish question to which we have to address our attention. It is the Christian question. That question can only finally be resolved by all three partners in the triangle talking together and acting together at a variety of levels and in a variety of ways with, and under critical and potentially humiliating scrutiny from, their brothers and sisters in an anxious world. The establishment of the State of Israel has crystallized, reinforced and focused world attention onto the challenges to each of the partners in the triangle and not simply onto the challenge to the church.

In other words, the Messianic Age will be shaped through interaction involving the people of the total Yahwist community into which the Messiah was born. The people of the pre-Messianic faiths are waiting and watching – the whole world is waiting and watching – for the trouble in the triangle to be resolved. It is not the sole responsibility of the Jewish community – the community which is still subject to the irrevocable Covenant of Sinai. That community could start the process. So could the United States by voluntarily relinquishing its greedy, arrogant grip on the economic steering wheel. But the greater responsibility rests with the church.

NOTES

- 1 Flannery, Austin P. (Ed., trans. Fr. Colman O'Neill) .Documents of Vatican II, Dogmatic Constitution on the Church [Michigan: Wm. B. Eerdmans, 1978] pp. 350–358.
- 2 The Lausanne Covenant of the International Congress on World Evangelization, The new face of Evangelicalism [London: Hodder & Stoughton, 1976] pp. 17 & 103.

- 3 The Qur'an, sura 17: 3-8, (trans. Dawood) [Harmondsworth: Penguin, 1974] The words used by Dawood are different to those used by some other translators. Mahmud Y. Zayid in the translation approved by the Supreme Sunni and Shii Councils of the Republic of Lebanon [Beirut: Dar Al- Choura, 1980] p. 201, translates the key verse as: "It may be that Allah will have mercy on you. But if you return (to mischief), We will return (with punishment). We have made Hell a prison-house for the unbelievers." However, as the word "transgressors" is used in context in a preceding verse, and the word "scourge" is used in the verse which follows, I have used the Dawood translation on this occasion because it conveys the thrust of the passage more succinctly. In Zayid verse 17:4 reads: "And We declared to the Children of Israel in the Book: 'Twice you shall commit evil in the land. You shall become great transgressors.'" The later verse reads: "This Qur'an will guide to that which is most upright. It promises the believers who do good works a rich reward, and threatens those who deny the life to come with a grievous scourge. Yet man prays for evil as fervently as he prays for good. Truly, man is ever hasty."
- 4 Meiseles, Meir Judaism, Thought and legend [Jerusalem: Feldheim, 1964].
- 5 Matthiae, Paolo Ebla: An Empire Rediscovered (trans. Christopher Holme) [New York: Doubleday, 1981] pp. 171–172. Matthiae, head of archaeological exploration of Tell Mardikh, site of the capital of Ebla, which involved impressive international collaboration, explains at some length the significance of the discovery of the Mardkh IIBI State Archives. The archives housed fired clay tablets recording the administration of the city as well as exploits leading figures of the empire. Their discovery not only added greatly to the available knowledge of the nature of life in the Middle East during the period, but show that the archivists had a remarkable perception of the flow of history. Perhaps they did not fully appreciate the importance of the documentation they were leaving to enable people to gain a better understanding of the evolution of human relations about four thousand years later, but we should be gratified that they made the effort. Ebla: An Empire Rediscovered is highly recommended reading.
- 6 Catholic World News Briefs, e-mail subscription service, July 25, 2000.
- 7 Flannery, Austin P. (Ed., trans. Fr. Killian) Documents of Vatican II, Declaration on the relation of the Church to Non-Christian Religions [Michigan: Wm. B. Eerdmans, 1978] p. 738.
- 8 ibid., pp. 350–358.

Volume I

Part 1

STARTING FROM SCRATCH

CHAPTER 1

GROWING PAINS: FROM A MINI-SECT TO A MAJOR COMPETITOR

Poor Pompey. He was a Consul of the Roman Republic, commander of its Eastern Region, possibly its most successful general, and he was soon to become a member of the ruling Roman triumvirate. But he was not to know that he had bitten off more than Rome could chew when he stormed the walls of Jerusalem in the year 63 BCE and pushed the boundaries of the Roman Empire towards their limits. He was not to know that he had annexed anything more than an ordinary city. To him it was simply another piece of territory which would help to secure the eastern flank of the empire against the ambitions of Pontus and any other challengers from the east, as well as raising a bit more tax wealth to bolster Rome's sick economy. After all, Rome had to fund the gladiator games to keep the unemployed mobs off the streets as well as to maintain its armies and build roads.

In the previous three years Pompey had annexed all the territory from the Taurus Mountains of Turkey to the Caspian Sea in the east and all of Syria, and he had set up three Roman provinces as he did so.¹ But this out-of-the-way job proved a bit tougher than he had bargained for and it took a three-month siege before he subdued Jerusalem. When his troops finally succeeded in breaching the walls, the storming of the city triggered reprisals by certain factions among the Jewish defenders against others and great confusion reigned. The net result was the massacre of 12,000 Jews and the partial firing of the city.²

Such a defeat should have been enough to teach the Jews to recognize their superiors and to open their gates to a Roman officer in future. But Pompey was not to know that he had thrust his sword into the key piece of a religious jigsaw puzzle and that in doing so he had released pent-up energy and emotions so that the jigsaw puzzle would grow into a massive triangle and engulf the morally degenerate empire of his successors.

The people of the proud little Jewish Kingdom which he had annexed held an almost fanatical belief, developed over 700 years, that a Messiah would be born among them. There were many different views about what the Messiah would be like but by his determined annexation, linked with such a high level of trauma, Pompey had provided a focal point and a stimulus for expectations that the Messiah would be a brilliant military leader who would throw off the yoke of oppression and raise the nation to new heights of power. By his victory Pompey had also ensured that the Messiah would be born into the Roman Empire rather than into a small obscure independent kingdom and this, in turn, had guaranteed rapid passage for the Messianic message throughout the empire and beyond at a time in history when that message was needed more urgently than ever before.

In fact there was no religious triangle at that stage. There was only the first side of it: only the exclusive tribal kingdom with its strong priestly institutions which had grown around the man called Abraham who had migrated into the area with his family possibly 2,000 years or so earlier.³ When the triangle formed from a partnership of the Jewish religion, its “daughter” Christianity, and a “grand-daughter”, Islam, it would become very unbalanced indeed. The daughter would grasp, and hang onto a position of immense power and influence and try to dominate the triangle altogether. Big trouble was already brewing for Rome before Pompey set out for home but it would get a lot bigger as the empire became embroiled in the establishment of the triangle. Rome was to find itself in the hot seat when it became both the sponsor and the headquarters of the dominant partner in the triangle, the Christian Church.

The church admits to a few blemishes today but it likes us to believe that in its infancy it was a vigorous, unified group confident in its beliefs and scrupulous in its conduct. It likes us to believe that its decision makers were somehow different to ours and that the inspiration of their divine call to spread the Gospel somehow or other touched them with judgement of a superhuman kind so that their reasoning and their decisions were above questioning and beyond reproach.

We are told that it would have been impossible for the Apostles to have been mistaken in their actions because, according to the principles of faith of the church they were still bearers of divine revelation which they had received directly from Christ. We are told that they had acted under the inspiration of the Holy Spirit when they passed on their revealed teaching and the Holy Scriptures, and that they were equally inspired when they gave practical instructions in cultic, disciplinary, and institutional matters.

Since Christ did not leave any written word personally we are expected to take the oral and written instructions of these twelve Apostles, transmitted either personally or through their disciples, as containing the essence of Christianity and all that is important about Salvation. However there is a question mark over just what that means. The various streams of the church are at odds over whether anything new has been or can be added to recognized scripture, and the apparent, or alleged, corruption of scripture in the pre-Reformation church was at the heart of the Reformation. The Vatican insists that “Sacred Tradition and sacred Scripture make up a single sacred deposit of the Word of God, which is entrusted to the Church”⁴ and that there was no corruption of meaning. However the reformers, in a bid to distance themselves from corruption and errors in the pre-Reformation church, insisted that nothing new had been added to the Apostolic message and nothing would be added in the future. This was a matter of bitter and continuing controversy, aggravated by the development of the theory of evolution, so that not only the authority and legitimacy of scripture, but the question of whether it could contain any errors (Biblical inerrancy) also became an issue. On the reform side of the divide there was an insistence that everything that mattered was in the Apostolic writings. On the Roman Catholic side there was equal insistence that the writings of the Apostles and the Church Fathers were “flowing out from the same divine well-spring, [and] come together in some fashion to form one thing.” Further, that “Tradition transmits in its entirety the Word of God which has been entrusted to the Apostles by Christ the Lord and the Holy Spirit,” and is faithfully preserved, expounded and spread abroad, to be accepted and honoured with equal feelings of devotion and reverence as the Holy Scriptures.⁵ [Emphasis added.] Both of these positions mean, by implication, that nothing has been altered or omitted in the telling of the Bible message either. On that basis the churches claim that any doctrine, policy or action which they take is justified and authenticated if it can be linked in some devious or indirect way by their reasoning to some statement made by one of the Apostles or by a leader of the early church – provided of course that he is currently in favour.^{6 7}

If we are to believe that such singular correctness marked the people of the early church then we must accept that they were different to us. Anyone who has followed councils or assemblies of the church in recent years knows quite well that its decisions and statements are reached by the very normal and very human process of debate, politicking and subterfuge. It does not make any difference how carefully the reports on which decisions have to be made have been prepared.

If the leaders of the church in early periods were divinely inspired to the extent that their actions and decisions were pre-destined to correctness then we may well wonder at what point a change took place. When did the church lose its magic touch so that its decisions and statements became those of mere mortals? Or were the people of the church in its first century or so just as human as those since? If those who determined the course of Christian theology were only human after all then perhaps we should look more closely at the relationship between the Jewish Christian faction and those Jews who did not recognize the Christian view of Jesus of Nazareth in the early years of the Christian era.

WHO DO YOU SAY I AM?

The conviction that Jesus was the Messiah of prophecy in Hebrew Scripture (the ‘Old Testament’) and the determination to stand up for that conviction are quite clear in the history of the early church. So also is the conviction among the principal Jewish religious authorities that the Christians were wrong. After all there were some twenty-four or so Jewish sects⁸ each with beliefs and emphases peculiar to their sect. In this respect they were comparable to the denominational divisions among Christians today. The Christians simply increased the number of sects by one. The prophets, preachers and holy men of many of the sects had been, and probably still were, proclaiming the coming of the Messiah. The common anticipation was that he would deliver the Jews from the humiliation of Roman rule.

But the critical issue is not whether Jesus was the Messiah of Hebrew Scripture or not. The course of history will establish that. The critical issue is the relationship between Jesus and God. According to the records which we have, it was quite some time after Pentecost before the Apostles began to claim that Jesus was in any sense equal to God. In fact it was not until after the conversion of the Apostle Paul. Some months before that Stephen, one of a group of seven men appointed as deacons to provide for the care and nurture of the young Christian community, was taken before the Sanhedrin to account for his preaching. He infuriated the members of the Sanhedrin by his scathing attack on them. He reminded them of how their ancestors had persecuted prophets and killed those who foretold the coming of the Just One and then he said, "And now you have become his betrayers, his murderers." He went on to describe a vision of Jesus "the Son of Man" standing at God's right hand. The scene is described in Acts chapter 7. "At this all the members of the council shouted out and stopped their ears with their hands; then they all rushed at him, sent him out of the city and stoned him." Paul, known as Saul at that time, was a witness to the stoning and is said to have entirely approved of the killing.

Stephen's description of his vision, according to the records available to us, follows the words of Peter on the day of Pentecost very closely. Peter had said, "God raised this man Jesus to life, and all of us are witnesses to that. Now raised to the heights by God's right hand, he has received from the Father the Holy Spirit ..." [Acts 2:32–33 from the Jerusalem translation of the Bible.] There is no suggestion of union or equality there.⁹

It could have been the inability of early Christians to understand the person of Jesus which led them to present him at first as the Son of God but later as God-in-person when they tried to explain him to their fellows¹⁰ If that is the case it appears that they were not content to simply expound Jesus' teachings and say "this man was the Messiah of Isaiah". It also appears that they were unable to debate the meaning of his life with either their fellow Judaists or pagans without defining him. In either case it was only to be expected that they would be labeled as mischievous deviants. However, leaders of the early church reacted to their fellows and to the political and social circumstances of their day in much the same way as leaders in this day. They were just closer to the point of the action and the divine call and we can look at them with a critical long-distance eye.

The opposition of the church to a reassessment of its basic doctrines has been intense throughout its history – most of which has been culturally and racially cloistered – and the reason is clear. If adherence to doctrine is the only pillar on which a faith or an institution is built then the entire faith or institution must collapse if that pillar is shown to be false. The fear of that situation is the basis of the church's opposition to calls for the re-assessment of its doctrines and has been throughout its institutional history. Unfortunately that is widely seen to be the basis for its opposition and it does not encourage confidence. If the church is unable to explain or to justify its doctrines to scholars of other faiths without relying on semantics about revealed truths in this age of advanced reason then ordinary followers of Jesus would have had no chance in debating the purpose of His life and ministry once those doctrines had been declared.

It seems certain that it was Paul who first used the concept “Son of God” to explain Jesus during his brief spell of preaching in Damascus immediately after his change of heart from being a vigorous opponent of the Christians to joining their group. His change of heart followed the trauma of being temporarily blinded while he was on his way from Jerusalem to harass the young sect, about 34 or 36 CE, when it was still very much a part of the Jewish religious community. At that time the sect was known as ‘the Nazarenes’ and the term ‘Christians’ had not yet come into use.

Paul was a cultured Greek-speaking Jewish Cilician who had inherited Roman citizenship. He was born in the Hellenistic environment of Tarsus in the early years of the first century CE, probably about twenty years before Jesus began his ministry, and given the dual names ‘Paul’ and ‘Saul’.¹¹ Described as a mystical and charismatic character, he is believed to have trained as a tent maker in his Jewish father’s business. During those years he would certainly have been exposed to both Stoicism and Gnosticism which were well established in the region, as well as Judaism, before he travelled to Jerusalem to study Rabbinical law as a Pharisee. Gnosticism had evolved from the early years of the Persian Empire, soon after 538 BCE, from the mingling of Greek and Minoan elements with beliefs and practices from several religions, including Hinduism from India and Zoroastrianism from Persia which had also influenced the style of worship in the new Temple in Jerusalem following the end of the Babylonian exile. [See chapter 2.] The basic belief of Gnosticism was that humans could escape from the entrapment of the evil material world which was created by an inferior god (a demiurge) and enjoy pure life of the spirit in another sphere which was the true home of the divine spark within each person. This escape or salvation for the ‘spirit’ or ‘soul’, could be attained only by gnosis (knowledge) of a divine saviour from the realm of the pure spirit above who could effect the release of the soul.

It is to be expected that such exposure to Greek philosophy and Gnosticism would have influenced Paul’s response to his visionary encounter with Jesus and his traumatic conversion to the sect of Nazarenes on the road to Damascus. This is confirmed by Bornkamm’s comments that Paul’s letters show the characteristics of Hellenistic teaching, elements of Greek culture, and the “use of concepts and ideas originating in the popular philosophy of the Stoics.”¹² It is therefore very important to note that Stoicism involved belief that God was the immanent all-pervading energy by which the world was created and sustained and “the world reason or ‘Logos’ which manifests itself in the order and beauty of the world.”¹³ It is also very significant that the Stoic writer Seneca taught that “a wise man should love his wife with judgement, not with affection”. This influence also shows clearly in Paul’s writings and it was subsequently taken up in those of Manes and the two, together, had a big influence on two important fathers and saints of the church, Jerome (who claimed Seneca as a Christian) and Augustine.¹⁴

Thus Paul, one of the most prominent persecutors of Nazarenes until his controversial conversion, was certainly not a ‘clean skin’ Jew untouched by other faiths and philosophical beliefs before he undertook rabbinical studies and it is hardly surprising that under the circumstances of the time he antagonized Jews of the mainstream of faith by his short spell of preaching in Damascus. However apart from that short spell of preaching he was not active in the life of the sect for somewhere between seven and eleven years. There is confusion about where he went, and when, but it appears most likely that it was not until after he had spent two or three years in Arabia that he went to Jerusalem to meet Peter and was subsequently accepted into the group of Apostles after he had returned home to Tarsus for some time. Based on their interpretation of Paul's limited writings about that period, notably his letter to the Galatians, some writers maintain that during that period he was conducting a one-man proselytizing mission in Asia Minor and Northern Arabia.¹⁵ But there is something strange about the defensive, almost dogmatic, manner in which chapters one and two are written which indicates that there was already confusion or dispute about his travels at the time the letter was written. It is as if Paul was defending himself against the record presented in Acts that his journeys were not as he presented them. Acts was apparently written some thirty to forty years after Galatians, between 90 and 100 CE. If it is correct that Galatians was written in the late 50s or early 60s, who was Paul shadow boxing with? ¹⁶ Could it be that someone edited Galatians after Acts was in circulation in order to defend Paul's reputation?

There is more certainty that during that critical period the group of Apostles which Paul declined to contact had been quietly recovering from the trauma and upheaval of Stephen's death, gaining confidence, strengthening its position and working out its understanding of the relationship between their sect and mainstream Judaism and also Jesus' role in the divine plan. If Paul was preaching a one-man mission he was doing so on the basis of his visionary experience on the road to Damascus and under the combined and contradictory influences of his Jewish upbringing in a highly Hellenistic community and his rabbinical training. In that case he was working out his own understanding of those relationships in self-imposed grand isolation while he was on the run. It was largely his conduct and attitudes which subsequently resulted in restrictions on the use of the synagogues by the Nazarene sect and in 57 CE he was almost lynched and had to be placed under protective custody.¹⁷

Under Paul's influence the explanation of Jesus which some of the new disciples preached began to change.¹⁸ Even with the best of intentions towards truth and authenticity, contradiction and confusion appeared in the claims and teaching of the Apostles and it is no wonder. After some time the Apostles accepted Paul's bona-fides, recognized him as an equal and invited him to go with Barnabas on a missionary journey. That was when open conflict flared within the sect because it was faced with two problems.

Firstly, in taking the word of God to the Gentiles was it taking Judaism or was it not? Was it necessary for a person who accepted Jesus as Messiah to accept also the totality of Judaism and to become a proselyte by submitting to the ritual of male circumcision and all other Jewish laws and dietary traditions? Or was it possible for a gentile to know God through the life and teaching of Jesus and to accept the faith of a Jew without the ritual? The Jewish authorities said "no" to the easy option but Paul's reasoning prevailed within the sect and the die was cast. The Nazarenes were still permitted to preach in the synagogues but the pressure for them to be expelled increased steadily.

Secondly, was it preaching Jesus as Son of God or was it not? Paul was insisting on preaching and writing in that vein and it was important that there should be agreement on such a basic issue. Unfortunately, very little correspondence between those early Christians and very few records of the Apostolic period have survived but the issue was not resolved before Paul set out with Barnabas and the activity of the sect began to increase dramatically.¹⁹ Paul maintained that the other Apostles were influenced in their interpretation of Jesus by their knowledge of Jesus-the-man while his interpretation was the result of direct divine revelation. [Galatians 1: 11–17]

The Apostles as a group took the decision that Paul should team up with another new Apostle, Barnabas, to conduct a mission in his Hellenized home town, Tarsus, and then, together, work among the Gentiles in Antioch. Barnabas was also a Hellenistic Jew, born on Cyprus, of the priestly Levite tribe which was set aside for ministry in the temple. He became recognized as an Apostle because of his devotion to Jesus and his generosity to the sect's cause but, like Paul, he is presumed not to have met the person Jesus. In Acts 9: 26–30 Barnabas is credited with introducing Paul to the Apostles after his conversion but that account cannot be reconciled with Paul's version of events in his letter to the church in Galatia. [Galatians 1: 15 – 2: 2] That raises the important questions of when and in what circumstances Barnabas actually joined the Apostles and whether Paul went to Arabia west of the Jordan following his conversion before he went to Jerusalem. Together with many other inconsistencies between reports in various books of the New Testament these questions make interpretation of the development of the early church quite difficult. However such inconsistencies raise much more important questions about the way in which philosophical and religious beliefs from the prevailing environment were absorbed or incorporated into the church's evolving understanding of Jesus of Nazareth – its Christology – and the motives behind the process.²⁰ The consequences were to become apparent only very, very slowly.

During the sixteen to twenty years between Jesus' crucifixion and the first of the great missionary journeys by the Apostles (the first is dated about 46 CE and the last about 65 CE) and while the Nazarenes had been steadily gathering adherents among the Jews of Palestine, significant political developments had been taking place. Some of them led to increasing conflict between the radical Zealots who were still waiting for a military Messiah and the occupying Roman power. At the same time significant developments in religious and philosophical thinking had also been occurring in other parts of the empire but we shall come to them shortly: the local scene first.

A MATTER OF PROVOCATION: ROME'S INTERVENTION

At about the time of Paul's conversion Pilate had been removed from office as Procurator of Judea. The stated reason was his tyranny and corruption but the decision can also be seen as a necessary attempt to head off the possibility of an uprising. However relations did not improve to any extent. Two years later Emperor Caligula claimed divine honors, demanded that worship be offered to him personally and demanded also that a bust of him be erected in the temple. The Jews refused.

Relations between Jerusalem and Rome became even more strained when the Procurators responded by defiling Jewish traditions and deliberately provoking and humiliating Jews. The assassination of the emperor three years later removed that particular point of conflict and Claudius, successor to Caligula, actually improved relations with the Jewish authorities by lifting restrictions on Jews, by abolishing the office of procurator and by appointing Agrippa I, a grandson of Herod, as king of Judea. The improvement was short lived. When Agrippa II succeeded to the throne only three years later, (44 CE), although he had been educated in Rome and could therefore reasonably be expected to show proper respect for Roman authority, Claudius re-established the office of procurator and a new procurator was appointed.

It was back to the old regime with a king whose authority was purely nominal. It was therefore against a background of very real national uncertainty and unrest that the apostles and Paul overcame their reserve towards each other and he set off with Barnabas on that first formal missionary journey in 46 or 47 CE. It was then, while Paul and Barnabas were in Antioch, that the name 'Christians' was first used to label people who adopted the new and unorthodox Messianic ideas. Two years later he was still in conflict with his colleagues in the Christian sect over the question of the nature of Jesus when he returned to discuss that and other issues at a council in Jerusalem. It was probably about a year later that he wrote what we know as his first letter to the Thessalonians with his increasing emphasis on the idea of Jesus as the Son of God becoming apparent. This is probably the impact of Paul's exposure to Gnosticism showing through for the first time in the writings which we have.

The embryonic church had reached the point of the first challenge to its evolving theology – probably without being conscious of it. Its parent was challenging it through confrontation with Paul over issues which its members had not been able to resolve between themselves before Paul had been teamed with Barnabas to work in Antioch. The challenge would continue until parent and daughter were both thrown out into the big wide world to operate as separate institutions. We can be sure that there was a real feeling of relief among the Jewish authorities when Paul was taken in custody to Rome for trial in 59 CE. It is quite probable that many Christians in Jerusalem felt the same relief.

The Jewish authorities had enough to worry about with continuing suppression and provocation by their Roman overlords. They must have been very conscious that more and more adherents of the moderate sects were becoming sympathetic to the cause of the Zealots even if they did not openly associate with them and they must have known that further friction might result in a repeat of the abortive uprising in 6 CE.²¹ The Jewish authorities would have known quite well of the division between those apostles who had known Jesus personally and Paul, who had not known him personally, which was resulting in the development of two quite clear streams within the Christian sect. They probably hoped that if Paul disappeared from the scene his followers would merge with the Jerusalem stream and that, in turn, the whole sect would revert to Pharisaic Judaism.

Members of the Jerusalem community put the emphasis in their teaching on the historical figure from Nazareth, Jew and prophet. They saw themselves as a sect challenging and revitalizing Judaism and recalling Jews to a true and proper allegiance to God. In contrast to this Paul believed that Jesus had been the Messianic Savior-God through whom demonic powers had been conquered and the Messianic era inaugurated. He held considerable personal authority over the Christian communities which he established and he encouraged the devotional practice of the supper of the Lord as a practical reminder of the death of the Lord until His Messianic purpose had been fully and promptly achieved.

Paul's imprisonment led to a decline in his influence in Jerusalem and a drop in morale in the communities which he had established. He made a vigorous but only partly successful effort to counter the influence of the Jerusalem stream through his travels after he had been acquitted.²² In contrast the community which grew up around him in Rome survived and seems to have grown more determined as a reaction to his reputed martyrdom in 64 CE, in spite of Nero's purges and the beastly treatment which he metered out to members of "that secret religious society" after the fire of Rome a year later.²³ Even so, it appeared that the future of the movement was dependent on the Jewish Christians in Jerusalem at that time.

THE JEWISH REVOLT AND THE SIEGE OF JERUSALEM

However no one could take account of the impending actions of Procurator Florus. He stepped in and triggered the Jewish revolt of 66 CE in the manner of an imbecile. During a Passover celebration, thinking it great fun, Florus seized the vestments of the high priest and obscenely violated the most sacred beliefs of the Jews, who now added contempt to their hatred of the Romans.²⁴ The Roman soldiers set about looting Jerusalem and Florus demanded massive protection money out of Temple funds.²⁵ The ranks of the Zealots were swollen by infuriated Jews of every sect, including Christians, in a widespread revolt.

The Roman garrison at Jerusalem fell in May 66 CE. An important factor in the collapse of the garrison and a big influence in the future attitude of Rome towards the Jews was the slaughter of a section of the garrison by zealots under Menahem. A detachment of Romans had been trapped and surrounded by a Jewish mob. An agreement had been negotiated and sworn to enable the two sides to disengage but while the Romans were withdrawing, unarmed, Menahem's Zealots fell on them and cut them down to the last man. Rome could not be expected to forget the savagery and deceit of the massacre. If there had still been any chance of a peaceful settlement of the revolt it was dashed by Menahem's dastardly deed. Neither mercy nor a negotiated peace could be expected from Rome.²⁶ Reinforcements were sent from Syria. They were defeated by the Zealots at Beth-horon and the little country was soon swept by rebellion on such a scale that it took the cream of the Roman army, specially despatched from

Rome with up to 70,000 ground troops, 10,000 cavalry and thousands of battering rams four years to regain control of the city.²⁷

During the war support for the Jewish uprising came from a very interesting and significant quarter. On the northern bank of the Tigris, wedged into disputed fringe territory between the Roman and Parthian empires, was a small semi-independent kingdom of Adiabene. At the time of Jesus' ministry Jews were actively proselytizing in Adiabene and in 30 CE, the generally accepted year of Jesus' crucifixion, Queen Helena became a convert to Judaism. It is reasonable to assume that many of her subjects adopted Judaism also. Subsequently she supported her coreligionists in Judea in their uprising between 66 and 73 CE. Of course it didn't take long for Rome to eliminate her kingdom when Trajan decided to expand into Armenia 25 years later. Today it is the Kurdish region of Iraq.

At the time of the uprising, Roman government and morale were going through a period of upheaval. Nero's reign was disintegrating and that probably encouraged the Zealots to try for independence. Nero's forces in Britain had suffered a disastrous defeat about five years before; southern Italy was in disarray because of lack of reconstruction following a very destructive earthquake and his personal depravity was probably reflected in the obscene conduct of Florus which had triggered the Jewish uprising. Two years later, while the war in Judea was at its peak, he committed suicide while General Galba, already proclaimed emperor by his Spanish legions, advanced on Rome. Galba was to be the first of four emperors in twelve months. Vespasian, recalled from his command of the imperial army in Judea to become the fourth, was able to regain some stability.²⁸

While Vespasian was still in command of the war in Judea a turn-coat Pharisee named Flavius Josephus served for a period as Governor of Galilee. Whether he should be regarded as a national hero whose actions softened the blow for the Jews and therefore helped to preserve their culture and self-understanding, or whether he should be regarded as a quisling who betrayed his people for a prestigious post in Rome is debatable. It is mainly by his own writings that we know him. Some commentators give him a major part in the fall and destruction of Jerusalem in 70 CE and therefore in the fate of the Jewish people. After being educated for the priesthood both as a Sadducee and as a Pharisee he was sent to Rome to negotiate the release of religious prisoners. He became friendly with the empress, perhaps infatuated, and he was so impressed by the political and military genius of Rome that, on his return to Jerusalem, he told his fellow Jews that they should link their destiny with Rome, forego political freedom, and gain from Graeco-Roman culture. In spite of his pro-Roman views and his apparent opposition to the war he was regarded highly enough to be appointed to the important post of Governor of Galilee by the Jewish provisional government. He soon had 100,000 troops at his command but he went over to the Romans in doubtful circumstances when his mountain fortress of Jotapata was captured. He surrendered to Vespasian and prophesied that he would become emperor. His flattery brought his release. He served the later stages of the war on Rome's side and later held high status at court.²⁹ Although to some commentators it appears that his role has been overstated and he may have been a very small piece in a very big evolving jigsaw puzzle, it is because he provided much of the Western World's understanding of Jewish relations with their overlords at that time that we must acknowledge him.

RABBI JOCHANAN BEN ZAKKAI: THE JABNEH YESHIVA

It was somewhat later in the war and while Jerusalem was under siege that, apparently anticipating the total destruction of Jewish heritage and religious education, the philosopher-rabbi Jochanan ben Zakkai made his escape Trojan-horse-style in a coffin. He is also said to have boldly confronted Vespasian with the prophecy that he would soon be emperor but he asked permission to establish a Jewish academy of learning or yeshiva. When his prophecy proved correct during the third year of the war Vespasian granted the request and a yeshiva was established in the coastal town of Jabneh. By that means he perpetuated Jewish tradition in Palestine and provided a base from which the Palestine Talmud was developed during the next couple of hundred years.

When Vespasian became emperor he entrusted the siege of Jerusalem to his son Titus. It was to be his lot to finish off the bloodiest and most drawn out war of the era. The walls of Jerusalem were finally breached in 70 CE. According to the historian Tacitus, the Romans made a desolation and called it peace. Titus destroyed the temple and then returned to Rome to a very hollow hero's welcome. In fact the resistance was not finally crushed until 78 CE when the last of the hard-core defenders of Masada killed their wives, their children and then themselves to avoid capture.³⁰ The number of civilians slaughtered in Palestine was estimated at 600,000. Many more were enslaved or provided with free passage to Rome for all the fun of the games.³¹ Rumblings of discontent increased all around the empire, but right there at its heart Jews and Christians were distrusted and oppressed with equal venom.

It was not only Pharisaic Judaism which took a battering. The community of the Christian sect at Jerusalem was almost completely eliminated. The great void which this caused in leadership and teaching among the Christian communities of the Eastern Mediterranean was filled by people from Paul's camp. His reputation was rehabilitated and the two streams of Christian thought about Jesus became blurred or fused – and confused. That confusion led to the Judaists expelling the Christians from the synagogues progressively between 85 and 90 CE. The merging of the Savior-God of Paul's thinking and the historical Jesus of the Jerusalem community was gradually but very firmly severing the birth cord of Christianity from its parent Judaism. It was either allowing it or forcing it, dependent on the viewpoint taken, to move out unhindered into the Hellenistic-Roman world as a universalistic Savior-God cult.

Even though they had been expelled from the synagogues and even though by that time there was a considerable body of letters and other literature circulating from hand to hand throughout the church, the Christians continued to 'recognize' only the Hebrew scriptures for some time. The new documents were given no higher status than teaching aids. The Apostles had found the Hebrew scriptures to be in harmony with Christ's life and ministry, with the Gospel message and with the influence of the Holy Spirit in the young church and these were still the only documents which were considered to be divinely inspired. They gave the church guidance for worship, witness and day-to-day life, and the Apostles had seen no need to add specifically Christian writings. However, after the Christians had been expelled from the synagogues the gulf between them and the Judaists became wider, and the contamination of the Christian beliefs through syncretism, [the adoption of opposing or contradictory religious concepts, expressions, symbols or activities from pagan or other non-Christian religions to encourage people of those faiths to adopt Christianity and to join the church], led to ‘demarcation problems’ and the gradual identification of their religion as a separate faith. This in turn made it necessary for the Christians to be able to demonstrate that theirs was a different faith and, that being the case, they had to document the differences to distance themselves from Judaism. The Gospel of Mark (written some time between 64 and 75 CE), Paul’s letters (50–62), Matthew (80–85) and possibly the letters known as Hebrews, Peter 1, Timothy 1 and 2, and Titus were already in circulation at that time (many Bible commentators place that series of letters in the second century), but on their own they were hardly enough to designate a new faith. In that environment the stimulus for the preparation of additional versions of the Gospel and additional letters or other records was quite strong and such things began to circulate progressively. Best estimates are: Thessalonians 2, 75–90; the Gospel of John, 85–90; the Gospel of Luke, 85–95; Revelations, early 90s; Ephesians, before 95; Acts, 90–100; the letters of John, 1, 2, and 3, 100–117; James, 100–125; Peter 2, 125–150; and Jude, probably early 2nd century also.

But with developments in Rabbinical Judaism following the destruction of Jerusalem other distinctions were becoming clear also. There was much debate among Jews about the relationship between faith and action, or study and performance (as there was also in the church at that time). We are told that the Rabbis favoured study because of their firm and unquestioning conviction that the divine word was an eternally valid guide to action and only study to gain “right knowledge” could lead to “right action.” Study tended to become a sort of sacramental activity to the Jew who saw in Torah the revealed word and logos of God.³² But the term ‘logos’ does not occur in the Torah, and that brings us to the concurrent developments in religious and philosophical thinking in other parts of the empire. The introduction of the concept ‘logos’ into Judaism and the limited use of the term resulted from the writing of a Greek-speaking Jewish philosopher, Philo Judaeus, at the time of Jesus’ ministry, but certainly without reference to Jesus.

PHILO AND THE LOGOS

Philo and Jesus were direct contemporaries in the neighbouring countries of Egypt and Judah. Philo was born in the Egyptian capital and chief centre of Hellenistic culture, Alexandria, about 20 BCE and died about 50 CE. Jesus is thought to have been born between 8 and 4 BCE and to have been crucified between 29 and 33 CE.³³ A prolific author, Philo was a member of an influential and wealthy priestly Jewish family in Alexandria. His brother, a high official in the Roman administration in Egypt, donated gold and silver plating for the doors of the Temple in Jerusalem. The family's contacts with the imperial court were such that Philo was able to lead a deputation to Emperor Caligula in Rome in 40 CE to plead that he rescind his edict requiring that people worship his statues as a deity. Riots against Jews had occurred in Alexandria as a result of their refusal to obey the edict. But Philo was not concerned only with protection for his community. He had an evangelical streak and he was concerned for the spread of his faith. To achieve this he sought to reconcile or to synthesize Yahwism and Platonism. He has been described as the first thinker to try to synthesize the doctrines of a faith based on supernatural revelation with the results of philosophical thinking.

Philo took as his starting point the book of Proverbs and the book of the Wisdom of Solomon. The key chapters of Proverbs in this respect, chapters eight and nine, were apparently written in the fourth century BCE and under the influence of Hellenistic philosophy introduced as Alexander the Great stormed through the Persian Empire and established the city of Alexandria.³⁴ The thrust of those chapters is that Wisdom was created by God and existed at the time of physical creation of the universe and that everything in creation is therefore logical and expressed lucidly. The Wisdom of Solomon is thought to have been written in Alexandria, probably about 50 BCE or only thirty years before Philo was born. The writer is said to have been attempting 'rapprochement' between Judaism and Greek culture and in doing so he extended the idea of Wisdom as a pre-existing concept to that of a metaphysical presence or "God's agent in creation and the continuing bond between him and his universe."³⁵

In pursuing that theme even further Philo combined the concepts of God as transcendent Being and a personal God, close to man, and he used the Greek term 'logos', (word or reason), when he described a divine and immanent mediator embracing God's Word, Wisdom, and plan or purpose for the universe. This immanent mediator was God's manifestation in the world.³⁶ ³⁷ The term logos in Greek then took on an expanded meaning encompassing the idea of a rational cosmic order and implying some sort of reasoned control. Philo wrote two versions of his somewhat mystical works which included commentaries on the Bible. One version was to show Greek pagans the superiority of the Jewish Bible as both revealing God's will and containing philosophical truths. The other was to show Jews how Platonism harmonized with Scripture. He can therefore be regarded as the first of a new era of syncretists – or perhaps the second if the Wisdom of Solomon is regarded as syncretic rather than a development in Hebrew thought.

It is important to note that although the Wisdom of Solomon was accepted by an unknown proportion of Jews in Alexandria it was not recognized by the Rabbinical authorities and it is not included in the Hebrew canon. However when Christianity began to attract a following in Alexandria the early church leaders found it to their advantage to regard the Wisdom of Solomon as a part of the Septuagint – the Greek translations of Hebrew scriptures which were then in circulation in the district. It was given prominence by Origen, Ignatius and Clement and as a consequence it was included in the Christian canon of Old Testament books. Subsequently it was rejected by the key Reformers, but the Council of Trent retained it for use in the Catholic Church as one of the books of the Apocrypha.

Similarly Philo's works were rejected by the Rabbis and soon forgotten in Jewish circles where syncretism was not acceptable. Even his name was not known among Jewish scholars until it was rediscovered in the sixteenth century. But Philo's allegorical interpretations of scripture had a big impact in the Greek speaking world where the missions of the Christians Apostles were just about to begin and, notably, on many of those who would soon become Christian theologians in spite of what appears to have been a bid by Paul to reject them.³⁸ In his commentary on Wisdom of Solomon, Robert Dentan notes that Philo and the Alexandrian Christian fathers followed in the footsteps of the writer of Wisdom, that it is important as a monument in the general history of apologetics and theology, and that it is also important for at least three doctrines which became fundamental to much of later Jewish and Christian thought. These are: the natural immortality of the soul in contrast to the idea of the resurrection of the body; death and all other evils as the work of the devil; and metaphysical wisdom being God's agent in creation and a continuing bond between God and the universe. In shorthand? 'Logos.' Dentan concludes: "The consequences of these developments for New Testament Christology can hardly be exaggerated."³⁹

THE ENIGMA OF PAUL

Paul, still using the name Saul, was in Tarsus for some time between 38 and 40 CE before he and Barnabas began working together in the adjacent region of Antioch in Syria and just as Philo was pleading with Caligula to drop his demands for personal worship. The major missionary journeys of Paul, his colleagues and Peter began in 46 CE and continued to 65 CE. The 'Seven Churches of Asia' which they helped to found in Macedonia and Galatia (Greece and Turkey) were still finding their feet at the time that Paul wrote his various letters but they were well established by the mid 90s, even though they were still struggling with their theology as the letters to the young churches indicate.⁴⁰ It therefore becomes apparent that the Christian missionaries were competing with groups which had come under the influence of Philo's writings. Paul's Letter to the Galatians, written in the late 50s, in which he condemned certain teachings which were influencing the members of 'his' churches – without identifying either the teachings or their perpetrators – tends to confirm that there had been significant Greek acceptance of Philo's version of Hellenized Judaism. He set out to counter it in very definite terms.

I am astonished at the promptness with which you have turned away from the one who called you and have decided to follow a different version of the Good News. Not that there can be more than one Good News; it is merely that some troublemakers among you want to change the Good News of Christ; and let me warn you that if anyone preaches a version of the Good News different from the one we have already preached to you, whether it be ourselves or an angel from heaven, he is to be condemned.
Galatians 1:6–8 [Jerusalem]

Christian scholars have either been at a loss to explain – or have been reluctant to explain – the situation which Paul describes and his outburst without there being any evidence in his letter of the names or origin of the person or persons who introduced the “new version of the Good News” to members of the church whom he referred to as “some troublemakers among you”. It has generally been assumed that Paul was referring to adherents of the Jerusalem group with whom he had previously been in conflict over the strategy for missionary work among Jews and Gentiles and that they were simply pressing their case again.^{41 42} There were, as already noted, two aspects to that dispute. The one which the church of later periods has preferred to see emphasis placed on is whether the Good News could only be received within the framework of conversion to Judaism and adherence to Law and circumcision. The other was really the more important: conflicting views of the role and person of Jesus. Paul’s view, influenced by his visionary experience and his exposure to Gnosticism, was that Jesus was the messianic Saviour-God through whom the demonic powers had been conquered and the messianic era inaugurated. In the communities of Gentile Christians which he established the observance of the ‘Supper of the Lord’ was given importance as a regular ‘showing-forth of the death of the Lord’ until his imminent return (Parousia) when his glory and authority would be fully displayed. In contrast, the Jerusalem group of disciples emphasized the person of the historical Jesus, Prophet of God to the Jewish people, and it saw its role as a “challenging and revitalizing sect within Judaism, recalling Jews to a true and proper allegiance to God.”⁴³ It is generally thought that that set of disputes had been settled more or less amicably (although that, too, is disputed) and it is not likely that if it had been raised again it would have brought accusations of preaching a different version of the Good News and the condemnation and vitriol which Paul addressed to the Galatians.

It is therefore reasonable to assume that Paul’s attack was against the writings of Philo. We can assume that Philo was aware of the controversy in Judaea and Samaria over the teachings and ministry of Jesus and the establishment of the sect which had grown around him following his crucifixion, especially in view of his brother’s involvement with the Temple authorities in Jerusalem. However the term ‘Christian’ was not in use in Rome at the time of his visit in 40 CE and while it is not known how many sect members there were in the city their presence, mainly among the lower classes, would not have been sufficient for Philo to be influenced by them. Certainly their numbers and influence as a distraction had grown by 65 CE to the point that Nero could use them as a scapegoat for the burning of Rome, but by then Philo had been dead for fifteen years. Similarly, the major missionary journeys to Galatia, Macedonia and Italy were not made until after Philo’s death, neither was Mark’s supposed visit to Alexandria, and none of the known Christian documents were in circulation to have influenced him either. It is therefore most unlikely that he took the Christian sect into account in his writing and that his only interest was in taking his version of Yahwism to the Greek speaking world.

It is quite possible that at the time that he was confronted by Philo’s influence Paul knew nothing about the author, his background or his writings, and this would account for the nature of his response. He survived for about eight to ten years after writing to the church in Galatia but for much of that time he was in Judaea facing trial or in Rome in prison. He did not deviate from the fundamentals of his faith during those years and we can assume that he also maintained his strong stand against Philo's Hellenized Judaism. Certainly we know little about the interface between the church and those who had been influenced by Philo or his supporters at the time that Paul was writing or during the twenty to thirty years after his death, and there is another possible explanation for his outburst: the further encroachment of Gnosticism.

A common view of commentators is that Gnostics immediately saw in Christianity – especially as preached by Paul – an excellent system of Gnosticism. Christ, who had conquered sin and death and was able to guarantee a person's entry into 'the life of the ages', represented their pivotal Saviour-figure. In addition Paul's teaching on strict asceticism, the need to crucify the evil of the flesh, and his emphasis on celibacy complemented Gnostic beliefs. However there are serious 'Chicken and the egg' type questions which are difficult to answer. Which came first: the influence of Gnosticism on Paul and on the people to whom he was writing, or Paul's Christology with similar emphases to be picked up by the Gnostics?

It has been suggested that after Paul's death over-zealous apologists promoted his views in order to make the Christian faith relevant to the greatest number of people and in doing so fostered syncretism and the "Christian" form of Gnosticism.⁴⁴ This became the subject of much heresy hunting during the early years of the second century CE – in fact within a few years of the circulation of the Acts of the Apostles and John's Gospel. Thus it is unlikely that "Christianized Gnosticism" would have been the target of Paul's wrath and therefore, on balance, it is most probable that his outburst in his Letter to the Galatians was triggered by the influence of Philo's writings. However in either case there would have been enormous temptation and pressure for the leaders of the local churches to adopt the same technique and the same terminology as Philo in seeking to convert those people who had been influenced either by his writings or by Gnosticism, and those who had held to their existing pagan beliefs as well.

According to the Gospel writers Jesus foretold the destruction of the City of Jerusalem and the slaughter of its population.⁴⁵ Some writers dispute the validity of such claims and suggest that as the destruction of the city in 70 CE was an accomplished fact at the time that the Gospels were written it would have been very tempting for the writers to credit Jesus with the prophecy. They say that even if Mark's Gospel had been written before the destruction of the city (scholars date it between 64 and 75 CE) the circumstances at the time and the relations between the Jews and the Romans would have clearly indicated an impending destructive conflict.^{46 47} But however attractive this reasoning may be, the case that the Gospel writers concocted Jesus' prediction is not proven. Far worse was yet to come, including the final and absolute expulsion of the Jews from Jerusalem in 135 CE. That was, on the best probability, about thirty-five years after the Gospels and the Book of Revelation had been completed and without that final expulsion the present situation could not have developed. The words attributed to Jesus in the final verses of Matthew 23 sound loud and clear in the present many-sided confrontation.

"So let it be! Your house will be left to you desolate, for, I promise, you shall not see me any more until you say: Blessings on him who comes in the name of the Lord!"⁴⁸

THE INFANT CHURCH LOOKS TO ROME

So the turbulent years swirled on. After the destruction of Jerusalem in 70 CE there was virtually no Christian community in Jerusalem anymore from which Christians could seek guidance and support so, after their expulsion from the synagogues they were naturally encouraged to turn towards the capital of the empire for guidance in the faith in spite of its turmoil and systematic persecution. As we have noted, they wrote, read, circulated, amended and began to venerate epistles and Gospels. At the same time Rabbi Jochanon ben Zakkai established the Sanhedrin at Jabneh and pressed on with preparation of the Palestine Talmud. The Arch of Titus was built in Rome to mark his 'magnificent' victory at Jerusalem, but the reaction among the subject peoples across the empire was not to laud and honor the victor. The memory of four years of bloody struggle on an unprecedented scale was too vivid. They set out to make life difficult for the Roman overlords, especially in regions where there were significant populations of Judaists such as Egypt, Cyprus, Antioch and Cyrene.

Gnosticism spread too. Historians are divided over the reasons for this but it is clear that irrespective of what triggered it an important factor in its spread was the division between the two streams of Christianity, the fusion and confusion already noted and Christian attempts to accommodate it. Action led to reaction. Some Christian leaders urged that a hierarchy with formal structures and formalized worship be established as a defence against Gnosticism and the possibility of large scale reversion to pagan practices among those who had turned to Christianity. Other leaders put more emphasis on the written word. Veneration gave way to sanctification. Then these movements also combined so that Christianity was well on the way to that preoccupation with Holy Scripture and institutionalism which led eventually to declarations of inerrancy and infallibility. It also provided a basis for the canonization of the many doctrinal statements, rites, liturgies and other religious absolutes which have inhibited Christian thinking, interpretation and initiative ever since. Worse still, they put a series of intermediaries and barriers between man and God.

At the time of the fall of Jerusalem there were effective communities of Christians meeting together in many centres other than Rome. They included Antioch, Caesarea, Alexandria, Corinth, Ephesus and Philippi. Both Antioch and Alexandria grew into major centres of Christian activity and it is clear that Rome need not necessarily have become the dominant point in the young church's affairs.⁴⁹ Politics and other people were responsible for the growing communities of Christians turning towards Rome and this was only partly because Peter and Paul were associated with it. Peter and Paul may have organized the church in Rome. They certainly were not its founders.

The impact of Nero's persecutions, coupled with the fact that all trade and communications led to the capital, guaranteed Rome an important role but it certainly need not have been paramount. It seems that Ignatius, Bishop of Antioch, did more than anyone else to develop and enhance the role of Rome. For a long time his letters had similar status and commanded much the same reverence as those of the apostles and Augustine. Ignatius urged Christian communities to be loyal to the leadership of their local pastors or bishops, to acknowledge their authority and, in this way, to hold together against the threat of heresy and disintegration.⁵⁰ From the scattered Christian communities he singled out the church in Rome as having special authority because of its association with one of the foremost of the Apostles, Peter. He said that it should be regarded as the guardian of the true faith. His attitude is somewhat hard to follow in view of the fact that Antioch, of which he himself was bishop, was second only to Jerusalem as the home of Christianity at the time of the fall of Jerusalem and it took precedence over Rome which was the third great centre of the Christian world.⁵¹

The martyrdom in Rome of Ignatius himself, variously put at about 107, 110 or 115 CE by different authorities, roughly coincided with the second of the series of anti-Roman uprisings in Jerusalem. This resulted in another three years of bitter war from 113 CE to 115 CE with the Jewish patriots having to capitulate because of lack of arms and men. But Judaists in other provinces revolted to keep the struggle alive for a couple more years. According to Eusebius the Jews turned against the Romans in Cyrenaica (North Africa) as though carried by some wild and riotous spirit. In Mesopotamia they expelled the Romans from some cities but these were soon reconquered, while on Cyprus they massacred the ruling Greeks but were soon defeated by the Romans and 40,000 were expelled from the island.⁵²

The immediate significance of that upheaval from the point of view of the development of the Christian church was that it effectively prevented any move to counter the influence and recognition of the community at Rome by giving a similar role of moral and administrative leadership to the remnant Christian community at Jerusalem for which there was otherwise indisputable reasoning. The encouragement of Christian dependence on Rome by leaders in the Eastern Empire at this early stage was mirrored somewhat later in the Western Empire by people like Irenaeus, a bishop of Lyons.

At the same time the distinctions between 'clergy' and 'laity' were being gradually defined and entrenched. Ignatius taught that the Eucharist which was at first seen as the simple personal act of breaking bread and sharing a common cup at the beginning of a meal in remembrance of Jesus could not be carried out 'apart from the bishop'.⁵³ As with a number of other practices, the simple and natural was already being concealed behind a cloak of mystique. It was being 'elevated' to the super natural and complicated. Participation in the ritual of worship was being substituted for a response centred on worship and based on the teachings of Jesus.

While all this was going on in the areas of early Christian missionary activity, back in Palestine the Sanhedrin which had been established by Rabbi Jochanan ben Zakkai at Jabneh had consolidated its position. It was carrying out the combined functions of education, legislation, judicature and government within the Jewish community along the lines of the Supreme Council of two or three hundred years before.⁵⁴ For some time the thinking of the Pharisees had been moving towards a theology of individualism and universality without the restrictions of national or territorial unity. Now, as the first century of the Christian era gave way to the second, being the only sect to survive the destruction of Jerusalem, they were able to rebuild the spiritual life of the Jewish people unimpeded by the ideas of such sects as the Sadducees, Zealots and Essenes whose spiritual influence had been swept away. The faith of Judaism had been well and truly spread beyond Palestine. This was not only by the slow process of trade and proselytizing but also by the rapid and dynamic process of scattering Jewish people across the nations as if they were crumbs shaken from a table cloth. It was indeed a very appropriate time for Jewish spiritual life to be given a new base.

The God of the Pharisees was not limited to Palestine. His benign providence extended over all the earth; nor was He the God of the nation alone. He was also the God of every individual. This indeed held a comforting assurance that, in spite of the national disaster, God still ruled. He was still the master of events, and He would, in the end, shape all things for the ultimate good of the nation, the individual and the race. Moreover, in Judaism, as the Pharisees conceived it, the loss of political autonomy and the destruction of the Temple broke no essential links. They had developed the institution of the Synagogue with its elaborate liturgy, which could take the place of the Temple for prayer and worship. Furthermore, the conception of the oral Law enabled them to reconcile development and change with loyalty to tradition, and to undertake the far-reaching adjustments in Jewish life which the new conditions demanded.⁵⁵

The divine services and liturgy were recast and re-adapted by the substitution of prayers for animal sacrifices and the insertion of supplications for the speedy restoration of the Temple and the ancient Hebrew polity.⁵⁶

Further south, crucial things were beginning to happen in Jordan and the Arabian Peninsula. While the Roman empire was expanding under Trajan to its greatest area, about 105 CE, a Roman province was established in the northern Arabian region of Northern Nabatea. This provided the stimulus for both Jewish and Christian contact with the area, for trade and for migration. These were not restricted to that northern region but extended into and influenced the west coast of the Arabian Peninsula right to the Yemen in the south. Of course it also introduced, concurrently, the conflicting views about God of Judaism and Christianity which were inevitably compounded as time passed.

HADRIAN AND ROME'S TURNING POINT. SCATTER!

So: without being conscious of it, we have come to the turning point in the fortunes of the Roman Empire – that second Jewish rebellion of 113 CE. It coincided with Trajan's war with the Parthians who were pressing hard for Armenia and Mesopotamia. Trajan was forced to divide both his army and his attention and he deferred his retaliatory campaign against the Parthians who had shown such audacity as to invade Roman territory! As with the previous Jewish rebellion, the war at Jerusalem dragged on, but it was somewhat less destructive. It finished after three years of exhausting defence with the Jewish surrender already mentioned.

When Hadrian succeeded to the throne of Imperial Rome he recognized the importance of the second such rebellion in less than fifty years and determined to woo the Jews with friendship. In 117 CE he agreed to the rebuilding of the Temple in Jerusalem. But much damage had been done to the standing of Rome in the eyes of its subject people. After all, if the tiny Jewish state had come close to throwing off the imperial might of Rome twice in less than a lifetime why shouldn't bigger countries succeed? The rumblings increased and the boundaries of the empire began to contract.

Lulled by the quietness across Palestine, Hadrian changed his mind on the Temple and decreed that it be dedicated to the pagan god Capitoline Jupiter. His expectation was that religious uniformity would then exist across the empire with less competitive encouragement to rebellion. He declared Jerusalem a Roman city. It was a classic error of judgement. The proud Jewish people still yearned for a messiah to throw off the despised Roman yoke. When the dynamic and colourful Simon bar Kochba (ben Cozeba) was declared to be that messiah by a key spiritual leader, Rabbi Akiba, the country was galvanized into action.

The ultimate revolt erupted in 132 CE with bar Kochba at its head. The Romans were caught off balance. The Jews showed unexpected determination in winning battle after battle and Hadrian called his most eminent general, Julius Severus, from Britain to crush the revolt. With 35,000 crack troops, (about half the number despatched to Jerusalem to put down the revolt at the half way mark in 66 CE), Severus was supposed to put down the rebellion at one swift stroke. But the Romans hadn't bargained for the all-or-nothing determination of the Jews in revolt. Simon bar Kochba's numerically inferior forces dealt Severus an ignominious defeat in open battle. Severus resorted to the tactic of total warfare against the population, slaughtered villagers systematically and wrecked and burned everything which his own army could not use. This war had to be won.

Even the idea of an independent Jewish community in the middle of the Roman Empire – independent because of its religious beliefs – was a threat to the stability of the empire. If it became a fact then the fabric of empire could not be held together. This was not to be the only time that such a sentiment determined a government's policy or rocked the foundations of empire.

After two years of grinding, ruthless, merciless butchery, the Jewish lines wavered as the populace was reduced to near vanishing point.⁵⁷ Bar Kochba was killed in battle. His memory is preserved for posterity in the Talmud with the words attributed to him: "Lord, don't help us and don't spoil it for us." Hardly the words of a messiah. The Sanhedrin of the day apparently agreed, but Rabbi Akiba's prestige had been immense. A sense of national purpose and destiny had been developed and fostered through forty or so turbulent generations. It coupled with the intense messianic anticipation which had not been quenched by the low-key ministry of Jesus of Nazareth and which had therefore been maintained, bottled up, over four generations to ensure an irrational response which carried with it an inevitable conclusion. When Jerusalem finally surrendered those who could escape fled to the surrounding hills and made their way gradually to neighbouring countries. Some are said to have gone as far as Parthia where they were welcomed with open arms and Judaism was introduced to yet another people. Those who failed to escape were sold into slavery, forcibly expelled or butchered.

The Roman armed might had been badly shaken. Rome was determined that this third and most costly war over Jerusalem would be the last. Never again would the Jews rise up against Rome. They were forbidden to return to the city except to weep by the wall on the anniversary of the destruction of the Temple. Everything associated with Judaism within it was destroyed and it was renamed Aelia Capitolina. The work of religious and social reconstruction which had been progressing quite well under the leadership of the Jabneh Sanhedrin was swept away. It was apparent to Hadrian that it was the Torah which had provided the inspiration for the successive revolts so he suppressed the Sanhedrin, closed the Yeshiva at Jabneh and, by edict, banned the study of the Torah on pain of death. So many martyrdoms followed that a council of Sages meeting at Lydda decreed that "... a Jew, in order to save his life, might violate any of the commandments of the Torah except those which forbid idolatry, murder, and incest (including adultery)."

This decree was destined to become the fundamental guiding principle of Jewish life in all the centuries that followed.⁵⁸ Rabbi Akiba was among those who publicly repudiated the edict and was executed with refined torture. But the suppression of the Sanhedrin and the closure of the Jabneh Yeshiva did not achieve Hadrian's aim. In fact it deepened the resolve of the Rabbis to preserve their faith and practices and work on the preparation of the Talmud was stepped up. [See chapter 2.]

The Jewish Christians who made up the remnant church in Jerusalem suffered because of Hadrian's edict banning the Torah in a manner somewhat different to the Judaists. They had held to the Torah while preaching Jesus the Messiah but they then renounced their remaining links with Judaism, discontinued Jewish religious practices and stopped using the Torah. They cut themselves adrift from their own people and joined the mass of pagans who had been attracted to Christianity under the influence of Paul in the intervening period.⁵⁹ At that point the idea of a theocratic Jewish state either with or without a territory would have lost any relevance or appeal to them. Their concept of the universal nature and love of God was somewhat different to even the new Pharisaic ideas which had been evolving at Jabneh.

A series of circumstances, people and political and religious decisions had finally combined so that Jewish people were scattered in countries throughout and beyond the Roman Empire without a state, country or government but united through their knowledge of the Torah and by their allegiance to that one and only God of all people with whom they might come in contact. They were separated from those people however by the contradiction of having a distinctive national literature, national religion and national culture. These things would not only preserve their national consciousness and ensure their survival as a distinct people but would also draw into their religious community occasional populations of converts who would assume the same national heritage without having any hereditary continuity with it.

These factors were a guarantee that despite the best of human intentions there would henceforward be conflicts of interest for a Jew to reconcile which non-Jews would not have to face. These personal tensions, uncertainty and a communal self consciousness would discourage assimilation. They could be held in check or suppressed under most circumstances but under extreme provocation would, as a very natural response, result in communal action and reaction. Even given extreme provocation no communal action has ever been taken lightly because the Jewish people remain intensely conscious of history, their role and the attitudes of people of different faiths towards them. The ultimate communal reaction has been to press for a national homeland but the rough road to the ghetto was to the forerunner of an even rougher road back to claim again the promised land.

At the end of the first hundred years of Christian activity Jerusalem had been almost wiped off the map and Christianity and Judaism – both deprived of their place of origin, having the same basic role and starting with the same basic objectives – were setting off in completely different directions. The association of those twin streams of Yahwism – Christianity and Judaism – as separate religions in the Diaspora was bound to be long. As we now know it was going to be a bitter association for the Jewish people whether they were being harassed or protected by the Christian community. Hadrian, by forbidding the Jews to return to Jerusalem and by enforcing their dispersion throughout his empire may have eased the political and military problems of the time. However, in doing so, he ensured that Judaism would be a major factor in complex military, political and economic confrontations in a future which was beyond his comprehension but which he had helped to chart.

Different bearings but collision courses.

CHAPTER 2

AN INSTRUMENT OF STATE: FROM PERSECUTION TO POWER

Pagan Rome in the last few years of Hadrian's reign must have seen religious confusion indeed. All religious sects other than those of the state religion were despised and suspected. If they challenged the divinity of Caesar they were regarded as absolutely subversive. That being the case, it is no wonder that the two groups of subjects from the most troublesome territory in the empire, the Jews and the Christians, were both subjected to persecution when they disputed between themselves the basis of their belief in one universal God, especially when they were equally dogmatic about the correctness of their particular stand. To make matters worse, one was a breakaway from the other which had risen in such violent rebellion three times within a single life span that its former capital was still in ruins. Much of its population had been slaughtered and many of its survivors were either in exile or enslaved in Rome. Given the circumstances, should we be surprised that they provided a moderate supply of fodder for the lions? And when each blamed the other, at least in part, for its sorry circumstances and the persecution which it was suffering we can hardly expect that they would have been very friendly towards each other. At best their relationship would have been arms-length tolerance.

Unfortunately there seems to be very little accurate information available about the affairs of the Christian community in Rome in the second and third centuries CE. However it appears to have been quite revolutionary. Quite apart from the refusal of its adherents to offer devotions to the emperor it appears to have taken a stand against some of the more base aspects of Roman life such as the gladiatorial shows. However there were some apparent contradictions in its attitudes. It had softened its attitude towards slavery, hardened its attitude towards women and accepted wealthy adherents without insisting on the sharing of assets which had been a characteristic of the apostolic period in Jerusalem. The influence of Paul's teaching has often been given as the reason. As H. G. Wells explains it; "Unarmed, but possessing enormous powers of passive resistance, Christianity thus appeared at the outset plainly as rebellious, striking at the political if not at the economic essentials of the imperial system."¹ The difficulty for the rulers of Rome in deciding just how to handle "the strange problem presented by this infectious rebellion of otherwise harmless people" is illustrated by Emperor Trajan's instruction in response to a question from Governor Pliny of Bithynia in 112 CE, just before the ultimate

Jewish rebellion in Jerusalem. It set a pattern of discretionary leniency for Roman magistrates in dealing with Christians which applied for some years. They were not to search out Christians but to punish them if they were publicly denounced and refused to do homage to the Roman Gods.²

However, whatever the reasons may have been, Hadrian's successors appear to have been somewhat more lenient towards Jews than towards Christians. Perhaps it was the influence of the decree of the Council of Sages at Lydda.³ Perhaps it was simply that the surviving Jews in the Diaspora saw little point in rebellion when it was not in the context of expelling a foreign power from Jerusalem. Certainly it was not because the Jews lacked the rudiments of organization or a spirit of community. Whenever ten or more Jews over 13 years of age lived within commuting distance their own laws required them to establish a "religious community". When their numbers reached 120 they were authorized to establish a "social community" with a court to adjudicate those disputes among themselves which were not subject to the civil laws of the empire.⁴ They were obliged to tax themselves and to establish schools. On the other hand it could have been, perhaps, a deliberate effort on the part of the Roman authorities to demonstrate to other subject peoples and ethnic groups – which the Christian community certainly was not – that obedience would be rewarded with tolerance. The fourth law of the Jabneh Sanhedrin declared that Jews must fight in the defence of the country in which they lived, even if it meant fighting against fellow Jews in another country during a time of war. In spite of that law there must have been many Jews who were experiencing a conflict of interests. In any case the fact of a conflict of interests is established by the need which the Sanhedrin could see to introduce such a law. That particular law was intimately bound up with the decision, taken at the same time, that Jews should "abandon the idea of reconquering Palestine and of establishing another Jewish State there. Henceforth Palestine would be a spiritual homeland only."⁵

The imperial leniency could even have come from a sense of compassion, remorse, guilt or a combination of all three following the butchery in Jerusalem and the decimation of the population of the Jewish State during the three rebellions. If that were the case it could be compared with the response of European Christianity after World War II. In any case, when Hadrian assumed the imperial throne, about ten per cent or more of the population of the Roman Empire were Jewish by faith. Every government, ancient or modern, which has tried to suppress and systematically persecute a proportion of its population as high as one in ten has sailed into stormy seas. Of the seven million people who professed the Jewish faith out of a total population of about seventy million, it has been estimated that only about four million were Jewish by direct tribal descent and the other three million were converted pagans or descendants of converted pagans.⁶ It is reasonable to assume that the rate of conversion from paganism to Judaism would have been much greater if it were not for the rigorous dietary laws adhered to by "the people of the book" and the Jewish insistence on circumcision.

A CHANGE OF HEART

One of the first decisions taken by Antonius Pius when he became emperor on the death of Hadrian in 138 CE, only three years after the crushing of the bar Kochba rebellion, was that many of Hadrian's repressive edicts against the Jews both in Palestine and in Rome should be reversed. Pharisaic activity sprung up everywhere, but notably in Galilee. A new Sanhedrin was established at Usha, religious life was reorganized and schools were re-opened. The new Sanhedrin was soon able to exercise control and a unifying authority over the Jewish communities both within and beyond Palestine.⁷ This suggests a remarkable change of heart on the part of the Romans. It was from that new base in Galilee that Rabbi Judah compiled the early Mishna. This instrument of laws and traditions was to be a substitute for the authority of that central academy on which the scattered Jewish communities could rely in the event of a further change of heart and the suppression of the new Sanhedrin.

It was about this time that the decision to cease active proselytizing was taken. At first glance the reasoning behind that decision seems a little peculiar. However on reflection it becomes clear that it was complementary to other laws and decisions of the same period and that it had dramatic consequences as the centuries ticked by. The reasoning went that as Jewish leaders had to rely on moral and personal authority to gain adherence to their decrees, (having no political structure or power to enforce them), it was possible that too many new converts might weaken the will of the whole community to survive as Judaists in future generations. To ensure adherence to the Jewish law and a vigorous esprit de corps conversion was made conditional on pagan or Christian converts having made an approach to the Jewish community for permission to join its religion and having been subjected to active dissuasion to test their sincerity. The same reasoning, coupled with a firm resolve to prevent a fall in numbers by counter-conversion to other faiths, caused the Jewish authorities to introduce a ban on intermarriage and severe penalties for both infanticide and celibacy!⁸

At the same time that this vigorous recovery in Jewish academic and cultural activity was being stimulated by the Sanhedrin in Palestine, the fledgling Christian church was struggling with serious problems of belief and organization. Christian Gnosticism was spreading and although it may have been the result of either deliberate or inadvertent merging of Paul's teaching with the existing forms of Gnosticism it was seen by the dominant leadership as a threat to the Pauline approach which had become the 'standard' for Christianity. As already noted, that acceptance of Pauline teaching had not been spontaneous but had come about because the Jerusalem leadership had been submerged by the political and social circumstances of the period. In any case the distinction between what was Paul's teaching and what was an overlay of Philo's philosophy, Eastern Gnosticism or good old fashioned paganism had become very blurred. Some Christians had certainly been actively encouraging Gnostic syncretism, [the adoption of opposing or contradictory religious concepts, expressions, symbols or activities from pagan or other non-Christian religions to encourage people of those faiths to adopt Christianity and to join the church], in order to modify the dominant teaching about the nature of the person Jesus. Others simply reacted to the confusing mix of doctrines which were being espoused within the Christian communities. As the confusion increased the church became more authoritarian and doctrinaire in an effort to channel belief into a consistent and acceptable pattern. Its councils were attended only by those who had been appointed bishops whereas in the apostolic period responsibility had been shared by the leaders and the led.⁹ The power game had started.

By that time there was a considerable body of letters and other literature circulating from hand to hand throughout the church, but these were still given no higher status than teaching aids. However when Marcion, a wealthy ship owner-convert from Sinope on the Black Sea arrived in Rome in 140 CE he sought to change all that. He had previously been expelled from his local church but he gained great influence in Rome as a result of making substantial donations, and insisted that the Hebrew scriptures should be rejected and replaced by a series of Paul's letters and Luke's Gospel, all edited in accord with his views and with all references to Hebrew scriptures deleted. He apparently rejected the other Gospels which had been in circulation for some forty or fifty years because their thrust was not in accord with his liking. He claimed, in a manner consistent with the Gnostic belief, that God-the-Creator of the Hebrew scriptures was a materialistic subordinate god, primarily a judge-like figure and not consistent with the God of love revealed by Jesus. He rejected any suggestion that Jesus, a unique being, was connected in any way with God of Hebrew understanding or Hebrew prophecy. He also claimed that Jesus did not die on the cross and that another person had been substituted for him. He was again expelled from the church four years later but his influence remained substantial and he was a serious challenge to the mainstream church because he organized his supporters into compact Marcionite communities throughout the empire.^{10 11 12}

As a result of Marcion's influence efforts to arrive at an agreed or 'orthodox Christian' position and to sort out what was acceptable and what was not acceptable among the whole body of new literature were then accelerated. The items selected were added to the recognized Hebrew canon – plus a group of Hellenistic-Hebrew books from Alexandria which were not recognized by the Sanhedrin – to produce a Christian canon. There is no doubt that the selection was biased by those making it to suit the theology which they favored. Eventually the process came to a climax with the adoption of the Muratorian Canon for the New Testament about 170 CE but dispute, additions and deletions continued for many years. Even today not all Christian churches use the same New Testament. The earliest and least contentious of the church's creeds, the Apostles' Creed, came into use about the same time. Its authorship is not known.

A STANDARD OF BELIEF ... AND SYNCRETISM

It was only a few years after this, about 180 CE, that Bishop Irenaeus, then at Lyons, wrote that the teaching and traditions of the Roman See were the standard for belief. "Rome was the special bearer of the historical Christian faith, and able to provide guidance and sound teaching in the conflict with Gnosticism" he said,¹³ and In Against the Heresies he wrote that purity of faith was most clearly guaranteed by the Roman Bishop as the successor of Peter in the community of Rome.¹⁴ Eventually, in 1870, the First Vatican Council drew on that same work as part of its justification for the primacy of Rome in the Catholic Church: “...because of its more powerful principality’, it was always ‘necessary for every church, that is, the faithful who are everywhere, to be in agreement’ with the Roman Church ...”¹⁵ Irenaeus spent much of his earlier life in the church in Asia Minor where he had conducted a travelling school and it is very probable that he had been influenced by his contact with Antioch and the writings of Ignatius who had already developed similar views.¹⁶ Irenaeus also had a big influence on the establishment of ordination procedures based on the assumption of an apostolic succession. It was largely because of his writings that “apostolic succession became the permanent ground from which the Catholic Church understood its own nature”.¹⁷ Quite apart from this he also had a very big influence on the development of the system of pastoral government which was adopted by Rome. The combination of clerical domination which had already been established and professional elitism which was a natural consequence of the procedure adopted for ordination, and the attitudes implicit in it, ensured a minimal role for the laity in the government of the church. It isolated those responsible for pastoral oversight. It also encouraged and contributed towards the atmosphere of mystique surrounding the religious observances of the church.

Many of these religious observances were introduced or developed during the later years of the second century CE. They were then progressively refined and have subsequently been accepted or retained, in spite of vigorous debate, on the basis of tradition, doctrine or dogmatic authority and the distinction between the three has become increasingly blurred. It was about this time that the “essential procedure for the rite of baptism, for the celebration of the Eucharist, [and] the correct attitudes to leaders and teachers” were set out in a systematic fashion.¹⁸ These things implied and required discipline and the authority to impose it. They were to be vested in the isolated ordained clergy, with each community headed by a bishop. These in turn implied a defined or restricted community with its membership determined and controlled according to systems laid down by those in authority. The acceptance of doctrines and creeds with participation in rites and liturgies automatically followed as a condition of membership. In his Letter to the Smyrnans Ignatius wrote:

“...all of you (are to) follow the bishop as Jesus Christ the Father, and the presbyterium as the apostles; the deacons, however, respect like God’s command! No one shall act regarding the church without the bishop. A celebration of the Eucharist is only authentic when it takes place under a bishop or one of his representatives. Where the bishop appears, there shall be the community, just as where Jesus Christ is, there is the Catholic Church.”¹⁹

But “community” also implies communal strength and cohesion to resist both disintegration and invasion by alien ideology. It therefore tends to involve growth of “institution” and to assume privileges even though these are not essential. In the case of the church it certainly did.

The rapid growth of the church and the development of its institutional framework around a priestly elite, conceived in a manner somewhat similar to its parent, Judaism, turned out to be both a strength and a weakness. It was a strength because the church could, if it chose, exert effective corporate influence for change within the wider community of which it was a part. It was a weakness because of the temptation to put the ordained elite between the rest of mankind and God. It was also a weakness because of the temptation to syncretise or adapt the practices and ideas of other religious groups with which it had to coexist within the wider community. The church succumbed to both temptations.

In fact the church not only devised the concept of priestly intercession but it also resorted to practices such as interdiction, (the exclusion of a person, a group or a community from the sacraments and other spiritual privileges), and excommunication to enforce its corporate will over its adherents and to tighten the mystical grip of the clergy over the laity. The seeds had been planted which were to grow during the following centuries into a massive tangled jungle of hocus pocus. This camouflaged the love of God and substituted fear of the unknown and an oppressive burden of religious practices and trimmings for a glimpse of salvation.

Syncretism didn't just happen. It was carried out in order to attract and convert people either in the numbers game or in the interests of self-preservation. The church picked up some practices from most of the major pagan religions with which it rubbed shoulders. From Mithraism it appears to have adopted Sunday as the regular day of worship instead of the Jewish Sabbath. The use of candles in worship and ceremonials and the use of the sacramental expression of being "washed in the blood of Christ" appear to have been borrowed from the same source. In the Alexandrian cult of Serapis-Isis-Horus it may have found a basis for its Trinitarian doctrine. The similarity between the pagan belief that Horus was at the same time the son of Serapis and identical with Serapis, and the gymnastic reasoning of the early Trinitarians to show that Jesus was both the Son of God and the same as God is intriguing. The idea of elevating Mary, Jesus' mother, to quasi-divine rank may have been taken from the identification of Mary with Isis, although some scholars point to the Hellenistic Sun Goddesses as the stimulus for the doctrine that Mary is Mother-of-God and the consequent practices of Marialis Cultus. It is quite probable that concern at the adoption of such practices by churches in North Africa and Asia Minor was the reason why Irenaeus had advised Christians to turn to Rome as the standard of belief. He may have assumed, or hoped, that such syncretism was not taking place in Rome or that it could be held at a level that was tolerable.

The travelling school that Irenaeus established in Asia Minor was only one of three schools of theology which were established at about the same time. The others were both in North Africa, at Alexandria and Carthage. It appears that as the second century of the Christian Era was drawing to a close the church in Rome was intent on establishing routine procedures for worship, for other religious observance and for church government while the church in the Eastern Mediterranean and North Africa was keenly examining and developing its theology. However the motives in both cases appear to have been the same. The church believed that it had to institutionalize in order to satisfy the orderly approach of the Roman mind, to compete with paganism and to justify the break away from Judaism. Not only to justify the break in fact but also to ensure a break because many Christians and pagans alike were still tending to follow some of the practices of Judaism and therefore to be drawn towards it.²⁰

A TOUCH OF TOLERANCE

For the Jews the early years of the third century CE saw further improvements in their lot under Rome. In 212 CE Emperor Caracalla granted them both citizenship and equality at law with other citizens. However this may not have had much to do with a sense of religious tolerance. It appears to have been so that all free inhabitants of the empire were liable to taxation and were not a burden on the state. The privileges of citizenship simply went with the obligations.²¹ For the Christians those years saw a shift in the emphasis in the struggle to satisfactorily explain the relationship between Jesus of Nazareth and God as Paul had preached it. The struggle to counter Gnosticism gradually gave way to debate about the Trinity and the doctrine of incarnation. The concept of God the Father, Son and Holy Spirit had been floundering. Writing about 248 CE, 45 years after the death of Irenaeus, Origen fought vigorously to counter Gnosticism. He attempted to reconcile several conflicting Christian notions. First: the notion of God as an indivisible Creator-God. Second: the notion that Jesus as a real person was also identical with God. Third: the notion of the literal truth of the inspired sacred writings which Christianity had carried forward, in parallel with Judaism, from pre-Messianic Yahwism.

In attributing literal truth to the entire Old Testament Origen went further than the teachings or traditions of the Jewish faith and provided the basis for later claims of Biblical inerrancy within the Christian Church. The implications of that were not generally apparent until after the publication of Darwin's "The origin of species" in 1859 but during the following eighty years they were demonstrated with appalling consequences in Africa and Europe and they are still unfolding today.

Origen coined the expression "the God-man Jesus Christ", with heavy overtones of the cult of Serapis-Isis-Horus. He had been one of the early theologians of the Alexandrian school but was deposed as head of that school in 231 CE and had then established another school at Caesarea. However the real fire didn't come into the debate about the Trinity until about another sixty years had passed, when two Alexandrians, Arius and Athanasius, became locked in bitter controversy. This was not resolved until after Constantine declared Christianity the official religion of the Empire and imposed a politician's solution. He convened councils of the church to reach a consensus. Or was it resolved? In fact, as we shall see, it was not.

In the meantime the level of persecution of Christians in the Roman Empire had risen or fallen partly at the personal whims of emperors and partly as a barometer of Christian anti-state activities. Imperial attitudes varied from indifference bordering on amusement, to mild irritation and to intense contempt for the extravagances of theological thought which some of the Christians indulged in. Immediately after the circulation of Origen's writings Emperor Decius (249–251 CE) called on the full resources of the state to force Christians to conform to the state religion. He issued a decree that every resident of the empire had to offer sacrifices to the gods to ward off an epidemic. Commissioners were appointed to supervise the sacrifices and to certify to those who complied and those who refused to comply. This meant that Christians were required to renounce their faith or die.

Persecution, torture and martyrdoms reached a new peak and sapped the numerical strength of the church. Bishop Fabian of Rome (these days referred to as Pope) was among the martyrs. But as the persecution subsided the church regained its confidence and its hold over its adherents. The firmness of that grip is illustrated by the fact that the practice of penance was already an established part of the church's disciplinary system. Many of those who had denied the faith, known as lapsi, sought readmission to the church at the end of the persecution in 251. Pope Cornelius had correspondence on the subject with Cyprian, the controversial bishop at Carthage, and ordered that lapsi were to be re-admitted after suitable penance.²² There followed a split in the church around the conflicting teachings of Cyprian and his opponents, Novatian in Rome and Novatus in Carthage. Competing bishops were consecrated on both sides of the Mediterranean. This split continued for sixty years or more until the breakaway groups were either suppressed or merged with another breakaway group known as the Donatists about 311.

It was during the period of persecution under Decius that Christianity was carried into Central Europe fortuitously and quite by coincidence. Cappadocians who had been captured by the Goths were forcibly transported north of the Danube. This movement continued for four or five years from about the time of the initial Goth crossing about 247, to 251 when Decius was killed in the great Goth victory. But the Cappadocians were Arians and Rome was to feel their influence in due course.

COMPETITION? OR A PARALLEL SEARCH FOR MEANING?

Back on the Eastern fringe of the empire there was also quite a bit of action during this period. The questions of religion, God and the Messiah were getting more and more mixed up. A revolution in Parthia in 226 CE resulted in the Persian Sassanids replacing the Arsacid dynasty and Ardashir I became the monarch. Rome found itself facing a much stronger opponent pressing hard for control of Mesopotamia and Armenia. When Ardashir I had established his authority over the Sassanid Empire he also tried to enforce national unity through religious uniformity. The religious activity and belief of Persia at the time was a mixture of three streams. First, in order of appearance, there was ancient paganism with a number of gods. Second, there was Judaism. Third, but dominant, was Zoroastrianism which Ardashir I promptly adopted as the state religion.

Judaism is presumed to have been introduced to Persia by the free movement of Jews which followed the Persian invasion and overthrow of Babylon about twenty generations before Jesus, (538 BC).²³ Some of the Jews who had been taken as captives from Jerusalem to Babylon only 49 years earlier, in 587 BC, were probably still alive at the time of that Persian invasion. Certainly their descendants were there in significant numbers. It is known that many of them chose to return from Babylon (Iraq) to Judea (Palestine) and that others stayed in Babylon. It is reasonable to assume that some also travelled to Persia and established the nucleus of Persian Judaism Zoroastrianism [see above, chapter 1] is based on the teachings of Zoroaster who lived between about 630 BC and 553 BC, midway through the period of the Babylonian Exile. He spent many years in contemplation in the desert regions of Persia before he began his mission as a teacher and a prophet, and the beginning of his prophetic activity corresponds roughly with the Jewish captivity. There is good circumstantial evidence to suggest that he came into contact with Judaism either directly or indirectly and was influenced by it. However the traffic in ideas was apparently a two-way affair because there is also evidence that his teachings had considerable impact on Jewish thought. When Persia overthrew the Babylonian Empire fifteen years after Zoroaster died, returning exiles took several aspects of Zoroastrian practice to Jerusalem and these were incorporated in new patterns of worship when the new Temple was completed. Zoroaster was vigorously monotheistic. He gave God the name Ahura Mazda. He taught of the existence of an evil spirit somewhat akin to Christian concepts of the devil; that man had to choose between good and evil; of life after death, with heaven immediately for the good but a period of punishment and purification for the wicked before their release to heaven. He also taught of the establishment of an ultimate kingdom of justice on earth. Zoroastrianism was carried forward with enthusiasm with each thrust of the empire and as a result it was well established in the eastern provinces of the Roman Empire in 260 CE. In that year Ardashir I's son and successor, Sapor, captured both Antioch and the emperor, Valerian, who had succeeded the slain Decius. The situation became very confused when Sapor, returning to Persia in triumph with his prize captive, was set upon and defeated by the Arab king of Palmyra, Odenathus, who thereby strengthened his hold on his small kingdom between the empires of Rome and Persia.

It was against that background that the new Roman Emperor, Gallienus, issued an Edict of Religious Toleration almost immediately, in 261 CE. That edict can therefore not be regarded as resulting only from confusion in the City of Rome itself. It was certainly aimed, at least in part, at reducing religious friction in all parts of the empire. However it does appear to have ended any general persecutions against Christians for about forty years. Gallienus also formally recognized the autonomy of the small kingdom of Palmyra five years later, in 266 CE.

How much of Zoroaster's teaching rubbed off onto Christianity directly is uncertain. There is, certainly, a remarkable similarity between Zoroaster's teaching on purification of the dead and the church's teaching on purgatory which was not codified until several centuries after Christ. In addition there was some indirect influx from the infusion of Zoroastrian ideas in Gnosticism which (as we shall see shortly) had a substantial impact on the young Greek-speaking churches. However Zoroastrianism seems to have become affected by syncretism in the same manner as Christianity. Subsequent Sassanid emperors reverted to the role of God-monarchs. The little kingdom of Palmyra was subjected to conflicting religious influences from every direction and from every variant of Judaism, Christianity and Zoroastrianism. Its brief autonomy was lost in 273 CE, only seven years after Gallienus had officially recognized it as an independent sovereign state, and Emperor Aurelian carried the widow of Odenathus, Zenobia, to Rome in chains. At the same time Manichaeism was having quite an influence on the eastern fringes of the empire. A man named Manes, born about 216 CE and called by his followers “the Apostle of Jesus Christ”, preached a religious belief in “dualism” or a world of good and evil forces. The material world was, he said, basically evil. It was the realm of Satan. All goodness was confined to the spiritual world which was God’s.²⁴ Jesus Christ was a central figure in Manes’ reasoning. He was wisdom personified. He enlightened men and led them to a true knowledge of themselves. He was engulfed by grace. He separated man from the error of the material world, he brought a mirror for man to see the universe and he showed that man’s soul is divine.²⁵

Manes appears to have been influenced by contemporary Zoroastrianism as well as by Christianity and Judaism. He does not appear to have claimed divine revelation although his followers attributed his teaching to it. He set up schools and trained missionaries to go in all directions. They made substantial inroads into both the Persian and the Eastern Roman Empire during Manes’ lifetime. Manes claimed to offer the ultimate wisdom which Zoroastrianism, Christianity and Buddhism did not. It was presumably his attitude towards Zoroastrianism that led to his execution by the Persian government in 276 CE.

About the same time, in what was then the Roman dominion of Armenia, there were also conflicting influences. Successive waves of Huns and Goths had moved down from the north and Persians had moved up from the south. Small numbers of Christians were persecuted from time to time, but somewhat haphazardly. Then their most famous evangelist, Gregory “the Illuminator”, strode onto the scene. He seems to have so impressed the king, Tiridates, by his resistance to persecution that Tiridates accepted baptism about 280 CE. The aristocracy followed suit and within a few years the whole population had adopted the new religion. Almost out of nowhere Rome, and the emperor, suddenly found that they had a massive population of Christians in the eastern provinces of the empire. Then the last and most intense period of persecution of Christians under Roman rule erupted in 303 CE under Emperor Diocletian. The trigger for this outburst is intriguing. At the time, the empire was showing increasing signs of breaking up. Diocletian abolished the last vestiges of republicanism and became emperor-absolute. He surrounded himself completely with the awe inspiring etiquette of an eastern monarch and demanded worship as the god-emperor. However the division of the Roman Empire into eastern and western empires was clearly imminent because one emperor, no matter how competent, could no longer command the entire borders. In the normal manner of politics he came under increasing criticism.

A CONFLICT OF INTEREST

The Christians had always been regarded as subversive and rebellious and it is possible that Diocletian reacted with a somewhat irrational backlash against them in an attempt to divert attention away from his other problems and thereby to prevent the division of the empire. On the other hand H. G. Wells suggests that these persecutions by Diocletian were “the crowning struggle of the old idea of the god-emperor against the already great and powerful organization that defied his divinity ...[and]...he was forced by the logic of his assumptions to attempt the complete eradication of a system that flatly denied [him].”²⁶ Wells’ view is very interesting considering that Diocletian had previously shown toleration towards the Christians and in view of claims that his wife and his daughter were both considered to be of the faith.

But there were also other much more practical reasons for his outburst than the God versus god-emperor conflict. As a sub-group within the community Christians had always been very divisive. For generations they had been openly flaunting their doctrines under the noses of the rest of the community. Part of the attraction of their religion had been their fantastic claims that when Christ returned all but themselves would be damned as evil and destroyed by fire. They seemed to take great delight in anticipating the destruction of “Eternal Rome”.²⁷ Now, as the third century since the life on earth of their Messiah was passing without his return, they seemed to be gaining a somewhat more stable outlook. The secret meetings and licentious conduct for which earlier generations of Christians had been noted – perhaps with some exaggeration on the part of their opponents – had given way to flamboyant displays of public ritual. The emphasis evolving in its public attitudes was towards the universalism of the church and its right to lay first claim on the allegiance of its followers. This emphasis certainly implied the debunking of imperial demands for recognition, homage and devotion as the sole means of unifying the empire. It also introduced the concept of ‘conflict of interest’ which the church has always been very ready to impute to Jews. The church’s confidence was growing, of course, as its numbers grew and as its doctrines attracted some of the wealthy and some of the educated administrators. It was still somewhat revolutionary, but instead of being a force for social revolution among the underdogs of the state it was becoming a threat to the structures of the state. The emperor was eventually persuaded by his colleagues that there had arisen a state-within-the-state.²⁸ The situation could no longer be tolerated.

Under his imperial edict of February 23, 303 CE, Diocletian ordered the destruction of all churches, the surrender and burning of all copies of the scriptures, and the banning of all Christian meetings. All Christian officials were dismissed and the Christian employees at the imperial court, the Caesariana, were demoted without consideration of rank and position. A little later, many of the court officials were cruelly tortured and executed under the accusation of arson in the imperial palace. The priests and deacons of the imperial residence, Nicodemia, were also executed together with their bishop Anthimus.

Two subsequent edicts extended the persecution to all clerics of the empire and ordered their immediate arrest, torture and execution. A fourth edict, in the spring of 304, contained a strict general order for sacrifice in the whole empire and carried the terror of persecution to the whole Christian population. This last edict had as its undeniable goal the complete extermination of Christianity. It was probably instigated by Galerius.²⁹

Diocletian abdicated in 305 CE and the division of authority within the empire proceeded. Efforts to eliminate Christianity were stepped up by Caesar Galerius who had become one of Diocletian’s successors. He controlled the eastern provinces but he directed that Christian churches in all provinces of the empire should be demolished to their foundations; that all other property of the church should be confiscated by the state and used or sold as it saw fit; that death should be the penalty for holding secret assemblies; that Christian freemen should be barred from receiving honors or holding public office; that Christian slaves should forfeit the right of release; that defence should be denied in legal actions and that all Christian literature should be burned. Quite clearly, the basic intention behind that edict against the Christians by Galerius was the same as the basic intention behind the actions of Hadrian and Severus against the Jews after they crushed the ultimate rebellion in Jerusalem in 135 CE. The nature of the treatment decreed was also the same for practical purposes. Only two factors differed. One was the severity of the treatment and the other was the practicability of enforcing the edict. The severity was marginally less because Galerius was not facing the trauma of the open rebellion which Severus had been required to put down. And the need to enforce his edict across the entire empire made it much more difficult for Galerius to put his plan into effect than for Severus who was dealing basically with the population of one small state.

A few months later, in 306 CE, Constantine was proclaimed emperor of the western provinces of the Roman Empire at York. Apparently he did not intervene to prevent the persecution of Christians at that stage although he was sympathetic towards them. However he certainly became more and more conscious of their numbers and of their potential unifying influence within the empire. By that time their ranks had been swollen to far in excess of the numbers of Judaists and it has been estimated that they made up about one fifth of the population of the empire. In any case Constantine was intent on securing his own position and he must have been well aware of the importance of the explosion in the Christian population of Armenia and the influence this could have in his personal ambition to become sole emperor of the entire empire.

In looking at this critical period of history it is very easy to overlook movements in the Jewish population, but it is especially so for those Christians who assume the correctness of the Christian stance because they have been fed on the spurious notion of the purity of the early church. They see Judaism as superseded by Christianity. Perhaps no longer an instrument of God's will. Simply an anachronism. An irritating religious phenomenon which refused to die. But before the rise of the Roman Empire and Christianity, Judaism had already spread right along the Mediterranean fringe of Africa. There appear to have been active communities of Jews established in Tunis and local tribes converted to Judaism along the Atlantic coast of Morocco as long as two hundred years before Christ. Going in the other direction, it is probable that the first practising Jews had reached India either across Persia by land or down the Persian Gulf within a generation or so, say 175 BCE.³⁰ That being the case we must pause and take stock of what was happening in Judaism in the empire which Constantine was just about to re-constitute.

SECURING THE JEWISH FAITH

By the time Constantine strode onto the scene as a Roman commander in Britain, Judaists had settled in every part of the empire except Britain.³¹ Except in the situations already discussed in which they came into direct confrontation with either the state or the church they were allowed freedom of worship and they were even allowed to practise Jewish law in disputes between themselves. Even the notorious anti-Roman uprisings of their co-religionists in Palestine did not seem to prejudice their position in other parts of the empire to any extent.³² They were ridiculed because of their way of life but they were not suppressed. It is estimated that there were still at least three million Judaists in the empire about 300 CE and that about one third of them were in the western provinces. This was about half the number two hundred years before. It is difficult to identify all of the factors which might have been involved in that dramatic reduction but several factors stand out: the retraction of the boundaries of the empire so that many Jews were no longer within the empire; the fantastic loss of life during the second and third Zealot wars; conversion to Christianity; and the decision of the Sanhedrin that proselytizing was to cease. Regardless of their tendency to withdraw into closed communities, Judaists were represented in urban and rural occupations equally. They are known to have been farmers and cattle raisers in Mesopotamia, street traders in Egypt, wine and olive growers in North Africa and Spain, weavers, garment makers, actors, bankers and shipping merchants in Italy and even slave traders in Germany. They had gone beyond the bounds of the Roman Empire into the Atlas Mountains of Morocco and the Caucasus Mountains between Persia and Russia, (in what we knew as Georgia in the southern region of the USSR for many years), and they had settled north of the Black Sea in the Crimea and the Ukraine.

On the academic front, Jewish leaders had been concerned that the history, teachings and laws of Judaism should be prepared in a form in which they could be secured and passed on from generation to generation in view of repeated assaults on the Temple and the priestly systems of the faith. With this in mind, as we have already noted, preparation of the Palestine Talmud which had begun at the Jabneh academy as early as 70 CE, (immediately after the destruction of Jerusalem by Rome for the first time), had been stepped up after the destruction of Jerusalem by Rome for the second time in 135 CE. By about the end of the second century CE the traditional practices and laws had been compiled into the Mishna. From then on, for several hundred years, an immense effort went into collecting, sorting and refining a great mass of material including ethical teachings, history, philosophy, science and legend. The work was not confined to one area or to one school but out of it evolved the Talmud. Much of the early work was done in Palestine, but later scholars worked in Babylonia at Sura and Nehardea until this was sacked by the Palmyrans in 261 a few months after they had captured their prize prisoner, Emperor Valerian, thereby helping to prompt the Edict of Toleration and earning their very short-lived independence. Work on the Talmud was then continued at Mahoza and Pumbeditha – out of the clutches of the Roman Empire.³³

It is noteworthy that although Galerius had not subjected their community to his program of persecution, migration of Jewish families from Italy to Spain increased from about this time. This may have been because of fear of what was likely to be ahead of them in less tolerant parts of the empire but there may have been some other regional or trade attraction. Whatever the reason was, the Jewish communities which were to be very important in Spain four hundred years later began to grow.

Then came one of those beacons. The Roman ship of state was wallowing in the storm. It paused, turned hard about, lifted on the wind and was swept along on a new uncharted course. Galerius died. It was 311 CE. On his death bed he realized the futility of the program which he had attempted to enforce against Christianity. He issued an edict of toleration explaining why he had been “desirous of reclaiming into the way of reason and nature the deluded Christians who had renounced the religion and ceremonies instituted by their fathers; and presumptuously despising the practice of antiquity, had invented extravagant laws and opinions according to their fancy, and had collected a various society from the different provinces of our empire.” He recognized the destitution which they were suffering, granted clemency “provided always that they preserve a due respect to the established laws and government”, and called on them “to offer up their prayers to the deity whom they adore, for our safety and prosperity, for their own, and for that of the republic.”³⁴

CONSTANTINE

Among the competitors for political supremacy in the empire were Constantine and the oppressive pagan Maxentius who had been in league with Galerius in the persecution of the Christians. Constantine claimed to have experienced a vision of a cross in the sky bearing the motto “Hoc Signo Vincas”, meaning “by this sign thou shalt conquer”. He took it as the standard of his army, gained the support of the Christians and, when Maxentius and he met in battle at Milvian on the Tiber a few miles from Rome in 312 CE, Constantine was victorious and Maxentius drowned. Constantine continued as Associate Emperor. Just at this time the church in North Africa was split by another controversy. This may have been fueled by the edict of toleration which Galerius issued on his death bed or it may have been a factor in his decision to issue that edict.³⁵ ³⁶However the controversy had certainly been triggered by the oppressive edicts of Diocletian in 303 and Galerius in 304. It proved to be a warped case of action and reaction. Constantine was left to sort out the mess and he botched it up. It happened this way. As had been the case during the persecutions sixty years earlier, many bishops had either collaborated with the oppressors or had simply handed over their scriptures to be burned in order to save their own lives. They were called “traditors”. Those who had resisted claimed that the traditors had forfeited any right to conduct sacraments and to ordain priests or bishops. In their reasoning it followed that any ordination carried out by a traditor was invalid. They believed that Bishop Caecilian of Carthage had been ordained by such a man. He actively sought to restrain what he saw as the excessive adulation of martyrs and confessors which undermined established ecclesiastical authority. Eighty resisters met, declared Caecilian's ordination invalid and elected a successor. Caecilian stood his ground, of course, and was supported by the orthodox bishops who took the official church line that the efficacy of the sacraments came from Christ and not from their human ministers. The debate picked up all the elements of the dispute over the readmission of lapsi (those who had denied the faith under persecution) sixty years before and both sides drew on the writings of Cyprian to support their case. The bishop ordained by the resistance group was for some reason soon succeeded by a man named Donatus as rival bishop of Carthage. The division deepened and the rival group became known as Donatists.

Here enters Constantine. At first he may have taken the matter to be an exaggerated parochial grievance and he either ignored it or tolerated it.³⁷ But he couldn't ignore it for long. In March 313, shortly after his victory over Maxentius, Constantine and the associate emperor for the eastern provinces, Licinius, published the famous rescript of Milan – the so-called 'Edict of Toleration'. This recognized Christianity as a lawful religion and granted freedom of worship for all religions within the Roman Empire.³⁸ It also put an end to official persecutions and restored all property which had been confiscated from the church or its members.³⁹ It is probable that Constantine had expected the rescript to end internal dissension in the church such as the conflict between the orthodox Catholic Church and the Donatists as well as persecution and conflict between pagans and Christians. In fact, by granting them official toleration along with the orthodox church he invited them to compete, strengthened their position and deepened the division.

Shortly after Constantine and Licinius issued the Rescript of Milan the Donatists appealed against Caecilian continuing in office. In October 313 Constantine held a Council of Rome, sided with the bishop of Rome and supported Caecilian as the rightful bishop. He made a direct grant to Caecilian of 3,000 folles and instructed him to put down the men of unstable mind who were turning people away from the church.⁴⁰ When the dispute continued he referred it to a council held at Arles in southern France. The council supported Caecilian, as was to be expected, and so Constantine sent troops to put things right in Carthage.⁴¹ Theological uniformity and church unity could be imposed, he thought, like a road rule that cars must give way to horse drawn carriages. When he found that this wasn't the case he was unable to achieve by negotiation what he had failed to achieve with the army. Instead of the wound healing it festered and the Donatists gradually became established as a rival church.

The Council of Arles was to have been a counter-balancing action. However, despite all his efforts, changes of tack and military intervention the Donatists gradually became the dominant Christian body in North Africa. About 35 years later violence erupted, but we are not there yet. Prior to the battle at Milvian the church had used the fish as its symbol but after the rescript of Milan it adopted the cross. Again we find that there may have been mixed motives and a dash of syncretism. The cross had also been associated with sun worship and despite his association with the Christians, Constantine continued to act as pontifex maximus of the pagan state religion.⁴² The fortunes of the Christians immediately improved. So did their numbers. It had suddenly become a matter of some prestige to be associated with the Christians and it was with their enthusiastic support that Constantine was able to consolidate his position as an absolute dictator, even more so than Diocletian had been. The Council of Arles was held about a year after the rescript of Milan had been issued and Constantine presided even though he had not then formally accepted Christianity. Three bishops from Britain were present. They included one from York where Constantine had been proclaimed emperor of the western provinces. This suggests that the church had become well established in Britain at that stage and also that Constantine's experience there had influenced his attitude towards the role of Christianity in the empire quite significantly. Certainly, by presiding over the Council of Arles with bishops present from diverse parts of the empire, Constantine was seen to be identifying himself with Christianity.

At a smaller regional council at Elvira in Spain in about 306 CE (the year that Constantine had been proclaimed provincial emperor), the church's law makers turned their attention to some other administrative matters and bishops, priests, deacons and other ministers were forbidden to have wives.⁴³ This appears to have been the first of a series of regional decisions imposing celibacy on the leadership groups of the church. It contrasts strangely with the decision of the Jewish Sanhedrin aimed at avoiding celibacy and it subsequently became the centre of another major debate – couched in theological terms of course – of current concern to both the clergy and the wider church community.

THE TRINITARIAN CONTROVERSY

It was during the next few years while Constantine was still associate emperor that the Trinitarian controversy erupted violently around the teachings of Arius and Athanasius at Alexandria. This was the city described by Wells as “for a time ... perhaps the greatest city of the world”. It had been founded by Alexander the Great in 332 BCE during his conquests which had carried the Hellenistic Greek civilization which he then dominated right through Egypt and into modern day Libya. Alexandria had therefore become something of a melting pot for religious thought. At the time of Alexander's “visit” Egypt had been under Persian rule for about two hundred years. There must have been some Zoroastrian influence but it appears likely that this was the corrupted emperor-god interpretation and not the keenly monotheistic teaching of Zoroaster himself. In any case Alexander came under the influence of Egyptian paganism of the period. He consulted the Oracle of Ammon and adopted the stance of a divine emperor-god himself.⁴⁴

By the time of the confrontation between Arius and Athanasius over the Trinity, monasticism of a pagan variety had become a well established facet of the community around Alexandria. It had developed from ideas introduced from India. At the time of the Trinitarian debate it was adopted by certain Christian groups in Egypt under the leadership of Anthony, but it does not seem to have been introduced into Europe until about two hundred years later.⁴⁵ Also, by the time of the Trinitarian controversy the Alexandrian School of Christian Theology had been established for about thirty years and it had become the focal point for one of the largest concentrations of Christian population anywhere in the Roman Empire.

Against that background it becomes clear that the Trinitarian dispute was bound to be highly divisive among the very people on whom Constantine was relying for a unifying influence. The importance of the issue was such that an immense range of books has been written both supporting and denying the concept of the Trinity and various other attempts have been made to identify and to define God within the limits of human understanding. Those limits are such that whatever definitions human beings may determine will restrict human thinking and inhibit human understanding in such a way that God appears to be limited in scope, authority and presence to the powers of human comprehension. Immeasurable damage has been caused by the development and imposition of such doctrines and creeds. Barriers have been built between people. Obstacles have been put in the way of both a spontaneous and uninhibited response to God's love and obedience to God's will on the part of those who are subjected to those obstacles. The effective spread of Christ's message has been restricted. But most important of all, and basic to all other adverse effects, they tend to freeze God's power and intentions, in the human mind, at the point in time of the life of Jesus the Messiah. They make it difficult for Christians to grasp that there may be other instruments of God's will or phenomenon through which the presence of God may be discerned and that God may choose to inspire, call or act through people other than themselves. They also have the effect of substituting for God's limitless love and authority the sectarianism, arrogance, indecision and fallibility of the church. Such was the significance of the Trinitarian dispute.

Some of the less desirable characteristics of the institutional church had already been established or initiated by events and people before the Trinitarian dispute erupted. However because the subject of the dispute is basic to the thought of all faiths and ideologies and not only to Christianity, the outcome of the dispute proved to do more than just determine the future course of Christian theological gymnastics. It determined the relationship between the people of the church and its structures and decision making procedures. It determined the church's view of itself and the church's view of other faiths and ideologies. It also determined the view of the church as seen by people of other faiths and ideologies.

The Trinitarian dispute was not simply one facet of the beacon around which the Roman ship of state was already wallowing. It was another beacon. The subject of the dispute was God. It arose because Arius, who was a presbyter, saw fit to oppose the mystical view of God and Jesus which was pervading Christian thinking. In 318 CE he tried to clarify the confusion by setting down a statement that Jesus, although higher than the human nature, was inferior to God, that he was not eternal in existence and that he had a beginning. Athanasius, a deacon, flew into the fray. He asserted the unity of the Son and the Father, the deity of Christ and his eternal existence. But the argument didn't stop at the level of the local church debating society. As Wells describes the situation:

*“men who quarreled over business affairs, wives who wished to annoy their husbands, developed antagonistic views on this exalted theme ... Riots and excommunications and banishments punctuated these controversies, and finally came official persecutions ...”*⁴⁶

In 321 CE a synod was convened. Arius was not only refused the post of Bishop of Alexandria but was deposed from the offices which he then held. The bitterness deepened and spread like an ulcer, or perhaps a cancer. Three years later Constantine “succeeded” Licinius as emperor of the eastern provinces. He was at last sole emperor of the empire. It had been with Licinius jointly that he had issued the rescript of Milan about ten years earlier. It was now more important than ever that he end the division. He had to introduce or establish a degree of stability across the empire.

THE DECREE OF 324 AND THE COUNCIL OF NICAIA

Constantine’s solution was to issue a decree in 324 CE that Christianity was to be the state religion. In fact it was to be the only legal religion. However he did not revoke the citizenship of those who practised Judaism and he thereby invited pagan objectors to ignore the decree. Constantine assumed, rather naively, that political compromises instituted by himself as emperor could solve theological disputes and he wanted to show that he was supreme in ecclesiastical affairs by virtue of his office. In that regard he received support from some people in high church offices. Bishop-cum-historian Eusebius described him as “God’s dearly beloved” and, as emperor, “representative of Christianity” and said that opposition to him was “opposition to God’s own.”⁴⁷ But regardless of that, Constantine also wanted to mould the church into an instrument for consolidating the absolute power of the emperor. In fact by issuing that decree he made the situation worse within the church by encouraging the warring factions to flex the muscles of independence and fight even harder for the adoption of their views as the official theology.⁴⁸ When he sought to have Arius reinstated the effect was probably much the same. One thing we do know. The division was so destructive that only a year or so after he had gained absolute command of the empire and established Christianity as the religion of the realm Constantine was moved to impose his politician’s solution. He called a council to arrive at a consensus around which the church would bury its differences. This was crucial. His decree of 324 had, of course, encouraged a mass movement of the population into the church. But what were they to believe? He could not have the church tearing both itself and the empire apart over internal differences.

So the church met in council as an official instrument of the state for the first time in 325 CE at Nicaea in what is now northern Turkey. No longer was the homage and the loyalty of the church and its members due solely to God, whatever their understanding of God may have been. It was divided. The church and its members were on a new tack. They were responsible to the emperor and they exercised delegated authority under him. He was the same man who, until that moment, had been pontifex maximus of a pagan religious system. He even retained that title while he presided over the church’s councils. The entire church was caught in a bind because some of its earlier leaders had, for whatever motives, pushed the church into dependence on its fellows in Rome. It was probably to be expected that the majority of the bishops at the council of Nicaea would be from the eastern part of the empire. After all it was still stronger in numbers in the east, its initial missionary activity had spread outward from the focal point of Jerusalem, and it was in the east that the controversy over the nature of God, Jesus and the Trinitarian theories had been most alarming. However that council can hardly be called representative when only five bishops were present from the western provinces, which included North Africa, compared with between two and three hundred from the eastern provinces. Not even the bishop of Rome was present. The emperor had arranged the transport for bishops to get to Nicaea.⁴⁹

Athanasius, not being ordained, did not have a vote at the council but was permitted to speak. His influence on the council's decision to condemn the teachings of Arius was very strong. However the council did not go as far as he wanted it to in fixing its doctrine. It considered a draft creed submitted by Eusebius which was already in use in his church at Caesarea and adopted as 'The Creed of Nicaea' a version which was a compromise between his orthodox statement and that demanded by Athanasius. It included a declaration that the key idea of Arius was anathema and linked certain other ideas which were also current with that declaration, but it did not include explicit statements spelling out the contrary idea which Athanasius had pressed for. Constantine and the council hoped that this would be an acceptable compromise which would be used throughout the church and that it would thus secure peace and harmony among the Christians of the empire.

That creed⁵⁰ opened with the words:

We believe in one God the Father All-sovereign, maker of all things visible and invisible;

There is, among believers, little which is contentious about that. The debate over that concept is between believers in a wide range of faiths and those who reject the notion of a creative god altogether. The debate begins in earnest with the next clause and a subsequent sentence:

And in one Lord Jesus Christ, the Son of God, begotten of the Father, only-begotten, that is, of the substance of the Father, God of God, Light of Light, true God of true God, begotten not made, of one substance with the Father, through whom all things were made, things in heaven and things on the earth; who for us men and for our salvation came down and was made flesh, and became man, suffered, and rose on the third day, ascended into the heavens, is coming to judge living and dead.

And in the Holy Spirit.

*And those that say 'There was when he was not,'
and, 'Before he was begotten he was not,'
and that, 'He came into being from what-is-not,' or those that allege, that the son of God is
'Of another substance or essence' or 'created,'*

or 'changeable' or 'alterable,' these the Catholic and Apostolic Church anathematizes.

Battle lines had been drawn, disputes continued as already noted, and many clergy continued to use the credal statements which they had previously devised themselves or which they favoured. There was also disagreement over the actual form of the creed adopted at Niceae, so various versions were soon in circulation with clergy adding or deleting phrases according to their personal whims. The version presented by Neuner and Dupuis as that approved at the Council of Niceae is somewhat longer and uses words which differ significantly in emphasis from that quoted above. While this may be partly the result of differing approaches to translation it helps to illustrate the diversity of versions in use at the time.⁵¹ But because the Creed of Niceae did not include all the contentious beliefs of Athanasius and his supporters a more comprehensive and tightly worded version was drafted. It was written basically to reaffirm 'the faith of Niceae' against continuing Arian opposition. But at the same time it was to proclaim the divinity of the Holy Spirit as an equal part of the Triune Godhead against the opposition of dissidents known as Pneumatomachi. This group denied that the Holy Spirit was equal in status to God, maintaining that it was an instrument of God's will. The modified version of the creed was adopted at the Council of Constantinople in 381, became known as the 'Nicene-Constantinopolitan Symbol' and was soon in widespread use. The beliefs of the Pneumatomachi were labelled 'Macedonianism', they were declared heretics, subjected to the full force of anti-heresy laws under Theodosius, and within two years of the council they had been effectively eliminated.

The new creed included several additional statements. First, that: "[Christ] came down from the heavens, and became flesh from the Holy Spirit and the Virgin Mary and was made man." Second, "[We believe] ... in the Holy Spirit, the Lord and Giver of life, who proceeds from the Father, who together with the Father and the Son is worshipped and glorified, who has spoken through the prophets. Third, "[We believe] in one Holy Catholic and apostolic Church. Fourth, "We acknowledge one baptism for the forgiveness of sins." Fifth, "We expect the resurrection of the dead and the life of the world to come."

The council and the emperor were hell-bent on developing a straight jacket through which they still hoped to impose imperial-cum-church control over people's thinking and thereby achieve imperial stability through religious conformity. But by introducing those additional concepts into the creed they actually increased the need for clarification through careful reflection and informed debate. Then, by preventing that careful reflection and informed debate they further increased the prospects for dispute, division, more heresy declarations and heresy hunting, greater instability in the empire, and even more straight jackets. They were putting blinkers on people's eyes and making it more difficult than ever for people to understand their relationship with God and the message of the Gospel. In historical terms they had barely started along that course but because they could not understand their role, they were already making it more difficult to change direction ... and much, much worse was yet to come.

THE ATHANASIAN CREED

In 451 CE the Council of Chalcedon confirmed again the faith of the ‘fathers’ at the Council of Niceae (325) but it was the 381 version of the creed of Niceae-Constantinople which the council adopted for use with the Eucharist under the name of the Nicene Creed. With some minor variations it was in general use in the Eastern Church from about that time. In the West its introduction was more gradual. Eventually it became the subject of major controversy and division between the Eastern and Western Churches as a consequence of being modified by the Council of Toledo in 589 CE to include the statement that “the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Father and the Son.” We shall come to that – the Filioque Clause – in due course.

But some years after the death of Athanasius, possibly between 381 and 428,⁵² a creed bearing his name but now thought to have been composed by Bishop Ambrose of Milan or some of his colleagues, was put into circulation in the Western Church. In due course it was adopted as an article of faith “and enjoyed great authority in the Latin Church.”⁵³ It was included in the Breviary for obligatory use in the daily Liturgy of the Hours by all Catholic clergy and both men and women under vows in religious orders. It was also required to be read for the Solemnity (feast) of the Holy Trinity, and it was retained by the Anglican and some other Protestant churches after the Reformation, but it was never accepted by the Eastern Orthodox Churches. Fortunately, as a result of revisions to the liturgy its use is no longer obligatory.

The Creed of Saint Athanasius begins with the words;

*Whosoever will be saved: before all things it is necessary that he hold the Catholick Faith.
Which faith except everyone do keep whole and undefiled: without doubt he shall perish everlastingly.*⁵⁴

It then includes in great detail each of the obligatory beliefs about the characteristics of God the Father, God the Son, and God the Holy Spirit, reinforcing them with repetition that all three are equal and all three are the same. The creed is not set out here in full, but to illustrate this approach the following selection will be sufficient.

*... we worship one God in Trinity, and Trinity in Unity;
Neither confounding the Persons: nor dividing the Substance.
For there is one Person of the Father, another of the Son: and another of the Holy Ghost.
But the Godhead of the Father, of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost, is all one: the Glory equal, the Majesty co-eternal.
Such as the Father is, such is the Son: and such is the Holy Ghost.
The Father uncreate, the Son uncreate: and the Holy Ghost uncreate.
The Father incomprehensible, the Son incomprehensible: and the Holy Ghost incomprehensible.*

Further into the creed comes the key statement of equality.

So there is one Father, not three Fathers; one Son, not three Sons: one Holy Ghost, not three Holy Ghosts.

*And in this Trinity none is afore, or after other: none is greater, or less than another;
But the whole three Persons are co-eternal together: and co-equal.
So that in all things, as is aforesaid: the Unity in Trinity, and the Trinity in Unity is to be worshipped.
He therefore that will be saved: must thus think of the Trinity*

Then, dealing with the subject of incarnation, after making a great effort to convince everyone that the three persons of the one God are equal, the unknown author or authors set out to establish a ‘pecking order’ or qualified inferiority of the Son after all...

*... we believe and confess: that our Lord Jesus Christ, the Son of God, is God and Man:
God, of the Substance of the Father, begotten before the Worlds: and Man, of the Substance of his Mother, born in the world;
Perfect God, and perfect Man: of a reasonable soul and human flesh subsisting;
Equal to the Father, as touching his Godhead: and inferior to the Father, as touching his Manhood.
Who although he be God and Man: yet he is not two, but one Christ;
One; not by conversion of the Godhead into flesh: but by taking the Manhood into God;
One altogether; not by confusion of Substance: but by unity of Person.
... and still more follows, with a final repetition of:
This is the Catholick Faith: which except a man believe faithfully, he cannot be saved.*

As the unfolding trouble in the triangle will demonstrate, the consequences of the adoption of that creed have been catastrophic. To start with, within the church unimaginable effort has been diverted from the vital work of enabling people to understand and to respond to both the Law and the Gospel message which complements it. Ever since the Nicene Creed was adopted some of the church’s greatest intellects have been sidetracked by the task of justifying the unjustifiable. The adoption of the Athanasian Creed exacerbated that situation. Theologians have had the task of convincing the world that the third “person” of the Triune God (the Holy Ghost), although “proceeding” from each of the other two persons and therefore (one would reasonably presume) not co-eternal with them and definitely subordinate to them, “begat” the second person (the Son), at a very late stage in the history of creation and evolution (a mere 2,000 years ago), in spite of both of them being co-eternal with the first (the Father), and the second having already been “begotten before the worlds” by the first with the third looking over his shoulder.

THE GOSPEL OF JOHN

The formulators of the doctrine as expressed in those two creeds took as their starting point the entirely justifiable belief that the Divine Plan and the totality of Biblical teaching on ethics, morality and human relations – encompassing all that was subsequently revealed in the Law and the Gospel – existed as the Divine Will prior to the moment of creation. This is reflected in the prologue to the New Testament book known as the Gospel According to Saint John which opens with the simple and direct words:

*“In the beginning was the Word:
the Word was with God and the Word was God.
He was with God in the beginning.
Through Him all things came to be,
not one thing had its being but through him.
All that came to be had life in him and that life was the light of men a light that shines in the dark, a light that darkness could not overpower...”
John 1:1–5[Jerusalem]*

At first glance it appears to be parallel to the opening lines of the book of Genesis, the first book in the Bible:

*In the beginning God created the heavens and the earth. Now the earth was a formless void, there was darkness over the deep, and God’s spirit hovered over the water. God said, ‘Let there be light’, and there was light. God saw that the light was good, and God divided light from darkness.
Genesis 1:1–4 [Jerusalem]*

But the message in John is already confused. It has diverged from the Yahwist understanding and it soon becomes clear that the book is an openly polemical work written to justify a position which the author unashamedly promotes. The author of John has engaged in semantics, or even the simple substitution of words, to make two unjustifiable transpositions. First, he has moved from the Word, as an instrument of God’s will, being in the presence of God, (“the Word was with God”) to the Word being the same as God, (“the Word was God”). Second, he has made the move from the Word being an inanimate presence with God or an aspect of God to being personified as “He”. The author then continues:

*“...The Word was the true light that enlightens all men;
and he was coming into the world.
He was in the world that had its being through him... [v. 9–10]
...(he) was born not out of human stock or urge of the flesh or will of man*

but of God himself.

The Word was made flesh... [v. 13–14]

[Jerusalem Bible]

It is clear that in the first instance in which he uses the term ‘Word’ the author of John’s Gospel is referring to God’s Spirit, a presence or an influence of God, in the same context as that in which it is used in Genesis. But in working through the following verses he engineers a ‘transition’ or ‘transposition’ and in verse 14 he had moved from “He”, a personification of God, to the person Jesus of Nazareth. This transition is very important indeed and it is therefore necessary to examine the use of the two terms ‘Spirit’ and ‘Word’ very carefully.

The Yahwists in the years BCE used the term ‘Spirit’ in referring to an instrument of God’s Will both in a creative sense, as in Genesis 1, above, and in the sense of a messenger conveying wisdom, knowledge and understanding. Examples are easy to find. First, in Psalm 51:11–12, an appeal to God. “Cast me not away from thy presence; and take not thy holy spirit from me. Restore unto me the joy of thy salvation; and uphold me with thy free spirit.” [KJ] Second, in Isaiah 11:2, concerning the restoration of the House of David: “And the spirit of the Lord shall rest upon him, the spirit of wisdom and understanding, the spirit of counsel and might, the spirit of knowledge and of the fear of the Lord...” [KJ] Third, in Ezekiel 37:14 the prophet records an injunction from God: “and [I] shall put my spirit in you, and ye shall live, and I shall place you in your own land: then shall ye know that I the Lord have spoken it, and performed it, saith the Lord.” [KJ]

However when the Yahwist writers were referring to commands from God they did not attribute them to the Holy Spirit, but directly to God. This is illustrated by Exodus 13:12–13 which records Yahweh saying to Moses, “Speak to the sons of Israel and say, ‘You must keep my sabbaths carefully, because the sabbath is a sign between myself and you from generation to generation to show that it is I, Yahweh, who sanctify you.’” [Jerusalem] Then in the first book of Samuel 3:10–13 the boy’s response to the divine command to prophesy is recorded in this way. “Yahweh then came and stood by, calling as he had done before, ‘Samuel! Samuel!’ Samuel answered, ‘Speak, Yahweh, your servant is listening.’ Then Yahweh said to Samuel, ‘I am about to do such a thing in Israel as will make the ears of all who hear it ring. On that day, I will carry out against Eli everything I have spoken about his House, from beginning to end. You are to tell him that I condemn his House for ever because he has known that his sons have been cursing God, yet he has not corrected them.’” [Jerusalem] And in Joel 2:28, concerning the future deliverance of Israel, we read: “And it shall come to pass afterward, that I [Yahweh] will pour out my spirit upon all flesh; and your sons and your daughters shall prophesy, your old men shall dream dreams, your young men shall see visions...” [KJ]

One consequence of making a distinction between revelation through the Holy Spirit and commands of Yahweh in that way was that by the time of the prophets the Word of the Lord was regarded by some Jews as having an almost independent existence and authority.⁵⁵ This was later used against them by Christians who claimed that the Jewish recognition of two persons in Yahweh justified the Christian concept of three persons in their Triune God. However distinct differences must be recognized between the concepts of a 'perceptible presence of God', 'an instrument of God's Will', and second or third 'persons' of God. The use of the terms 'a perceptible presence of God' or 'direct intervention by God' indicate that a person has experienced, has been influenced directly by, or has received commands directly from God. The call to Samuel is an example of a direct command or direct intervention by God. The term 'an instrument of God's Will' can refer to an influence (possibly perceived as a spirit or an angel), a person, or a body of people which exists by the Grace of God and which intervenes in a situation in a manner which God determines or directs and which is therefore consistent with God's Will or the Divine Plan. Jesus of Nazareth is therefore an instrument of God's Will. So were the armies of the Chaldeans when they invaded Judah.

However, the idea of one or more persons or influences being 'the second person' or 'the third person' of a multi-person god suggests that such 'persons' have an existence and authority independent of each other 'person' of the god. Even if one or more such 'persons' are together in the same realm, in consort with, and either superior to or subordinate to other 'persons' of the god this idea is not consistent with the concept of God-without-peer with incomprehensible, absolute and limitless authority and power. No cumbersome literary gymnastics used in an attempt to say otherwise can conceal that inconsistency. We must recognize that God, with indefinable power and authority, may, without any diminution of power and authority, delegate any aspect of Divine power and authority to any instrument of Divine Will, or exercise it through any such instrument. Such delegation or exercise of authority and power does not mean in any sense that God has relinquished Divine authority and power or that it has been diminished. Neither does it impute any permanence, exclusiveness or parameters to such a delegation. If we do not recognize this we immediately imply a limitation or a division of God's authority and power, and this merely indicates that we have misunderstood the indefinable, incomprehensible, limitless authority and power of God.

But back to the origins of the Gospel of John. It is a matter of some importance that the authorship of John is disputed and modern Biblical research has shown that it cannot be determined. Similarly, historians are unable to determine where or when it was written. The Gospel is believed to have been written in Asia Minor, but scholars can be no more precise than that, and it could be dated as late as the early years of the second century. It was certainly written no earlier than 70 CE, when the temple in Jerusalem was destroyed with the result that the Jerusalem group of disciples was scattered, its influence decimated and the Pauline group became the dominant influence in the evolution of the church's theology. It was most probably written soon after the Jewish Christian believers were expelled from the synagogues because of the claims they were making some fifteen to twenty years later, between 85 and 90 CE.⁵⁶ This places it in the early 90s, about a generation after Paul's vitriolic attack on the troublemakers undermining the church in Galatia, and in the same time frame as both the Book of Revelation which is believed to have been written in the early 90s and The Acts of the Apostles which is also dated between 90 and 100 CE.⁵⁷ So what we now know about the Gospel of John and the way in which it is written raises serious questions about the extent to which the writer was responding to Philo's writing. The key idea to consider is the use of the Greek term 'logos', (word or reason), when Philo described a divine and immanent mediator embracing God's Word, Wisdom and plan or purpose for the universe, and that this "immanent mediator" was God's manifestation in the world (chapter 1).^{58 59} Did the author of John adapt Philo's terminology to the Christian message in an exercise in syncretism with two main aims: one, to take advantage of both the Wisdom of Solomon and Philo's writings, and the other, to counteract Philo's Judaizing influence? Those aims are consistent with the fact that throughout the gospel there is "an engagement, explicit or implicit, with the 'Jews' – so much so that Jesus himself often appears as one separate from and opposite to the Jews. Yet there is no denial of his Jewish identity, whether in contrast to a Samaritan (4:9, 22) or to a Gentile (18:35)."⁶⁰

This therefore also questions the validity of using John as the foundation for the key statement of faith of an entire belief system. It is very doubtful indeed whether a Gospel writer would have represented Jesus Christ as the incarnate Word of God if he were not trying to take advantage of Philo's definitions. The fact that the thrust of the prologue differs so markedly from the words of Jesus as they are recorded in the body of the gospel also suggests quite strongly that the writer's motive was proselytizing by means of syncretism. Put another way:

"Though it is clear that the author was influenced by the same background as Philo, his identification of the Logos with the Messiah was new. In Patristic theology [writings between the last few years of the first century and the end of the eighth century] the Johannine teaching about the Logos was taken up by St. Ignatius and developed by the Apologists of the second century who saw in it a means of making the Christian teaching compatible with Hellenistic philosophy."⁶¹

And put very plainly, in that competitive environment the suggestion that the writer of John was simply favourably impressed by Philo's writing is not sustainable. Without the determination of Paul he appears to have taken the line of least resistance: 'if you cannot beat them, join them'. Furthermore, as there are indications that the gospel was edited and published after the author's death the probability must be considered that the prologue was among the editor's additions.⁶²

Then there is the question of how the author of John uses the term "light." The writer of Genesis leaves us in no doubt that the Yahwist understanding was that God commanded the creation of light as a force, or, if you will, a source of energy, or a natural resource powering other components of creation, but in any case an integral aspect of the fact of creation. "Let there be light." Very clear. Very direct. Then follows the clear statement of understanding that the light was good: an essential and beneficent aspect of creation. "God saw that the light was good, and God divided light from darkness." God was in full and absolute control. There is no possible way to see divine equivalence, co-existence, or shared authority. The light was a subordinate aspect of creation. No more. No less.

It is therefore helpful to reflect on how people outside the embryonic church understood or perceived light, and why the author of John chose to use the expression “the Word was the true light.” Both before and during the Christian Era, light has generally been used as a symbol of life and continuity or immortality of the soul, in contrast to darkness which has generally been symbolic of death or chaos. But that understanding had been refined by the Zoroastrians as well as the Yahwists, and the presence of light implied or was symbolic of being in the presence of the good creator God. In contrast, the absence of light implied being subject to or under the influence of an evil or satanic ‘presence.’ To the Gnostics light was symbolic of spiritual salvation or liberation from the restrictions of material or physical constraints. So, at the time that the Gospel of John was written, every faith group used light in some manner to represent progress from an unfavourable to a favourable realm, or release from the limitations of darkness. In one, Hinduism, with which he was not likely to be familiar because the influence of its Aryan predecessors does not appear to have extended to Asia Minor, the significance of light and the use of candles in religious ceremonies reached the point that its principal centre, Banaras in northern India, was known as Kashi, ‘the city of light.’ It is therefore apparent that the author of John was another early syncretist. He was trying to capitalize on the concepts already understood in the diverse communities in which the church was sinking its roots and seeking converts, in order to be able to relate the person Jesus of Nazareth to the beliefs of the people of each existing religious tradition. That process has never stopped or been reversed. As he indicated himself, the author was unashamedly seeking to recruit people to Christianity.

In fact the World Council of Churches was perfectly happy to take advantage of the concept that “Jesus Christ (is) the Light of the World” when its third assembly was held in India, at New Delhi, in November 1961. That was the theme title for the assembly which opened with a prayer led by the Metropolitan of the Mar Thoma Syrian Church of Malabar, that: “We have come together in this place out of many nations because Christ who is the light of the world has shined in our hearts to give the light of the knowledge of the glory of God, and because he has set us as lights in the world and bidden us to let out light shine.” There was then a confession that “we have hidden from men the true light of the world” and an act of gratitude to God for “calling us out of darkness into this marvelous light.” When he addressed the first general session of the assembly, Bishop Gottfried Noth of Germany spoke of the theme in these terms: “The darkness in which the world lives is not an illusion, which one merely has to see through. It is much worse than we usually think: the darkness exercises dominion over us (Col. 1.13) and we are under its sway. Its spell cannot be broken simply by good will. The fellowship between God and man is broken, and this makes the world dark, whether it notices it or not. In the full authority of God’s grace, Christ establishes a new relationship with God, and this makes him the Light of the World. The darkness is driven away, not by a new doctrine of God but by his act of redemption.” [Emphasis added.] Putting the concept in such terms, placing the emphasis on Jesus of Nazareth as a guide who illuminates humanity’s relationship and fellowship with God was an effective and inspiring way of circumventing the dominant fundamentalist approach to John's Gospel which was, and still is, a stumbling block to understanding the person and role of Jesus Christ.

However that is jumping ahead. The church's early theologians – or at least those who supported the writer of the Athanasian Creed – felt obliged to accept and to take advantage of the prologue to John's Gospel. This required them to somehow rationalize the proposition of a concept (the 'word' or the divine plan) being incarnate by birth to a normal human being as mother and a pre-existing 'influence' (the Holy Spirit) as paternal agent. As a consequence, their need to rely on verbal gymnastics and dogma increased. They were endeavouring to attribute actions and relationships which are rational (and understandable to a person without specialist training in, say, mathematical or scientific formulae) to an 'influence' – a supernatural mystery – which their former co-religionists, then competitors, had already understood and accepted as the Divine Spirit even though it could be conceived as either a discernible presence of God or an instrument of God's will.

Their task became greater and greater as they juggled with concepts and words. Relying heavily on the prologue in formulating the creeds they needed no more prompting to apply the personal pro-noun 'He' to 'the Word', and the term 'The Word' to Jesus in his Messianic role. This could have been because it was much easier than trying to articulate an indefinable aspect of God's will which was being progressively revealed, broadly according to God's will, through the primary instruments which God had nominated: the Jewish people. But it is more likely to have been because they were trying very strenuously to distance themselves and the church from Judaism. Certainly they believed that they needed some means of demonstrating two things: the difference between Christianity and Judaism, and Christianity's distinct and direct links with God. They wanted to reduce their dependence on their Jewish heritage and Judaism and they would have bypassed it altogether if they could. But they couldn't because they were dependant upon Old Testament prophecy to justify their claims that Jesus was the Messiah and he was undeniably Jewish. In either case, in making that transposition by extension of their faulty reasoning they decided and insisted that Jesus Christ, the Messiah, being 'The Word', must have existed before the world was created. They had thus worked themselves into a corner. To support their contention they appear to have relied mainly on the prologue to John but they also turned to statements in that Gospel which are attributed to Jesus and taken from personal exchanges between Jesus and a number of Pharisees. In these exchanges Jesus used a play on words and allusion to miracles of the Exodus to illustrate the divine basis of his mission and the nature of his relationship with God in response to questions and taunts.

In one, in the context of a discussion with Nicodemus on understanding the Spirit and the need for spiritual rebirth Jesus is quoted as saying:

"If I have told you earthly things and you do not believe me, how can you believe if I tell you heavenly things? No one has ascended into heaven but he who descended from heaven, the Son of man.⁶³ And as Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, so must the Son of man be lifted up, that whoever believes in him may have eternal life".

John 3:12–15 [RSV]

In another, in the context of questions from a group of worshippers in the Temple about his authority and his relationship to Abraham as the father of their faith, a worshipper asked Jesus: “Are you greater than our father Abraham, who is dead? The prophets are dead too. What do you claim to be?” Jesus is quoted as replying:

“If I glorify myself, that glory of mine is worthless. It is the Father who glorifies me, he of whom you say, ‘He is our God’, though you do not know him. But I know him; if I said that I did not know him I should be a liar like you. But in truth I know him and obey his word. Your father Abraham was overjoyed to see my day; he saw it and was glad”. The Jews protested, ‘You are not yet fifty years old. How can you have seen Abraham?’⁶⁴ Jesus said, “In very truth I tell you, before Abraham was born, I am.”

John 8: 53–58 [RSV]

Apart from the words of the writer of the prologue to the Gospel there is nothing to suggest that Jesus existed at the beginning of time, was the incarnation of an influence which existed at the beginning of time, or was in any sense equal in status to God. On the other hand there are many statements attributed to him which they could have used to illustrate the special but very definitely and unmistakably subordinate relationship of Jesus to God which Jesus expressed as that of Father and Son. He made it perfectly clear that he was acting in response to his obligations under that relationship to exemplify God’s Will and in doing so to compliment the Law, to extend the teaching which had already been conveyed through the Covenant People, of whom he was one, and to enhance the understanding of the relationship between God and all of God’s people.

The words I say to you I do not speak as from myself: it is the Father, living in me, who is doing this work.

John 14:10 [Jerusalem]

Father, the hour has come: glorify your Son so that your Son may glorify you; and, through the power over all mankind that you have given him, let him give eternal life to all those you have entrusted to him. And eternal life is this: to know you, the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom you have sent.

John 17:1–3 [Jerusalem]

...he said to [the disciples] again, ‘Peace be with you. As the Father sent me, so am I sending you’.

John 20:21 [Jerusalem]

The overwhelming thrust of John is that Jesus is subordinate to, and sent by, God the Father. In the context of a challenge to his action in healing a sick person on the Sabbath he responded:

My Father goes on working and so did I. ... I tell you most solemnly, the Son can do nothing by himself; he can do only what he sees the Father doing; and whatever the Father does the Son does too.

John 5:18–19 [Jerusalem]

I am the true vine, and my Father is the vinedresser. Every branch in me that bears no fruit he cuts away, and every branch that does bear fruit he prunes to make it bear even more.

John 15:1–2 [Jerusalem]

However some of Jesus' most imperative statements which indicate how he understood his relationship with God are in the synoptic Gospels. They include his prayer in the garden at Gethsemane while he waited to be arrested:

My Father, if it is possible, let this cup pass me by. Nevertheless, let it be as you, not I, would have it. [and twice] My Father, if this cup cannot pass by without my drinking it, your will be done.

Matthew 26:39–43 [Jerusalem]

During his trial before the Sanhedrin the High Priest demanded that Jesus say, on oath, whether he was "the Christ, the Son of God." Jesus replied:

The words are your own. Moreover, I tell you that from this time onward you will see the Son of Man seated at the right hand of the Power and coming on the clouds of heaven.

Matthew 26:63–65 [Jerusalem]

In Mark 14:62 the same incident is reported with the words: "I am" in place of "The words are your own." Then among some of his final words on the cross we have:

Father, forgive them; they do not know what they are doing.

Luke 23:34 [Jerusalem]

My God, my God, why have you deserted me?

Both Matthew 27:47 and Mark 15:34 [Jerusalem]

Father, into your hands I commit my spirit.

Luke 23:46 [Jerusalem]

Similarly, the overwhelming thrust of statements in John concerning the Holy Spirit is that while the Spirit is made available at Jesus' request it is, and it remains, strictly an instrument of God's Will.

I shall ask the Father, and he will give you another Advocate to be with you forever, that Spirit of truth whom the world can never receive since it neither sees nor knows him; but you know him, because he is with you, he is in you.

... the Advocate, the Holy Spirit, whom the Father will send in my name, will teach you everything and remind you of all I have said to you.

John 14:16–17 and 26 [Jerusalem]

But when your Advocate has come, whom I will send you from the Father – the Spirit of truth that issues from the Father – he will bear witness to me.⁶⁵

John 15:26 [NEB]

However, choosing to ignore such irrefutable evidence that Jesus Christ, the Messiah, was subordinate to God, those early Christian theologians who were enjoying an unhealthy alliance of convenience with the ruling politicians of religion tried to cut short the debate on the basis that they had finalized the main aspect of the issue – how Jesus ranked in relation to the first and third persons of the Triune God – at least to their satisfaction. They were the judges: he was equal to God, and no correspondence would be entered into! They had determined that he existed before creation and therefore before the Covenant between God and the Jewish people, so naturally, even though he was one of them, he took precedence over them in God's scheme of things.

THE VENERATION OF MARY

They turned their minds back to another related distraction: the virgin birth. Although they were well accustomed to the Biblical concept of miracles they could not bring themselves to say “the Messiah's birth to a virgin Jewish woman was simply another miraculous expression of divine intervention within the Covenant relationship”. To do so would have tied them to the admission that the continuation of Christ's ministry was an inseparable aspect of the continuing Jewish destiny. Like the major aspect of the issue (Christ's relationship to God) this would also have required reconciliation with the Jewish authorities and their return to the synagogue. But that was unthinkable. The emphasis was placed increasingly on the person of Mary, Jesus' mother. As we have just noted, she had conceived the second person of the Triune God at the behest of the first, through the agency of the third, within the community of the Covenant people, and yet – the church had determined: the first, second and third were all co-eternal. According to its reasoning this made Mary “Mother of God” (Theotokos) and it was then an easy step to also give her the pagan title “Queen of Heaven” and weaken the nexus with Judaism even further. In fact, in their view, that earned them a ‘bonus point’ as well. Early officials of the church and theological manipulators had already been hell-bent on proselytizing both Jews and pagans by means of syncretism and they could neatly mesh the spread of Mariology into the existing web of pagan goddesses and fertility cults. And so to the issue of ‘The Mother of God’.

It appears that veneration of Mary as either ‘the New Eve’ or ‘Daughter of Zion’ had already taken root in parts of the church when Jerusalem was ravaged and the Temple destroyed – and with it the nucleus of the church's leadership – in 70 CE. That was well before the canonized Gospels, Acts or the Letters had been written, so there can be no justification on Biblical grounds for such a development. By the end of the first century CE a Feast of Mary, Conceptio Christi, was being celebrated together with celebrations for the Creation of the World and the Resurrection.⁶⁶ It also appears that fertility rites associated with the worship of pagan goddesses in the region of Canaan had involved sex orgies, human sacrifice and ritual prostitution, that these practices had not been quashed altogether by Yahwist colonization, and that they persisted in some regions at the time of Christ. As a result there was very soon a merging of symbols from the new Christian and existing pagan religions and gradually, as the churches gained power and confidence, some of them decided to adopt the pagan symbols and encourage the development of a Christianized cult of the Queen of Heaven.

According to author Andrew Greeley such a process was practically inevitable once the church “decided to take the risk of absorbing all that was good and beautiful in paganism.”⁶⁷ No one bothered to consider the consequences: at least not at that time. By about the end of the second century drawings of Mary were to be found in the Catacombs and sometime between the middle of the third century and the early years of the fourth – well before the Council of Niceae – direct and explicit Marian devotion was “well under way.”⁶⁸ It was not until a hundred years after Niceae that bitter controversy finally erupted, threatening a split in the church and requiring the emperor to convene a special council at Ephesus in 431. When its solution was to confirm the use of the term Theotokos a split still occurred. The decision was reconfirmed at Chalcedon twenty years later.

Mary was actually a normal human being nominated by God to bear a child who would serve as Messiah – the exemplification of God’s Will and the person who would enable all humanity to reach a more intimate, unclouded understanding of its relationship to God, its obligations to God and thus its responsibilities to the total human community. We can assume that she was a person appropriate to be so nominated and favoured by God, but we can assume no more. We know little more, with certainty, than that she was devout and responded to and pondered God’s intervention in her life with humility and love. All else in conjecture and developed myth. We can acknowledge several things. First: that Mary bore a child by divine intervention at the command of God the Almighty (otherwise referred to as God the Father or the ‘first person’ of the Triune God). Second: conception occurred through the agency of the Holy Spirit, an instrument of God’s Will (the ‘third person’ of the Triune God). Third: Mary gave birth to a child who was named Jesus. Fourth: Jesus is the Messiah and both Son of Man and Son of God, an instrument of God’s Will (referred to as the ‘second person’ of the Triune God even though he appeared in history as third in sequence). On that basis there is absolutely no justification for the adoption of the title ‘Mother of God’. The simple description ‘mother of the Messiah’ would have been appropriate and adequate. The description ‘mother of the Son of God’ would also have been justifiable. However, once the expressions ‘Mother of God’ and ‘Queen of Heaven’ had been used in the church in a campaign of syncretism there appeared, to those involved, to be no turning back. They had to manipulate their growing range of creeds, doctrinal statements and dogma to accommodate the ‘new’ beliefs and then enforce them by heresy hunting. To admit that they were wrong and to start all over again was very threatening and therefore unacceptable.

Thus while the church was absorbing a mass of pagan ideas and practices it was also formulating a series of creeds to provide a base for teaching the great mass of people who were being absorbed. There is no doubt that – as the following note from Gibbon and the next chapter will confirm – many of the people involved in the bodies which drew up the creeds had been recruited into the church as a result of syncretism. When Theodosius banned all pagan worship and destroyed or seized all such temples the people of those sects soon got their revenge. Vast numbers of pagan proselytes thronged the churches which accommodated them by slowly adopting the worship of saints and relics to provide an equivalent to pagan mythology. ‘The most respectable bishops,’ says Gibbon, ‘had persuaded themselves that the ignorant rustics would more cheerfully renounce the superstitions of paganism if they found some resemblance, some compensation, in the bosom of Christianity.’”⁶⁹ Many of those proselytes came from sects which recognized more than one deity and they would have therefore been eager to continue with a similar arrangement in Christianity. After all it had only been a matter of jumping from one religious rock to another in conformity with the imperial and military, social and personal currents swirling around them. If they were not comfortable, or if the currents changed again as they had before, the ‘new Christians’ could always jump back the other way. The concept of one solitary God, absolute and exclusive, was certainly new to them because they had not received the benefit of rigorous theological discipline which was an important aspect of Yahwism.

There is ample evidence that the early church had already encouraged the use of multiple religious symbols on the basis that if one symbol did not ‘click’ with a person’s psyche another one might. Some writers still support the use of multiple symbols as an aid to religious celebration. Greeley maintains that: “There is no need at all to limit God’s exuberant graciousness by insisting on only one religious symbol as being fully legitimate for a tradition. ... Jesus died and risen in the ‘privileged’ symbol. God, not being a Calvinist, permits us, indeed encourages us (if the history of religions is any proof) to have other symbols which reflect the core symbol.”⁷⁰ But in that interpretation of the history of religion lies the potential for very serious misunderstanding. Neither God, the prophets of Yahwism as it evolved under the Divine Covenant with the Jewish people, nor Jesus were interested in simply another religion. The mission of the Jewish people and the Messiah was – and still is – is to enable all humanity to reach a more intimate, unclouded understanding of its relationship to God, its obligations to God and its responsibilities to the total human community which flow from that understanding. That requires total concentration on the Divine Will. Everything else is to be a consequence of that and to flow from it.

Greeley, widely recognized for his “most distinguished contribution to Catholic literature,”⁷¹ paints a very effective (even if very irreverent) picture of the interface between the Yahwist community and its pagan neighbours.

...when Yahweh, that pushy old desert Semitic storm god, elbowed his way into human history in the Sinai experience, he quite pointedly warned his followers against the fertility cult. There was only one god, and his name was Yahweh. Whatever other deities might have existed were inferior to him and not to be taken seriously. The cosmos was his show. As he ironically informed Job, humans were not around when he made it. He was not about to abide any competition from the bizarre deities who had set themselves up in the deity business – either male or female.⁷²

The struggle between Yahwism and the more ancient pagan fertility rituals was a long and fierce one, and while Yahweh had pretty well swept the field clear by the time of the Second Temple, the periodic construction of pagan temples and the willingness of some Jews to worship in them despite the denunciations of both the Pharisees and the temple priesthood indicates that the goddesses may have retreated and gone underground, but they were not completely destroyed.⁷³

Greeley chooses language to imply that the pagan gods were living entities rather than products of fertile human imagination, and in this way he illustrates very well the mind set of the people of the day and the task facing the early Christians who were endeavouring to set up a system within which the Messiah's mission could be pursued. However he then suggests ways in which the Yahwists may have combined pagan fertility rites into their worship to make it easier for pagans to adapt to Yahwism and on that basis he proceeds to discuss Christian symbol substitution, or syncretism. He refers in particular to the description of Jesus as the 'New Adam' and the substitution of Mary for the pagan goddesses, as if what had been done within Yahwism (if his interpretation is correct) justified what was done by the early church. That contention is insupportable but, regardless of any debate about that issue, the process was carried out. Thus, considering the circumstances in which they were formulated, it is hardly surprising that the new creeds defied logic and differed greatly from the teachings of both the parent faith and the Messiah in whose name the new system of faith was being developed.

DIVINE AUTHORITY, OR ABUSE OF STATE POWER?

Having failed to convince some of its subjects of its highly illogical faith-solution the church then treated acceptance of the creeds as if it was a vital matter of life and death. It soon became one as the church relied increasingly on coercion, heresy hunting and the use of state powers to impose acceptance of its creed and to maintain its position. It was so imbued with its new state authority and self-misunderstanding that it was incapable of recognizing the stumbling blocks which it was strewing all along the path to salvation. It inhibited an understanding of the absolute authority, love and grace of God and, in human understanding, it restricted the authority and power of God to well below the limits of human comprehension and placed it within the confines of human family structures. It encouraged the belief in a fixed and final point in God's authority which it then took advantage of and compounded as it presented itself as the sole authorized interpreter of that fixed and final point. This was aggravated by the progressive development of ill-conceived Mariology.

From the limited amount of material which is readily available on the discussions of that period it appears that there was little understanding of the nature of the contradictions and the manner in which the church's doctrine and theology were being exposed to eventual ridicule. If there was, then it has largely been suppressed. However it is not surprising that so little material is available. People are not usually inclined to retain material which is critical of a position they have adopted. Thus it is widely accepted that many writings which could have been included in the canon of the New Testament with equal authority and justification as some of those which are included were quietly disposed of or allowed to fade into oblivion. We can assume that many of these 'lost' writings contradicted the prevailing views.

God was portrayed as delegating or even forfeiting to the church the incomprehensible and unrestricted authority and power to exercise such incomprehensible and unrestricted authority and power in any other mode of existence or through any other instrument of the Divine Will. There were to be no other instruments of the Divine will besides the church – unless the church chose to declare them to be so, as it was in the process of doing with Jesus' mother, Mary, and a host of saints. The church soon followed that with the teaching that prophecy had ceased at Pentecost with the establishment of the church. On the basis of Jesus' last recorded conversation with his disciples, the church represented itself as instituted by Christ in the exercise of the authority of the Triune God. In doing so it further restricted the ability of the people to comprehend the totality of Divine authority because, directly linked to that delegation of authority was another spurious teaching. That teaching was that the world wide community of Judaism ("the Jews") had forfeited or been deprived of any role in the Divine Plan except to demonstrate that it (or they) had been superseded by the church. What we have of that conversation in the King James version, published in 1611, is:

All power is given unto me in heaven and in earth. Go ye therefore, and teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost: Teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you: and, lo, I am with you alway, even unto the end of the world.

Matthew 28:18–20 [King James]

Twentieth century translations, taking into account some additional source material, replace the simple words "teach all nations" with the words "make disciples of all nations" (RSV and Jerusalem), or "make all nations my disciples" (NEB). Similarly these translations use the word "authority" in place of "power". Both substitutions alter the meaning of the passage significantly. The word "disciples" introduces the concept of personal allegiance, and "authority" introduces the notion of institutional decision making rather than simply the capacity to act. These translations therefore lend greater support to the church's contention that it was 'commissioned'. However there is nothing to indicate that Jesus was telling his disciples to leave the Jewish community or faith, or to establish a separate church. They were simply to go and teach and baptize in his name. The meaning of the term 'Father' as Jesus used it had not changed. Neither had the faith, the Law or the message of the prophets which they were to teach. He had said very definitely that he had come not to abolish them but to complete them. His Gospel message simply complimented them. This is consistent with the fact that the disciples stayed and preached in synagogues until some of their teachings became so embarrassing that they were expelled between 85 and 90 CE, some fifteen to twenty years after the destruction of Jerusalem.

That separation, the church's anti-Jewish politicking and the development of its creeds and doctrines all contributed to undermining the teaching and love of the Messiah upon which people were invited to base their relationships and produced in its place a regime of fear and uncertainty. But in addition it strengthened the barriers between Christians and Jews, progressively increased the strength of the challenge which would ultimately be required to demolish it, and made it ever more difficult for Christian theologians who may have wished to, to dismantle the doctrines on which it was built. There certainly were some, but they were in the minority and they realized that, in the circumstances of the time, if they dismantled those parts of doctrine which propped up the church's warped self-understanding and its rejection of Judaism the entire system of beliefs which underpinned the institution of the church would be discredited. The church in its contemporary form as a state institution would have come under attack and may have been rejected or dismantled in exactly the same way that the emperors had dealt with the religions which had gone before it. They seem to have believed that it was better to have people worship God within a flawed Christian institution rather than either leave them with no Christian institution, encourage them to turn to Judaism – or possibly see the state return to pagan rites or animism. In any case they had little hope of surviving the church's heresy hunting techniques if they tried to expose and eliminate the doctrines which they saw as flawed. Some meekly submitted but, as we shall see, some moved elsewhere and started separate sects

THE BIGGEST STUMBLING BLOCK ...

Thus the fact that the Athanasian Creed – being the most detailed statement of the church's obligatory Trinitarian belief – was the dominant statement of belief of the Western Church during a long and critical period of its development is of paramount importance. Apart from sidetracking church leaders and theologians who were caught up in defending it and diverting so much effort from productive enterprise, it provided the foundation for the church's continuing self-understanding, attitudes and actions. By conditioning the attitudes of both believers and non-believers who were subjected to it either directly or indirectly, that creed did more than any other single piece of writing to generate the "God's own" complex among Christians, to inhibit or even prevent an understanding of other faiths, and to generate and entrench bigotry, racism and anti-Semitism within Christianity. There is a striking similarity between the sentiments expressed in the Athanasian Creed and by Cyprian about a hundred years earlier during the factional struggles of the pre-Constantinian era, that there is no salvation outside the church. The church disregarded the fact that such teaching is in direct contradiction to Christ's teaching on personal conduct and judgement – a contradiction which is readily appreciated from a reading of the Beatitudes (Matthew 5:3–12), the parable of the Good Samaritan (Luke 10:30–37) or his teaching on the last judgement, known as the parable of the sheep and the goats (Matthew 25:31–46). It also disregarded the fact that the expression “God's own” properly applies to all people and not simply to the people of the church which had usurped the role of the Jewish community as people “chosen” for a particular task.

But it also placed dogma before faith and in doing so it drew another distinction between the positions of Judaism and the church. The Jewish understanding of God and the Holy Spirit was based on faith in a covenant relationship of trust. On the other hand, although the church insisted that its teaching on the Trinity and the incarnation was also based on faith in a covenant relationship, it had been diverted by the writer of John's Gospel. By acting to take advantage of his new idea of the incarnation it had compromised faith by imposing acceptance of dogma under duress: “Whosoever will be saved: before all things it is necessary that he hold the Catholick Faith. Which faith except everyone do keep whole and undefiled: without doubt he shall perish everlastingly.”⁷⁴ This put the biggest of the stumbling blocks in the way of Christians in their relations with non-Christians. It stimulated the numbers game approach to missionary work and it was an affront to all non-Christians.

The Creed of Saint Athanasius was therefore also an affront to God. If Biblical history, the teachings and prophecies of the Torah, and the Gospels were to be taken seriously it was to be expected that there would be a divine reaction and ultimately divine judgement, which could involve retribution, if the church failed to recognize its failings and mend its ways. But the church's teaching had the effect of encouraging the belief that although Divine Judgement had been exercised against the people of Judah when they lost sight of their covenant responsibilities the same Divine Judgement would not, or could not, be exercised against the church in a similar situation. The “blind guides” who put stumbling blocks of religious observance in the way of the people, who “neglected the weightier matters of the Law – justice, mercy (and) good faith”, and who “shut up the kingdom of heaven in men's faces”⁷⁵ were certainly not all among the church's Jewish forerunners.

Many Christians now like to disregard the Athanasian Creed and to deny its impact, especially now that its use in most church services of worship and teaching is no longer obligatory. However its dominant influence over many centuries is demonstrated by the fact that the Book of Common Prayer of the Church of England states that:

“Upon ...Christmas Day ... Easter Day, Ascension Day, Whitsunday ... Trinity Sunday [and a list of nine other feast days] shall be sung or said at Morning Prayer, instead of the Apostles' Creed, this Confession of our Christian Faith, commonly called the Creed of Saint Athanasius, by the Minister and people standing.”

Even though it has not, in fact, been in regular use in many churches for many years the formal liturgy of the church still required it to be said. In Australia, for example, its use was made optional in 1977 with the adoption of an Anglican Prayer Book for Australia, but the text of the creed was still included in the book. It therefore cannot be denied as an article of faith. To do so is to admit a mockery of the faith. On the other hand, not to do so is also to admit a mockery of the faith.

Although Athanasius won round one at Nicaea and later became Bishop of Alexandria, the post which had been denied to Arius, all was not beer and skittles for him. He was driven into exile by supporters of Arius five times! Neither did the adoption of the Nicene Creed solve the strained relationships within the church. Again, quoting Wells:

*Orthodoxy became a test not only for Christian office, but for Christian trade and help. A small point of doctrine might mean affluence or beggary to a man. It is difficult to read the surviving literature of the time without a strong sense of the dogmatism, the spites, rivalries, and pedantries of the men who tore Christianity to pieces for the sake of these theological refinements.*⁷⁶

Other disputes developed around related issues which, for the layman and the non-Christian, all appear to be very much one basic issue. The next in notoriety was probably the Apollinarian controversy over the nature of Jesus. In 360 CE a bishop in Laodicea, Apollinarius, expounded the belief that “the divine nature took the place of the human nature in Christ; that Jesus on earth was not man, but God alone in human form. The majority of bishops and theologians held that the personality of Jesus Christ was a union of God and man, deity and humanity in one nature.”⁷⁷ This “heresy of Apollinarius” was condemned by a Council of Constantinople in 381 CE, together with the heresy of Macedonianism, about the same time that the Athanasian Creed – reflecting all three controversies – came into use.

Other students in this enlightened age may also find the reasoning and the actions of the principal actors in these dramas which divided nations, retarded progress and led to distress, conflict and human degradation on a mind-boggling scale something of a paradox. If they do they are in good company. From Wells again:

*“...even if we think that these attempts to say exactly how God was related to himself were presumptuous and intellectually monstrous, nevertheless we are bound to recognize that beneath these preposterous refinements of impossible dogmas there lay often a real passion for truth, even if it was truth ill conceived.”*⁷⁸

Perhaps Wells’ sympathy is a little misplaced. After all the aim of the exercise was supposed to be the salvation of mankind according to a pattern of love and reconciliation exemplified by the life of the Messiah in whose name the whole beastly business was being pursued.

But back to Constantine to pick up the threads again. His new state church had to have status, procedures and trappings in keeping with its role as an instrument of the great Roman Empire. He had founded the Church of St. Peter over the tomb of Peter the Apostle in the midst of a pagan necropolis on the Vatican Hill in about 320 CE while he was still associate emperor. Now, as sole emperor, he directed that large impressive churches be built at state expense in Jerusalem and Bethlehem. A little later he ordered one to be built in his new capital of Constantinople. In other cities the pagan temples were consecrated as churches of the new state religion. The funds from the public treasury which had previously supported “the temples of the gods” were now directed to the Christian Church. Its bishops, priests and officials were soon very well endowed indeed. Already, in 313, less than a year after his victory over Maxentius at the Milvian Bridge, Constantine had made a gift to the bishop of Rome of the Lateran Palace. Payment for services rendered. Its clergy were relieved of the payment of taxes. For them the public duties considered obligatory for ordinary mortals were waived. Special ecclesiastical courts were established to hear charges against them, they were generally placed above the civil laws of the land and bishops were given judicial status.

Services of worship soon lost the sense of community and of inspired dedication which had been a characteristic of the years of persecution. Simplicity gave way to ceremonial, pomp and splendour. With safety no longer at risk, and with the prizes of social and political power and financial benefits dangling before their greedy eyes, unscrupulous men of ambition scrambled for church offices. Moral integrity and humility before God gave way to corruption and arrogance. Pagan ceremonials were adopted increasingly and the use of vestments was introduced. Religious observance became the price of privilege. As the authority of the bishop of Rome increased because of his position as a very senior public official, so the grip of the hierarchy tightened, the structures of the institution became more rigid, the mystical hold of the priest over his communicants increased, force was used increasingly to suppress men of unorthodox religious beliefs and the role of the priests was interpreted more and more as that of an intermediary between man and God. He became an invoker of divine privileges including the forgiving of sins. He became less and less a leader and preacher. It seems that the use of images also began to creep in about the time of Constantine’s rule in spite of earlier intense opposition to such things on well established Biblical grounds. This is hardly surprising in view of the simple and direct transference of masses of people from pagan religions to Christianity at the drop of a hat, or at least an edict or two. There is a record of a request from Constantine’s sister to Bishop Eusebius at Caesarea that he provide a portrait of Christ. The request was refused. But more of that later.

What a pitiful plight the church had got itself into. The guidelines set down by Jesus for individual and group conduct, the clear warnings of the pitfalls which he gave and his scathing criticisms of the Jewish religious order of his day, as recorded in documents which the church was then busy canonizing, seem to have had very little effect on it. The church, as a body of people, had already engineered itself into an institutional position in which it was to be less and less able to fulfill its proper role as an instrument of God’s will. Perhaps it was even unable to understand that role but, fortunately, the picture wasn’t entirely black.

... BUT SOME WORTHY ACHIEVEMENTS

A number of important reforms were carried out in the Roman Empire of the period. The basis of the “western ethic” had been laid, for better or for worse. Among the changes which can be credited to the early church are the abolition of crucifixion as a method of executing criminals; the outlawing of the practices of smothering or abandoning unwanted babies, or collecting them for sale into slavery; and the introduction of limited rights at law for slaves who, at that time, made up more than half the population of the Roman republic. However the church cannot claim much of the credit for the gradual elimination of slavery because it was largely circumstantial. According to R.H. Barrow: “As wars of expansion ceased, captives were scarcer, and barbarians made bad slaves; the economic fallacy of slavery in agriculture and industry became clearer and standards of humanity were raised. From the lowest motives of freedom it was discovered that, the nearer the lot of a slave approached to that of a free man, the more useful he was.”⁷⁹ On the other hand the church can claim much of the credit for the eventual prohibition of gladiatorial battles as a punishment for criminals and as public spectacles, and it cannot be denied that there was a considerable improvement in the moral condition of Roman society-at-large. This improvement was reflected in a growing acceptance of the sanctity of human life. The attitudes of people towards their fellows began to change and there was wider acceptance of the belief that human life has some sort of meaning and purpose.

There has always been a natural tendency for those who hold effective power to assume that with their era man’s overall mental capacity has reached its peak, that social order in their society has reached a natural plateau and that their religious views, being basic to their other views, are the ultimate. These assumptions have provided a basis or a justification for them to maintain the status quo. Such assumptions have not always, of course, been shared by the academic elite. They have more often shared with the social underdogs the role of change agents, although the focus of the alliance has usually been the redistribution of existing wealth and material improvement rather than changes in man’s beliefs.

However since the industrial revolution this pattern has been disrupted. All social groups have realized the immense potential for material change and religious and philosophical thinking has been thrown into confusion. The general attitude has shifted to one of expectation of continuing material change which is assumed to be desirable. The roles of the power groups and the academic elite have tended to be reversed. The groups holding economic power have been joined by the underdogs wielding political power through the organization of unions and societies of one sort or another. Together they want to press on for material change. It is the academic elite who are leading the push to apply the brakes in the belief that uncontrolled material development is not necessarily consistent with social and philosophical progress. The process of change in all respects has been speeded up. We have a more dynamic and fluid world situation than ever before. But even now, seventy or so generations after Christ, we still find it difficult to agree on, or to define, the meaning and purpose of human life. We are still in the process of evolution and the development of human thought. When we consider these things we can hardly be surprised that Roman attitudes towards human life changed slowly and painfully two thousand years ago. Right through the trouble in the triangle we come face to face with the process of change but two particular situations help to put the process in perspective. One is the life and times of Augustine which we will come to in a little while and the other is the prohibition of gladiatorial games.

Human sacrifice for religious purposes at funerals or to appease the gods for any number of reasons had been a feature of many religions, possibly as long as two thousand years before Christ, and it continued as a feature of some cultures until relatively recent times.⁸⁰ The killing of men and women for the entertainment of the mob, either in cold blooded ceremonial or in combat to the death, seems to have evolved from such religious ceremonies four or five centuries before Christ. It also seems to have gone through a pre-entertainment phase of public slaughter of prisoners of war, possibly in retaliation for aggression or simply as a way of getting rid of more excess enemy troops. Then in 264 BCE formal organized combat between gladiators was held in Rome itself for the first time. By 105 BCE the events had grown in popularity so much that they were sometimes spread over several days and in that year the two consuls sponsored the first official state games. Whatever revulsion there was among thinking people of the day was far outweighed by the enthusiastic response from the majority. "Schools" for gladiators sprung up throughout Italy and it became the accepted practice that criminals were sentenced to the schools, together with any other undesirables, prisoners of war and surplus or selected slaves.

A series of uprisings by gladiators reached a peak with the efforts of Spartacus to bring down the system in 73 BCE. The result was even tighter controls to make sure it couldn't happen again, and successive emperors provided more lavish shows. Pompey, Julius Caesar, Octavian and Antony all had thousands of gladiators in their schools. Julius Caesar arranged an extravaganza to celebrate his victories in 46 BCE. He staged a gladiatorial battle with five hundred infantry, thirty cavalry and twenty elephants on either side. Whatever their personal views may have been his successors found it necessary to stage the games in order to maintain their popularity and to hold onto office. They apparently reached a peak under Trajan from 107 to 113 CE, but later emperors could not afford to disappoint their people and in 248 CE Phillip put on a Roman celebration with thousands of fighters pitched against each other. When the Christians began to take a stand against the games they very soon found themselves being invited to join the schools! Thousands of Jewish captives had, of course, gone the same way after their uprisings in Jerusalem and the Christians could not claim to have been subjected to exclusive treatment on account of their religious beliefs, but they did at last begin to have a real impact on public and government opinion and actions.⁸¹

It was while he was in Beirut, then called Berytus, in 326 CE, a matter of months after the Council of Nicaea, that Constantine issued an edict which purported to abolish gladiatorial games altogether.⁸² It is only an assumption, although a reasonable one, that he issued that edict as a result of pressure from that Council of Nicaea. He required that all criminals who otherwise would have been "enrolled" for the games must serve forced labour in the mines instead. That was often considered a fate worse than death and although that measure may have been enforced as an alternative to the games, the prohibition of the games was not enforced. It was not long before Constantine had gone back on the edict himself and, in his other religious role as Pontifex Maximus, agreed that the municipal priests in Umbria should continue to arrange gladiatorial shows. What is more, he advised that their colleagues in Etruscan towns should combine forces and concentrate their displays at their main religious centre.

The Christian Church at Rome ruled ineligible for baptism all trainers of gladiators, their connections and even the gladiators themselves,⁸³ as if they all took part as a fee-will exercise! There were, despite the nature of the “sport”, always some slaves prepared to buy their freedom by volunteering for a term as gladiators, and also freed slaves and some soldiers of fortune who were prepared to take the risks involved for the chance of a big reward. It is no wonder that regardless of such rulings by the newly official religious authority of the empire, the “December games” at Rome which were given by the state were still listed in the annual festivals as late as 354 CE. Constantius, in 357, and Valentinian, about 365, both tried to suppress or at least reduce the games. Constantius tried by punishing state officials and soldiers who were involved in them. Valentinian prohibited magistrates from ordering Christians into schools for gladiators. That must have recruited some very colourful personalities into the church. But then he also prohibited monks and the clergy from accepting lucrative benefactions from wealthy widows, spinsters and virgins who had been attracted into the church and who received the intimate attention of the monks.

As late as 392 CE gladiators were still performing in Antioch and it was not until 399 CE that Honorius closed the last of the schools in Rome. As we shall see later, that was the same year in which he used imperial agents to forcibly close all pagan shrines in North Africa, and Rome was already in complete confusion with Honorius having to raise and finance the largest armies he could muster in preparation for the expected push from the Goths in the east. It is most unlikely that Christian ethics had as much to do with his decision to close the last of the gladiatorial schools as the politics of military manpower and economic pressures. However even the closing of the schools didn’t finish the games. They are thought to have continued – man against man – until about 440CE and the refinement of man against wild beast was still permitted in places for another two hundred and forty years. They seem to have finally passed into Roman history in 681CE.⁸⁴ From what we know of the church’s intervention to stop the games and in such matters as the treatment of children and slaves it can quite fairly be said that changes in the Roman community’s understanding of humanity and also changes in its moral attitudes and conduct took place more quickly under the influence of the young Christian church than if pre-Messianic Yahwism had been left to take its course. Certainly they took place more quickly than if Jesus had not lived out his ministry or if both Jews and Christians had not been thrown out of Jerusalem and across the Roman Empire. However the granting and acceptance of state-religion status for Christianity combined with the theological interpretations of the day to produce a concoction of evil which would retard human progress for many centuries. The first murky fogs were just settling. Europe had to struggle through a very dark and cold winter before sharp rays of spring conscience could cut through the mesh of ecclesiastical intrigue, barbarism and the theological garbage which was settling over it and permit another stage in humanity's movement towards salvation.

The brightest aspect of that phase of Christian history surely must be the fact that through enforced contact with the church and the Bible the Roman Empire provided a massive pool of people with the potential to carry the message of salvation throughout the world very quickly when the opportunity arose. Some readers may find that sufficient justification for the beastly actions taken to enforce the party line. However it is very hard to apply the same reasoning in support of the pre-Constantinian church fathers. Others may suggest that literacy levels were so low in those days that very few people would have been able to understand what the church was all about if freedom of thought and interpretation had been allowed. But that would raise the question "is an understanding of doctrine or participation in complicated liturgies necessary for salvation?" and Christ had already given an answer to that question: a decisive 'No.' In any case the unfolding history of the trouble in the triangle shows that the spread of the Good News would have been much more effective if the early church fathers had taken a completely different tack. In particular it shows that the spread and understanding of the Good News would have been much more effective if the early church fathers had not devised the pathetic Creed of Saint Athanasius in a bid to prop up its misguided Trinitarian teaching and to distance itself from Judaism.

CHAPTER 3

TO HUNT A HERETIC

It is a fascinating exercise to daydream about what Christianity would have been like without Constantine. But a little pointless. He changed the rules of the game completely. It was not just the church and his empire which were to be affected by his decisions. Most of the world was outside his understanding but he took it all with him into a new era. His decisions were the decisions, firstly, of a military commander; secondly, of a politician; and thirdly, of a man intensely ambitious for personal authority and the means of maintaining that authority. His decisions radically altered the circumstances and the environment in which the church would develop. When the church and the political successors to the Roman Empire eventually found their way into the enormous bulk of the world which lay beyond Europe they were still pre-conditioned and inhibited by the theology, attitudes and systems which Constantine's decisions had ushered in, even though there had been a partial reformation in the meantime.

The background to Constantine's decisions, which we have already considered, makes his attitude towards religious institutions little different to that of British politicians and industrialists of the Victorian period, the majority of Western military and political leaders today and, in particular, the former United States Secretary of State John Foster Dulles. Dulles used the Judeo-Christian sympathies of Americans in his cold war stance towards Communist Russia. The Victorian British used the church as a means of bolstering conservative British interests in India and elsewhere. Current Western military leaders see the role of the church and its chaplains as the maintenance of morale in their respective armed forces and, thus, as an instrument in the maintenance of the political status quo.

Whatever criticisms may be levelled at the pre-Constantinian church for its progressive development of institutionalism and doctrine and for the way it went about that development, it is difficult to be critical of the motives of the people involved. They saw the development of organized church communities and structures as a logical progression from the Judaism with which they were no longer associated either because they had rejected it or because they had been expelled from it. They realized that it was only within a framework of community that a commitment could be maintained – any commitment to any cause – in the face of both personal and officially sponsored abuse and oppression. They knew that some sort of community and leadership was necessary to sustain and to nurture faith and to assist the process of personal growth. They also knew that an organized group could do things such as planning social support and action programs, which the teachings of Jesus required of them, more effectively than if they were each content to do their own thing. They also knew from Jesus' teachings and writings such as the Letter of James that faith without action is dead. The Letter of James has traditionally been attributed to James the brother of Jesus, (although studies in recent years have disputed this), and it is widely regarded as having been written either in 49 CE, immediately before the first of Paul's letters, or about 57 or 58 CE as a rejoinder to what Paul had already written.^{1 2}

However the motivating forces and the motives began to change. Constantine took advantage of the process and helped it along. By the time he became emperor the Christian community's dependence on clerical oversight, the adherence to doctrine and rites as a basic component of church life and membership, and disciplinary procedures to enforce conformity had already appeared and begun to spread. Their adoption and extension accelerated once Christianity became the official Roman state religion. Membership of the church with its position of monopoly control over all spiritual and moral matters within the state became an end in itself. Close personal contact between Christians had been inevitable when they were living in communities which were either not aligned with their faith or which were openly antagonistic towards it. This provided a stimulus for support and nurture within each small Christian community in precisely the same way as in Jewish communities. It also stirred a dedication and determination something like the dedication and determination for which Jewish communities were well known wherever they were dispersed in the Diaspora and which later became a hallmark of the ghettos of Europe.³

Such intimate community life was therefore a vehicle towards personal fulfillment and salvation and was, by its very nature, a program of evangelism. In this sense the church's influence began to wane even though its power over people's lives and over the actions of governments was increasing, as also was its wealth. The decrees of councils of the church were published as imperial laws and they were thereby officially incorporated into the political life of the empire. Such power and authority naturally required a means of administration, lines of command and the means to enforce that command. As always happens that power and authority changed the relationships between the people exercising it and the people who were subject to it.

A pyramid with a sole and absolute decision maker at the top is often justified as the most efficient and decisive system of command. The Roman Empire had one. As the church suddenly found itself working hand in glove with the machinery of state there was an even stronger incentive than there had been before for it to develop a parallel structure. But a pyramid tends to destroy both initiative in subordinate group-action and spontaneity in individual action. It destroys equality and in doing so it tends to undermine goodwill in personal relationships. It encourages domination and monopoly. These in turn encourage intolerance, arrogant opposition to competition by those in positions of power, potentially bitter competition between those seeking power and suppression of any moves to introduce changes or alternatives. In practice a monopoly also tends to lose sight of the need to justify its monopoly position and, indeed, to lose its sense of purpose. It gropes its way into additional areas of interest like an octopus in the murky depths. From these points of view the pyramid is the worst form of social organization and the church is a social organization.

A THEOCRATIC STATE?

Its elevation to a spiritual monopoly position resulted in the church attempting to establish a theocratic state.⁴ The action could not be matched to the desire. We can, in fact, trace the degrading chain reaction which led to exactly the reverse. What was to be a theocratic state turned out to be a series of morally void dictatorships of great violence and repression. It allowed the accumulation of wealth by the church on a scale approaching fantasy through a chain of state grants, military conquests, personal manipulation, corruption – and extortion on a grand scale in the name of religious rites. It ultimately led to the misuse of the entire package on such a scale and with such far-reaching consequences that we find it hard to grasp.

It was Constantine's decree in 324 that Christianity was to be the state religion of the Roman Empire which made it possible for the church's visionaries to think in terms of a theocratic state. But they misjudged human nature very badly. They assumed a greater knowledge of the world than they had and they gave their fellows credit for far greater moral integrity than was justified. However in the circumstances they could hardly be expected to anticipate the consequences of their own pronouncements or the ways in which they would later be misinterpreted and misused. They were in fact helping to fashion the mesh of ecclesiastical intrigue, barbarism and theological garbage which settled over Europe. It was to be just twelve centuries before that mesh was cut by sharp rays of conscience from within the system which they set up. In the meantime it had been given a good shake from the outside after about three hundred years but this, unfortunately, had proved unequal to the task.

Constantine has often been described as being very tolerant and this tends to be born out by his intervention on behalf of Arius when Athanasius and the Trinitarians of Alexandria, being victorious in the battle of the Council of Nicaea, wanted to excommunicate him. But paradox follows paradox. Athanasius was himself banished by Constantine because of the excessive pressure tactics used against Arius and the Arians – and then Constantine set about insisting on religious conformity. This was necessary in his view to achieve religious stability and this in turn was a precondition for political stability which he needed to maintain his position. After all he had not gained his position by either election by the senate or by appointment by his predecessor, but by intrigue and force of arms after having been passed over by Diocletian who had appointed Galerius as First Augustus when he announced his own abdication. ⁵ Such action was hardly the mark of a man of great tolerance. Neither was his earlier intervention with troops to restore unity in North Africa when the Donatists had been unwilling to accept the decision of the Council held at Arles. ⁶ However, if to hold the office of Pontifex Maximus in two vigorously antagonistic and contradictory religious systems at the same time is to be considered a hallmark of toleration, then who are we to deny that Constantine was tolerant?

There is one set of circumstances of which we can be certain. Constantine needed the support of the Christian Church to maintain his personal position and the church was eager to take advantage of Constantine's protection, patronage and hand-outs. It was willing to accept both his authority in spiritual matters and his dual religious roles. These factors combined to ensure the adoption of pagan rites and reasoning into Christianity and its liturgy. There was syncretism on a grand scale. They also made it absolutely certain that the church was meshed into two things. Firstly it had to justify and to defend with vigour the actions which it took and the theology which it adopted. Secondly it had to act out the most fantastic verbal and political gymnastics to maintain some semblance of logic and continuity in the parallel streams of its theology, liturgy, practices and social actions.

Under Constantine Christianity did not radically displace earlier pagan beliefs and customs. It incorporated and Christianized them.⁷ Pagan polytheism found a new outlet in the veneration of the saints. Poseidon-Neptune, the guardian of sailors and boatmen, was, for example, simply succeeded by St. Nicholas as their patron saint. The cult of the goddess Diana of Ephesus appears to have given way to the cult of the Virgin Mary who was first honored as "the Mother of God" in that city. The characteristic features of the Roman festival of Parentalia were transferred to the Feast of All Souls. Saturnalia, the festival of the promise of the sun's return which was celebrated just after the shortest day of the year, became the Christian festival of the birth of the light of the world. The Roman spring festival for the return of life which probably corresponded with the feast of the Saxon goddess Oestre in Britain was adapted to become the celebration of the resurrection of Jesus at Easter and this was linked to the Jewish Passover which is the historically authentic occasion on which to remember the death of Jesus. At first the early church had confined its celebration to the first day of the week at the Passover as the day of resurrection or the Lord's Day. In much the same way, although superstitious belief effectively denies the supremacy of a divine Creator-God and therefore Christian faith and superstition are completely incompatible, Christianity accepted superstition, became riddled with it and has remained riddled with it to the present day.

But what do we know about Constantine's attitude towards Judaism? In the early stages of his reign, and especially in the Rescript of Milan, he required that all religions be treated equally.

*...Note that at the same time [that Christians shall not be molested] all others are to be allowed the free and unrestricted practice of their religions; for it accords with the good order of the realm and peacefulness of our times that each should have freedom to worship God after his own choice; and we do not intend to detract from the honor due to any religion or its followers...*⁸

Certainly no sign of bigotry or antagonism there. More like the tolerance for which Constantine is usually known. However the church quite clearly saw Judaism as a rival. As its own position strengthened because of Constantine's dependence on it so did its arrogant opposition to Judaism, its efforts to dissociate itself from its parent and its pressure on the emperor to suppress it. Manipulation by the church as it issued edicts which carried the same force as civil edicts, pointed in the same direction. The revision of the Roman calendar to avoid holidays, festivals and commemorations corresponding with dates of religious significance to Judaism is a good example.

Thus the imperial attitude hardened progressively. We find that while Judaism had been described as “a distinguished religion, certainly permissible”, it became, during Constantine’s reign, “a sacrilegious gathering” and then “a nefarious sect.” Then in 329, four years after the Council of Nicaea and while the Trinitarian Dispute was at its height, Jews were forbidden to have Christian slaves in their possession and to convert those who were pagan. Converts, and also those responsible for their conversion, were menaced with threats of the death penalty; intermarriage between Jews and Christians was forbidden; rejection of the faith was encouraged and those who rejected it were given legal protection. Christianization just had to be carried out.

9

In 330 Constantine founded Constantinople as his new Christian seat. The reasoning that led him to that decision certainly would have involved many considerations. It has been suggested that he did it because the continued distinctly pagan character of Rome, despite his having elevated Christianity to the role of state religion, no longer pleased him. However he had declared his final bid for universal domination to be a religious war. This was his battle in 324 with Licinius who had continued as co-emperor with him. The pretext for the battle was that Licinius had continued to persecute Christians in the eastern provinces of the empire in spite of having signed both the rescript of Milan with Constantine in 312 and the Edict of Toleration initiated by Galerius the year before that.¹⁰ It is therefore apparent that he had to pay off the church or at least demonstrate his good faith to that body which had made his victory and his absolute power possible. It is also apparent that he had to stimulate the spread of the church throughout his empire and to ensure for it an undisputed position if he was to achieve political stability through unification.

A consequence which he does not appear to have foreseen was competition for supremacy between the bishops of Rome and Constantinople. If he had anticipated it he must have considered that he could suppress it. Was it perhaps a consideration in his decision that the Council of Nicaea, just a few months later, would be dominated by clergy from the eastern provinces without the bishop of Rome present? In any case the struggle for supremacy soon became apparent. The Christian church had shown a tendency to develop an autocratic and pyramidal structure almost from the time that it was excluded, together with Judaism, from Jerusalem. This tendency was encouraged by the nature of the political environment within which it was evolving and the tendency soon became an over-riding characteristic when the church was integrated into the judicial, administrative and financial structures of the state and had money, favours and privileges lavished on it.

It was almost inevitable that its structures would run in parallel with those of the state and that it would have regional sub-structures of the same nature. It was also almost inevitable that there would be competition for a dominant position which could be equated to the supreme civil or political position and which would carry the same absolute authority in the religious field. Under the circumstances it is doubtful if competition between Rome and Constantinople could have been avoided. It is also doubtful whether competition between the church and secular authorities could have been avoided once the church had been built, quite deliberately, into a wealthy autocratic arm of government. The church was able to remind the secular authority that its leader was no longer accorded divine status by the population which it governed. It was also able to make claims that its authority and its decisions flowed directly from God. The establishment of Constantinople as the religious capital for the empire therefore backfired. While Constantine expected his move to have a stabilizing effect it had quite the reverse effect. It was very soon compounding the troubles of his empire.

For some time the presiding bishops in major centres had adopted the titles of patriarchs or metropolitans. Those in Jerusalem, Antioch and Alexandria had been competing with those in Rome for supremacy within the church. Now the patriarch of Constantinople naturally joined the group of competitors and the contest soon narrowed to Rome versus Constantinople. By virtue of its well known association with two of the most influential apostles, Peter and Paul, and because it was the historical seat of the empire, Rome was still able to press its claims with conviction. In addition it had weathered the storms of the most bitter persecutions. It had helped put Constantine into his position of absolute authority and it had the benefit of massive wealth which had been showered on it by Constantine for some years. The church in Rome was therefore in a more virile condition than the church in Constantinople. The new church was only then having to cope with a big influx of submissive but unenthusiastic members – perhaps subjects may be a better word – who had been “converted” at the stroke of a pen and at the whim of the alien emperor. Rome won. It was about this time that the bishops of Rome adopted the title ‘pope’ and began to exert their influence with even greater determination. Friction increased. Theological disputes tended to take on a territorial alignment.

CONSTANTINE’S BAPTISM: A MATTER OF INTERPRETATION

In spite of the interdependence between Constantine and the church he did not formally become a Christian by baptism until 337 when he was on his death bed. Historians offer numerous explanations for this. Some say his was a Christianity of purely political convenience and that he was basically pagan in belief to the end. Others maintain that he was a genuine convert and that his Christianity was sincere. They say that it was out of a desire not to offend pagans for whom he was still Pontifex Maximus, (chief priest), that he did not take formal membership by the procedure of baptism which the church insisted on for all lesser mortals. Whatever the explanation might be, his conduct was highly contradictory. He had, after all, presided at the church’s councils and insisted on having the ultimate say in questions of appointment to church offices and equal status with the bishops in theological discussions. He exercised substantial personal influence in the wording of the Nicene Creed and did not simply preside while the bishops debated.

The absence of the bishop of Rome from that critical council and the weighting of representation forty or fifty to one in favour of eastern bishops suggests several things. It suggests that at the time of the council of Nicaea either competition between Rome and Constantinople had not reached a serious level (for surely the bishop of Rome would have made an effort to be at Nicaea despite his age if competition had been an issue) or that Constantine was deliberately currying favour with the eastern provinces after having ousted co-emperor Licinius only the year before. He fraternized with all the bishops but especially with those who had been persecuted under Licinius.¹¹ In addition the absence of the Bishop of Rome certainly suggests that the primacy of the Bishop of Rome within the church was not well defined. It also suggests that a solution to the Trinitarian dispute between Athanasius and Arius was seen more in terms of a political or parochial settlement of a localized eastern issue, rather than as the determination of a fundamental theological question which was basic to the future of religious thought throughout the world. If it were otherwise, an effort would have been made to have a wider cross section of the church present. After all, Nicaea has since been much vaunted as the first ecumenical council. And again, the way the council was organized suggests that Constantine's personal position as church supremo was undisputed. Was he looking for theological truths or only political stability?

How would Constantine respond, today, to the suggestion that he could not have remained in the office of Pontifex Maximus if he were sincere in his belief in the Trinitarian doctrines which he had helped to frame? Did he perhaps hold the view that if there could be three separate identifiable presences of God all at the one time then there could be four, five or any number? If that were the case, then was there any conflict between the doctrine of the Trinity and his parents' earlier adherence to monotheistic belief in the sun god Mithra? How would the church respond to the same suggestion?

To add to the confusion, we find when we look at the circumstances of Constantine's baptism that it was an Arian and not a Trinitarian who actually baptized him on his death bed. It was Bishop Eusebius of Nicomedia.¹² Eusebius was a friend of Arius. Arius had been excommunicated for his beliefs by a synod at Alexandria and banished from the city a few years before the Council of Nicaea. His friends, Eusebius among them, managed to engineer his return to Alexandria. Bitter disputes, secret night meetings and even street riots broke out. It was then that Constantine summoned the Council of Nicaea. Eusebius was among the seventeen bishops who supported and defended Arius. When the Trinitarian view prevailed, Constantine – not the council – ordered them all exiled as the worst enemies of the true faith. Three years later he sent for Eusebius and had him reinstated at Nicomedia.¹³ Nine years later, in spite of the ebb and flow of anti-Arian persecution and Constantine's vigorous support for the official Trinitarian line, it was to this man that he turned for baptism on his death bed.

Could it be that for fifteen or twenty years Constantine had supported the Trinitarian line purely on the basis of the political numbers game and that he hadn't ever really accepted the thinking behind it? He had convened the Council of Nicaea on the suggestion of Hosius, bishop of Cordova, his ecclesiastical adviser who took a leading part in the council and who was a vigorous champion of Athanasius. Was it purely a personal friendship developed out of adversity that made him call on Eusebius? Certainly his sons were vigorously Arian and Constantius treated Hosius to a touch of violence to help him change his mind on one occasion.¹⁴ There is also another possible explanation for Constantine's delayed baptism. It is his interpretation of the practice of baptism. Even today the way in which Christians understand and practice baptism varies widely. To some it is a symbol of repentance, recognition of Jesus as Saviour and a commitment to personal living and action in the manner that the Gospel requires. To some it is simply an act which admits a person into the fellowship of the Christian Church. To some it is a public undertaking by the baptized person's parents or sponsors that they will provide a proper spiritual education and encourage the baptized person to make an act of confirmation as a Christian at a later date. To others it is a joyous acknowledgment that their Lord and Saviour loves them, forgives them, calls them to a life of love and service and offers them eternal life. To still others it is a means by which all sin committed by them prior to baptism is washed away, enabling them to make a fresh start, while to others it is a rite without which a person cannot be redeemed or admitted into the chosen heavenly flock.

Of course there are still other interpretations of the meaning of baptism and a person's understanding of its meaning largely determines his or her attitude to whether baptism is a matter for infants, youths or adults. However from about the middle of the second century the church tended to place more and more emphasis on the ritualistic washing away of sins and admission into the redeemed flock. At the same time the practice of the Eucharist was being formalized and tied to the presence of the clergy. When the church was recognized by the empire as a legitimate religious organization and then formally linked to it, the rites of baptism and the Eucharist which had been encouraged, became obsessions cloaked in mystery. The offer of heavenly forgiveness through the rite of baptism was a carrot which was dangled before the eyes of pagans as an incentive to adopt Christianity. Many Christians postponed baptism in the way that Constantine may have in order to reduce the possibility of post-baptismal sin.¹⁵ Such sin, it was said, had to be accounted for on death and the day of judgement at the feet of the Lord. Sin before baptism ceased to be of consequence at the point of baptism. In this sense baptism was not only presented to the unbaptized as a carrot but also as a means of "beating the rap."

Whether we have, here, the key to Constantine's delayed baptism – and therefore the key to the paradox of his dual religious activities also – we cannot be at all sure. However, as he refused to wear again the imperial purple and thus left this life dressed in his white baptismal gown it is not unreasonable to think that we may have.¹⁶ Of one thing we can be certain. Whatever Constantine's reason may have been for delaying his own baptism, his action was widely accepted as being quite proper and his assumed reasoning became more deeply entrenched in the church's teaching and in its conversion kit. Like a lot of other practices and teachings, once it was in the conversion kit it couldn't be rubbed out of the standard practice rule book. It had to be explained in terms of theology and every explanation gave rise to further debate, conflict and the introduction of still further rites and practices. Once the church was on that sort of treadmill or merry-go-round it was hard to get off and the circle got tighter and tighter!

The consequences of this process of baptismal ritual and doctrinal development in terms of community conduct are indeed difficult to assess. Its impact on the attitudes of Christians towards non-Christians has probably not been very far behind that of the Athanasian Creed. It has been abrasive and it has contributed to Christian arrogance and condescension in dealings with non-Christians. Coupled with other practices of the church it encouraged a fear among Christians of non-compliance with the rites of the church. This in turn became a tool in the psychological armament of a church more concerned with the numbers game and with maintaining its authority than with salvation for mankind.

Perhaps we have been trying to delve too deeply into Constantine's motivation and the theology which he really believed. Perhaps we should have stopped at the first reading of the rescript of Milan. Paragraphs 10 and 11 are very telling indeed. Paragraph 10 reads: "You are to use your utmost diligence in carrying out these orders on behalf of the Christians, that our command may be promptly obeyed, for the fulfillment of our gracious purpose in establishing public tranquillity." ¹⁷ No attempt to veil his political stance there. And paragraph 11 reads: "So shall that divine favour which we have already enjoyed, in affairs of the greatest moment, continue to grant us success, and thus secure the happiness of the realm." When those paragraphs are read in the light of the earlier clause, "that each should have freedom to worship God after his own choice", it suggests a very simple monotheism – "God", not "the gods" – coupled with an assumption that the Roman Empire is chosen to rule and is given special favours by God. There is, after all, nothing new or exclusive about such a belief. Christians have been among those who have assumed in times of war that God is quite definitely and only on their side. In the two major wars of the twentieth century so far they have flocked to the recruiting stations on both sides of the battle lines behind slogans such as "For God, king and country" and then they have erected memorials to their dead carrying the same message. It has been much easier for governments to invoke the support of some and to suppress the opposition of others among their people by the use of such appeals to faith than to justify their decision to go to war!

A FAMILY DISAGREEMENT

Before we pass on from Constantine we must give a little thought to his family. His sister left her mark by her famous request to Bishop Eusebius for a portrait of Jesus. In so doing she stimulated the move towards the use of images and icons. However his mother, who was later canonized as Saint Helena, is supposed to have been responsible for the re-discovery of the actual cross on which Jesus was crucified when she visited Jerusalem in 326. She is also supposed to have identified the tomb in which he was buried, despite evidence that this could not be so, and despite the incredible suggestion that Jesus was buried within a building's-length of where he was crucified. It was on her instructions that an immense basilica of the Holy Sepulchre was built to encompass both sites ten years later.

After Constantine's death his sons, Constantius and Constans, who succeeded him, followed basically the same policies except that they initially rejected the approved Trinitarian theology of the church and accepted the Arian view of Jesus. Athanasius either fled or was exiled. But very soon the imperial brothers' dependence on the church in Rome forced them to drop their support for the Arians and about nine years later we find them helping to tighten the grip of the church by ordering the complete closure of all pagan temples and the suppression of all worship except that of Christianity. In the later years of his reign as sole emperor, after Constans died, Constantius became highly oppressive and in fact ordered the death of all those who continued to worship pagan gods. He ordered the forfeiture of all pagan property to the church and the destruction of any which could not be put to use by the Christians. He also ordered that all books written either in support of other faiths or against the church should be destroyed and he tightened laws forbidding intermarriage between Jewish men and Christian women and the ownership of slaves by Jews.¹⁸

Little is known of the spread of Christianity beyond the Roman Empire up to the time of Constantine. The actual evidence of evangelism beyond the imperial boundaries is thin.¹⁹ There is a legend that a King Abgar invited Jesus to visit Edessa, in Mesopotamia, which would at least suggest contact between a disciple of Jesus or someone else having knowledge of him, and a person or persons at, or travelling away from, Edessa before the Roman conquest of the area. There is also some evidence that the apostle Thomas may have visited India. It is only when we reach Constantine's reign that we find firm evidence of Christian evangelism beyond the empire. Even then it was by accident. Christianity was introduced to Ethiopia by a shipwreck. It was about the year of Anthony and his Anchorite cave dwellers in Egypt and of Constantine's Church of St. Peter on Vatican Hill. It was also at the height of conflict between Arius and Athanasius.

Aedesius and Frumentius, young Christian men from Tyre, are said to have been the only survivors of a shipwreck on the Red Sea coast of Ethiopia about 320 CE. They were taken as slaves to the court of the king at Axum but, after having gained his favour, they were released. Later they were appointed officers of the court and allowed to preach. Other Christians are supposed to have joined them from Egypt. They left Ethiopia about twenty years after the shipwreck. Aedesius is said to have returned to Tyre but Frumentius went to Alexandria and asked Athanasius, at that stage Patriarch, to send priests to Ethiopia. However instead of that Athanasius consecrated Frumentius a bishop and sent him back to Ethiopia himself. That was about 341CE. The Ethiopian Church was thereupon established and Frumentius remained its head until he died.

So much for Constantine and his immediate family. But we cannot forget him. By the nature of people and politics some reaction against his policies and actions was to be expected. It came when Julian, a nephew of Constantine, became emperor in succession to Constantius in 361. Julian refused to uphold the privileged position of the Christian Church. He withdrew state support for it, insisted on equality – or at least tolerance – for divergent groups such as the Donatists and he encouraged pagan worship. The church dubbed him ‘Julian the apostate’ but, although he reverted completely to pagan worship himself, he took no steps to oppress Christians.

In a letter to the people of Bostra in 362 Julian wrote, in part:

“I had imagined that the prelates of the Galileans were under greater obligations to me than to my predecessor. For in his reign many of them were banished, persecuted and imprisoned; and many of the so-called heretics were executed... All this has been reversed in my reign; the banished are allowed to return, and confiscated goods have all been restored to the owners. But such is their folly and madness that, just because they can no longer be despots, or carry out their designs first against their brethren and then against us, the worshippers of the gods, they are inflamed with fury and stop at nothing in their unprincipled attempts to alarm and enrage the people... It is therefore my pleasure to announce and publish to all the people by this edict that they must not abet the seditions of the clergy... They may hold their meetings, if they wish, and offer prayers according to their established use... And for the future let the people live in harmony. Let no one be at variance, or do wrong to another; neither you that are in error to those who worship the gods, as is right and proper, in the manner handed down from earliest antiquity; nor let the worshippers of the gods destroy or plunder the house of those who are misled by ignorance rather than deliberate choice. Men should be taught and won over by reason and not by blows, insults and corporal punishments. I therefore most earnestly admonish the adherents of the true religion not to injure or insult the Galileans in any way, either by physical attack or by reproaches. Those who are in the wrong in matters of supreme importance are objects of pity rather than of hate...” ²⁰

In an earlier statement Julian had written critically of the worship of Jesus and the martyrs in these terms:

“But you, unfortunately, do not abide by the tradition of the apostles, which in the hands of their successors deteriorated into greater blasphemy. Neither Paul, nor Matthew, nor Luke, nor Mark had the audacity to say that Jesus is God. But the worthy John, realizing that by that time a vast number of people in many of the Greek and Italian cities were infected with the disease, and hearing, I fancy, that the tombs of Peter and Paul were being worshipped (privately, no doubt, but still worshipped), John, I say, was the first to have the audacity to make that assertion.

“This evil was inaugurated by John. But who can find a fitting denunciation of this additional innovation of yours, the introduction of many dead bodies [as objects of worship], besides that original dead body? You have filled all places with tombs and monuments... You think that not even the words of Jesus are to be listened to on this question... Jesus says (Matt.

*xxii:27) that sepulchres are full of uncleanness. How is it then that you invoke God upon them?"*²¹

Julian was born six years after the Council of Nicaea. He was subjected to a rigid Christian up-bringing, designed for a clergyman rather than an emperor, with his cousin Constantius as his guardian-gaoler. He has been described as an impatient genius and in spite of years of devout religious observation he would not accept without question the authority and doctrine of the haughty ministers of the church. His familiarity with the Arian controversy and the politicking of the contestants convinced him that they neither understood nor believed the doctrines over which they contended so fiercely. For a time he appears to have accepted the Arian position but so unreasoning were those around him that he concluded that "neither fire nor steel can eradicate the erroneous opinions of the mind", and he rejected the church altogether while he was a student in Athens in his early twenties.²² Constantius sent Julian to Gaul as governor in 355, at the age of 24. Within five years Julian's reputation for sound and fair administration, free of religious intolerance, had spread across the empire and was being contrasted with the corrupt influence of the church in Rome on which Constantius had become dependent. Rome was languishing under the ignominious tyranny of eunuchs and bishops, even though they had not been able to fully enforce the decree by Constantius which had given all pagan property to the church. In 360 Julian was proclaimed emperor by his army in Gaul while Constantius was away from Rome, fighting in Persia. But of course Constantius was not just about to give up his crown that easily and he turned for home to teach Julian a lesson. Julian headed for Constantinople also, but the anticipated battle didn't take place. Constantius fell ill and died before reaching the capital. He declared Julian to be his successor just before he died, probably in an effort to protect his family from an expected backlash in the event of his death.²³

Unfortunately, when he insisted on toleration towards the Donatists, Julian didn't achieve the result he was looking for either. His decision triggered yet another religious civil war in North Africa. His effort to resolve the dispute in that part of the empire through conciliation was no more successful than Constantine's edict of toleration in 312. The uneasy truce between the Donatists and the Catholics which followed the Council of Arles and Constantine's military intervention had been broken about 347. At that time the 'party of Caecilian', with some support from the official church and probably anticipating support from Constantine's co-emperor sons, resorted to violence and the Donatists suffered badly. However instead of more military support the co-emperors sent an Imperial Commissioner, Count Macarius, to North Africa to resolve the dispute. Macarius succeeded in frightening both groups into some sort of submission to the official Catholic Church but the breach was not healed. It was camouflaged temporarily. The Catholics described the count as 'an agent of the Holy task' but the Donatists harboured a grudge and remembered 'the time of Macarius' as a spur to eventual retaliation.²⁴ The opportunity for such retaliation came when Julian declared them to have the same rights as every other Christian. They unleashed a period of terror such that the Catholics were almost buried in the avalanche. It was to be another thirty years or more before the Catholic Church was able to feel that it again controlled North Africa.

...OF CREEDS AND CREDIBILITY

Emperor Julian also restored the rights of the Jews which Constantine and his sons had revoked and he promised help in the rebuilding of Jerusalem and the Temple. Some historians see that as due not so much to any friendly sentiments he might have felt towards Judaism as to his antipathy towards the church.²⁵ However others have suggested that Julian was ripe for conversion to Judaism about that time but he died two years later and with him died the fears of the Christians and the hopes of the Jews.²⁶

Julian had come to power just as another of the Christian theological controversies was reaching fever pitch and while the struggle to determine the basic Christian statement of belief was still alternately regrouping and fragmenting the church. This time the controversy was over the nature of Jesus. Constantine's politician's solution of directing that the bishops meet at Nicaea had failed to produce a 'final' statement of Christian belief. Neither had the immense power which the church had been given to wield led to either a statement of belief acceptable to the whole church or to the stability which every emperor hoped for as a consequence of such a statement. In 341, four years after Constantine's death, the Council of Antioch was assembled at Constantinople for the dedication of his 'Golden Church'. The council reconsidered the sixteen year-old Nicene Creed, rejected it, and adopted an alternative known as 'the Creed of the Dedication'. It was that year that Ulfilas was sent by Bishop Eusebius – yes, the same one – as 'bishop for the Gothic race' to work in central and northern Europe. Ulfilas committed the Gothic language to writing for the first time and then translated the books of the Bible which were then in use for the use of the Goths. He was able to build on the knowledge of Christianity which the people already had from their Cappadocian prisoners and over a working life of forty years he developed a strong base of Christianity among the Goths.²⁷ It was the Arian Christianity which was to sweep down on Trinitarian Rome some years later.

But back to the Council of Antioch. Its Creed of the Dedication also failed to solve the problem. Only two years later, with bitter division between the western and eastern bishops a general council of the church was summoned to meet at Sardica in an effort to resolve the confusion. It didn't. The eastern group withdrew and held a separate council at Philippopolis. The western group approved another revision called 'the fourth creed of Antioch'. Only a year or so later a synod was called at Antioch and it promulgated a version of the fourth creed of Antioch known variously as the 'Macrostich', 'prolix' or 'long lined creed'. That was the point at which Constantine's sons ordered the complete closing of all pagan temples. So! Just what were the citizens of the empire to believe? All pagan and heretical writings were to be destroyed. But what constituted heretical writings? No wonder the population was confused.

For the next ten to twelve years the competing groups did their own thing and recited their own creeds until the Council of Sirmium adopted a strongly Arian creed in 357. This was when Constantius used his strong arm tactics to force Bishop Hosius, (the ecclesiastical adviser to his father who had proposed the Council of Nicaea), to toe the new party line.²⁸ If the population was confused is it any wonder that Julian, waiting in the wings to assume the role of emperor, was antagonistic towards the church?

Of course Sirmium did nothing to heal the breach either. In fact the antagonism increased and the Trinitarians bitterly denounced what they called 'the blasphemy of Sirmium'. In May 359 Constantius presided over a second gathering at Sirmium in yet another attempt at a solution. It produced yet another compromise creed known as the 'dated creed' which was to be presented to a great ecumenical council. The importance of getting agreement to this creed was so great that Constantius tried to prepare the ground by holding two separate preliminary synods. The western group rejected the dated creed and reaffirmed the Creed of Nicaea. The eastern group rejected them all and prepared yet another revision. However the emperor's efforts were not entirely in vain. When the great council assembled at Constantinople in December of the same year it issued a modified form of the dated creed, with decidedly Arian influence, which was to stand as 'the authorized creed' for twenty years!

On the other hand Constantius must have felt somewhat thwarted when, just as his reign was drawing to a close, the Apollinarian controversy undermined whatever harmony he had been able to develop through theological accord. Apollinarius, the bishop at Laodicea, pressed the view that in Jesus the human nature was replaced by the divine nature and that Jesus on earth was not really man but God alone in human form. He strenuously opposed the majority of his colleagues who maintained that the personality of Jesus Christ was a union of God and man, deity and humanity in one nature.²⁹ As with a number of the other major theological controversies this was really one aspect of the continuing Trinitarian debate.

THE GROWTH AND EFFECTS OF MONASTICISM

It was also about this time that Christian monasticism began to have a real impact on the community and social life of North Africa and portions of the Middle Eastern provinces of the Roman Empire. It was divisive indeed. The movement really gathered momentum from about 320 and multitudes flocked to the caves to lead a spartan existence in response to the example of Anthony.³⁰ In Egypt the movement mainly attracted men but in parts of the Eastern Church both women and men responded freely. There are several commands of Jesus which supporters of the monastic system offer as inspiration or justification for such asceticism. The best known are:

"...whosoever will come after me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross, and follow me." [Mark 8:34]

"He that loveth his life shall lose it; and he that hateth his life in this world shall keep it unto life eternal." [John 12:25]

"For there are some eunuchs which are so born from their mother's womb: and there are some eunuchs, which were made eunuchs of men: and there be eunuchs which have made themselves eunuchs for the kingdom of heaven's sake. He that is able to receive it, let him receive it." [Matthew 19:12]³¹

There is no doubt that Jesus called for conscious self discipline in all things. It is a means towards understanding the problems of others, of being able to relate to them, of maintaining a personal commitment to the sort of social concern and action on which Judaism had been based, and of moving towards an understanding of the relationship which humanity has with God. However it is very debatable whether Jesus was exhorting people to live in either cloistered or isolated privation and whether the purpose of Christianity can be achieved solely by living in either way.

There is also no doubt that, at least in part, monasticism arose as a defence against persecution and that it reflected the inability of many Christians to relate Christian faith to community life. People had practised self-imposed denial of various kinds within the framework of Christian family life from the earliest days of the movement in Jerusalem. But gradually, and especially in times of persecution, the self denial took more extreme and harsh forms. It became incompatible with normal life and everyday occupations. Because of that, the practice developed of seeking isolation in deserts and mountains, or, at least, outside cities in places where there was little contact with the rest of the world.³² If the number of people involved in such movements had remained small there may have been no adverse reaction. However the social stresses and strains within communities became very real indeed when substantial numbers chose to drop out in this way – especially when most of them were able bodied young men. In addition the personal difficulties and stresses for the people who joined the movements were also very real and a heavy mystique naturally developed around their settlements. Some of them insisted on living as hermits in isolation but, also quite naturally, the majority tended to live reasonably close together in loosely organized communities for mutual support.

As the number of ascetics and ‘drop-out’ communities grew so did antagonism towards Christians generally and, quite naturally, the level of persecution as well. The more widespread the persecution became, the more incentive there was for Christians to drop out and join the ascetic communities. Similarly, as hermits became more fanatical and as the monastic communities became more rigorous in the requirements which they imposed on those who joined them, so the persecution against them became more determined and more vicious. It was a typical case of action and reaction, and Egypt and the eastern provinces were home to some very determined hermits. The social and economic activities of whole regions went through periods of trauma and change as large numbers of men withdrew from productive effort in agriculture and trades. Many towns suffered what we would describe today as recession. They had to adapt to a situation in which quite large numbers of women faced the prospect of remaining spinsters other than by normal choice. The movement towards a feudal system of land ownership and employment was accelerated. Today’s demographers, economists and sociologists would have had a ball trying to work out the consequences.

In view of the immensely powerful political body which Julian confronted and attempted to either dismantle or restrict, (irrespective of the merits of his case for doing so), it is not surprising to find that his successor, Jovian, came under immediate pressure to reintroduce all the former state aid for the church and re-established its position of privilege and most of its authority. He did so in very dubious circumstances in 363, just after he returned from the Persian front where his first act as emperor had been to make a treaty with Persia which was widely regarded as 'disgraceful' and he desperately needed a strong power base to ensure that he would be confirmed as emperor. Julian had been killed in battle during a retreat which followed some initial successes which he had directed with great vigour. His death left a power vacuum which meant that the empire was exposed to greater pressure from Persia and it was while they were still under pressure on all sides from the Persians that the chiefs of the Roman army chose Jovian as their new emperor. He certainly had to negotiate a peace treaty. But when it was learned that in order to avoid further battle he had surrendered not only the five Roman provinces beyond the Tigris but also the impregnable trading city of Nisibis, which sat astride both the silk and spice routes from the east, one hundred kilometres west of the Tigris on the modern border between Syria and Turkey, the public outcry was understandable. It was such that he could well have been deposed if it were not for the bought support of the church.³³

In those circumstances, with political survival as a key consideration, the Eastern Council met in a very conciliatory mood at Antioch and reaffirmed the Creed of Nicaea with minor modifications. Very soon, under Gratian, one of Jovian's joint successors, Christianity again became the only legitimate religion in the Western Roman Empire.

But the conciliatory spirit was soon exhausted. In 366, only three years later, when a new bishop of Rome was needed the hideous pitched battle between the supporters of the two contenders, Damasus and Ursinus, left one hundred and fifty men slaughtered. Damasus won. He was later canonized as a saint, of course! An honest pagan Ammianus Marcellinus was moved to remark with measured sarcasm that the splendour of the bishop of Rome's office and its wealth and luxury are such that any crime may be excused which enables a man to attain it.³⁴ Poor Julian. What chance did he have?

A MATTER OF MIGRATION

The empire-destroying internal religious conflicts were not the only problems Gratian and his co-emperors had to worry about. After a series of relatively minor movements and pressures against the fringes of the Roman Empire over a period of two and a half centuries, mass movements of people and armies began to threaten the whole empire. The Huns from northern Asia, thwarted in attempts to subjugate China, pushed west towards Europe. They displaced Gothic rule and populations in several regions and in 375 the Goths, in turn, pushed further west and south.

The pagan military pressure and mass migration from the east forced a confrontation between the Trinitarian controllers of the Roman Empire and the Arian Goths who were despised by Rome despite the fact that the program of evangelism among them had been initiated by the church in Rome. Having virtually no alternative, Rome agreed to the Visigoths crossing the Danube and settling in Thrace. However the Roman authorities in Constantinople became even more antagonistic towards the Visigoths and took measures to thwart their migration and settlement. The result was a march against Constantinople in 378. Gratian's first co-emperor, Valens, was defeated and killed at Adrianople. The new co-emperor, Theodosius, made an agreement for the Visigoths to remain in Thrace and for the Ostrogoths to settle in Phrygia and Lydia, (Turkey). He then adopted Gratian's policy of strengthening the links between the state and the church by declaring Christianity the only legitimate religion in the Eastern Empire. However the following year he forbade unorthodox worship and handed all churches and church property to the Trinitarians. In view of the fact that the Arian dispute had developed in the eastern provinces and in view of the mass Arian migration which was still taking place into his half of the empire this would appear, at first glance, to be a simple case of flying in the face of reality. Was it that he was as intolerant in religious matters as the advisers from Rome who surrounded him? Was it that he was dependent on the Trinitarians for the support necessary to hold his position, or was it that he, too, was caught up in the bind of trying to produce political stability through the whole empire by means of religious conformity? It is certainly quite clear that if the Arian Christian migrants from north of the Danube had been allowed to dominate the religious life of the religious capital of the empire the whole intricate fabric woven from inter-dependent strands of state and church must have been torn to shreds in due course, unless agreement could be reached on a universal statement of belief.

We have already seen that it was proving impossible to achieve such a universal statement of belief. The choice for the joint emperors was therefore quite simple: face a crisis now and try to overcome it, or face a much bigger crisis in the near future. No doubt they made their decision to precipitate a crisis on a limited regional scale after making an assessment of the consequences of both alternatives. It was only a matter of months later, in 380, that Gratian and Theodosius, together, went a step further in imposing orthodox Christianity on their reluctant empire.³⁵ An Imperial Edict required "all the various nations which are subject to our clemency and moderation ... (to) ... continue in the profession of that religion which was delivered to the Romans by the divine Apostle Peter, as it has been preserved by faithful tradition and is now professed by the Pontiff Damasus and by Peter, Bishop of Alexandria". The edict declared that:

"According to the Apostolic teaching and the doctrine of the Gospel, let us believe the one deity of the Father, the Son and the Holy Spirit, in equal majesty and in a holy Trinity. We authorize the followers of this law to assume the title of Catholic Christians; but as for the others, since, in our judgement, they are foolish madmen, we decree that they shall be branded with the ignominious name of heretics, and shall not presume to give to their conventicles the name of churches. They will suffer in the first place the chastisement of the divine condemnation, and in the second the punishment which our authority, in accordance with the will of Heaven, shall decide to inflict."

Finally, the next year, they delivered their ultimate insult to man's intelligence and civil liberties. They required the Roman Senate to disavow the belief in the old gods and made conversion to paganism a punishable offence. Confusion, bitterness and manipulation continued. Strangely enough there was no immediate uprising in the east. It seemed that the emperors' gamble had paid off. But there had been a trade off. Theodosius had agreed to make grants to the Goths so that they could maintain an army. Officially it was so that they could participate in the defence of the Roman Empire but in reality it was a reflection of the Goths' power to bargain with Rome. It enabled them to defend the territory which they had been permitted to occupy and it was the price of stability. The uneasy relationship held and something resembling peace continued for fourteen years. But it snapped in 395 when Theodosius' son and successor in the east, Arcadius, ill-advised by an orthodox Cyrenian, Synesius, defaulted on the army grants to the Goths. Synesius, who became bishop of Cyrene in the year that the Goths eventually marched into Rome, advised Arcadius against admitting "these armed and predatory aliens" into the body of the Roman State and recommended instead the establishment of a national army to cope with the Gothic peril.^{36 37} The Visigoths broke out and ravaged Macedonia and Greece until a new truce was reached and they were settled in north-west Greece, in the coastal region of Epirus. But that is jumping ahead a bit. The manipulation implicit in, and made necessary by, the edict of 380 calls for closer examination.

THEODOSIUS AND A LITTLE BIT OF MANIPULATION

The methods used today to convey information to large numbers of people in a 'target audience' in order to manipulate them and to gain, firstly, their acceptance of that information and, secondly, a carefully predetermined response to it, are highly sophisticated. They can be applied to entire populations simultaneously at the flick of a switch. Fortunately we are often aware that we are being manipulated and we can consciously consider our response instead of making a spontaneous conditioned response, even though the manipulators are often able to stay one step ahead because of advanced training in manipulative techniques and technology. But we know that we are being herded like cattle and that we are being given only that part of the story which "the mass media" want to give us. We know that this is bad and that we have got to do something about it. Many of us are uncertain why it is bad, what the effects are and what, if anything, we can or should do about it. But we know that "the media is the problem". In fact it is not so much the media – the equipment or the aids used and the staff who operate them – which is the problem. The real problems are the motives and the aims of the people who commission material for presentation through the mass media and who exercise control over it. Those who actually plan, prepare and present material are also accountable in part for the effects of that material, but theirs is delegated or imposed responsibility. It may be that they have seen a personal challenge and gone hunting for a job opportunity in mass media but the real responsibility still lies with those who deliberately commission material which is designed to manipulate the people who will be exposed to it.

The tasks for the manipulators in today's Christian West are how to induce people with a freedom of choice to make a particular "buying decision", to give to a particular fund, or to accept and then support a particular political, economic or military situation. The principal manipulators are the controllers of resource extractive and consumer goods manufacturing industries, political parties and special interest groups supported by marketing consultants, advertising agents, media providers and their public relations journalists. The support staff or operators are highly trained specialists selected for their single-mindedness. The target audience is generally highly literate, articulate, comfortable, well fed and therefore contented and receptive or pliable, but it is not a captive audience. As socio-economic conditions in the West become more strained and as the manipulators reach further beyond their original primary targets into the non-western world which is now easily accessible and recognized as having greatly increased buying power – or market potential – the total target audience becomes less clearly defined. However it is still not a captive audience. There is competition for attention. The obstacles are apathy, competition from other vested interests and cultural diversity and resistance. But surely we are a long way removed from Theodosius? Well, yes, but not totally removed.

The scene is different and the subject matter, the scale of operation, the equipment, the methods and training available for operators or manipulators are certainly all quite different. But the problem was basically the same: to modify community mass response. The urgent task for the manipulators in the dying years of the Roman Empire, after Gratian and Theodosius had made their abominable decisions, was to ensure that the people of an entire empire – reluctant at best and openly hostile at worst – would accept a new working basis for their lives. It was not a simple change. It was a new basis for their relationships with each other. It was a new basis for their personal and community worship and for their understanding of their creator. It was, indeed, an entirely new basis for their existence and it had been imposed on them by law.

The target audience was generally illiterate. It was poor. It was suffering from overcrowding and insufficient food and over much of the Eastern Empire it was also suffering from competition for work and space because of the influx of migrants on a massive scale. In addition, a large proportion of the people who made up the target audience were bonded. They were not free in any sense. Those who were free were culturally very diverse, deeply divided over some of the theological concepts of the new religion, and over deeply divided the social consequences of the antics of some of the fanatics among the believers. To make matters worse they were spiritually captive within the system and certainly they were not contented or receptive. An additional consideration was that a small but very significant section of the target population was unshakable in its adherence to its own system of beliefs and social conduct which had been rejected by the new majority. The Jews. Their example strengthened the will to resist of many of the others.

The manipulators were the priests of the new religious system. They were untrained. They were recruited in large numbers to cope with the need to ‘handle’ the entire population instead of a small community of dedicated believers. And they were attracted by the privileges and power which went with the new state positions. The basic tools available were the spoken word and the whip. Hardly a good starting point from which to inspire people with the Good News of love and salvation.

A simple solution was adopted: indoctrination and the use of fixed liturgy and religious practices. Fear of the consequences of not conforming was then exploited to the full to ensure conformity. A council of eastern bishops was convened by Theodosius at Constantinople. It ratified the Creed of Nicaea in its original form. The disqualification and repression of Arians was pursued relentlessly. They were regarded as worse than pagans or Jews. The Apollinarian heresy was also condemned and Apollinarius was forced to withdraw from the church. These steps taken by the council can be interpreted as two things. Firstly they can be interpreted as a political pay-off to the collaborating emperors for their compulsory “Christianization” of the empire and, secondly, as an effort to simplify the process of mass indoctrination. The emperors were caught in the old spiral binding. Political stability required religious uniformity which required political intervention and coercion, which caused unrest and political instability, which was supposed to be offset by the religious uniformity which required political intervention. The spiral became twisted tighter and tighter.

For his part of the bargain Theodosius affirmed the intimate alliance between the state and the church. He forced through the Senate a vote declaring “the worship of Christ” to be the religion of the Romans in place of “the worship of Jupiter” and proceeded with the destruction or seizure of all pagan properties, and the prohibition of all pagan assemblies, rites and sacrifices.³⁸ A few months later the authorized canon of Sacred Scriptures was published in the ‘Decree of Pope St. Damasus’. The full force of the state was then thrown against anyone who dared to question the official word of the church. Persons adopting the approved belief might “assume the title of Catholic Christians” but “...as we judge that all others are extravagant madmen, we brand them with the infamous name of heretics...” Heretics were also prohibited from meeting, their leaders were subjected to heavy fines, and those who continued to adhere to heretical views were gradually disqualified from holding certain types of employment and forbidden to make wills.³⁹

Oddly enough the first official burning of a heretic occurred not in the Eastern Empire where these disputes had been centred but in the Western Empire. Priscillian, a prominent Spanish layman who had founded an ascetic movement in Spain and southern France, was burned in Trier in 386 together with six companions. It is said that Maximus, the imperial usurper, was hounded into it by a group of bishops led by Ithacius. Other bishops, notably Martin of Tour, took their lives into their hands by publicly condemning the gruesome deed and by following a campaign of evangelism among rural populations without the use of force. It proved surprisingly effective while the program of enforced conversion continued to run into snags. In 392 Gratian and Theodosius issued an imperial ordinance declaring participation in pagan temple practices and sacrifices to be high treason. It was authorized to burn humans at the stake but it was not authorized to burn a lamb on a sacrificial pyre. Onward Christian soldiers ...

The years between 370 and the end of the century saw all sorts of other changes to the eastern and northern boundaries of the empire but it is neither necessary nor possible to discuss them all now. We can only touch on some of the highlights to illustrate major movements as church and state continued their interaction.

The influence of the Asding Vandals in the Western Empire increased greatly. Stilicho, commander of their armies, became virtually the prop and guardian of the emperor and the appointed guardian of the emperor's sons Honorius and Arcadius. He prevented the Visigoths from marching on Rome when, still dissatisfied with the settlements offered after the events of 395, they moved to invade Italy in 402. Two years later Honorius moved his seat of government from Rome to Ravenna for greater security. It remained there for more than four hundred years. This enabled the pope to strengthen his image as the focal point of the empire and also encouraged more Arian Goth attacks on Trinitarian Rome. However in 405, the year after Honorius made his move, Stilicho managed to keep at bay a combined force from several regions which included both his own Vandals and Goths. To do this he had to weaken the northern defences of the empire and this allowed another combined force to break through to annex Gaul only a few months later, in 406. Stilicho's power over the emperor and the alliance of convenience was finished. The emperor no longer trusted him. In which direction did his strongest allegiance lie? With the Vandals or with him as emperor? Stilicho was murdered by the emperor in August 408.⁴⁰ There was then a power vacuum of immeasurable consequences. But we are jumping ahead a bit. We shall come to this power vacuum again in chapter six. For the moment we must pause at 393.

In that year a council was convened at Hippo in North Africa and it is widely considered that it was this council which finally determined the books of both the Old Testament and the New Testament. In fact they were subsequently varied on a number of occasions by Roman, Orthodox Eastern and Protestant Eastern groups and it is interesting to note that the Roman Catholic Church does not give that council at Hippo the status or authority of an 'Ecumenical Council'. Nor does Rome put it on the same footing as twenty one other councils beginning with Nicaea in 325.⁴¹ It was apparently mainly concerned with reform within the church in Africa. As important as those matters were at the time, if they were the only reasons to remember it we could easily bypass the Council of Hippo. However they were not. On December 3 in 393 a priest who had been ordained only two years before and who would not normally have been present at a council as a participant, was invited to address it. He took as his topic 'On the Faith and the Creed'. Onto centre stage strode Augustine. He was not to leave it for the rest of his life. The church and the world of Roman times had come face to face with the man who was about to exert a more profound influence on both of them than anyone since Paul. His theology and his ideas on the relationship between church and state were to shape them for more than a thousand years. His ideas and his writings were to be taken (whether in the context that he intended or distorted) and used as the basis and the justification for the religious enslavement of Europe and for some of the most dastardly episodes in history. As well as being important to an understanding of those events, Augustine's life provides a classic study of the impact of environment, circumstances and personal contacts on both personal and community thinking, reaction and development. His teaching was to become a primary tool in the hands of the manipulators.

CHAPTER 4

CALL IT A CITY OF GOD

At the time of the Council of Hippo Augustine was 39. He had been ordained only two years before, baptized four years before that and was to become bishop four years later. It has been suggested that he may have even had a hand in summoning the council and in planning the program of reforms which was proposed. ¹ In any case if the summoning of a council in the town to which he had just gone to carve a niche for himself in the church machine had any influence on him it was subsequently honoured many times over by the impact which his actions and writings had on the church and, through it, on the world community. His influence was of very mixed consequences. But it was of such magnitude that we must take a close look at his life and at some of the things which helped to shape it.

We certainly could not grasp the importance of Augustine if we were content to say of him that he was born in 354 in North Africa; that he refused to adopt his mother's orthodox Christianity and followed a system of beliefs touching on both Zoroastrianism and Gnosticism, known as Manichaeism; that he took his illegitimate son with him when he went to teach rhetoric in Rome where he was converted by Ambrose; that he returned to Africa where he was ordained and then became a bishop; that he wrote many books, and that he died at the age of 76 while Vandals were preparing to over-run Hippo. However that will do as a starting point for a close look at his life, times and influence.

Augustine had the privilege of being born a Roman citizen. He was born in one of the provinces of the empire on the Mediterranean coast of Africa which is part of modern day Algeria. The town in which he was born is less than forty miles from the border with Tunisia. It was probably established in the very early days of the Christian era but in any case it was certainly established during the period when Rome was reconstructing and expanding communities in the region around the site of Carthage only a few generations after it had totally destroyed the former Carthaginian capital. He was born into the area in which Christianity had taken hold most rapidly and, so it seemed, firmly. It was an area served by a school of theology whose scholars had an immense impact on the future of Christianity, quite apart from Augustine himself. It has been said that the school of theology at Carthage did more than either the school in Alexandria or those in Asia Minor to shape the theological thought of Europe. ² It was also to be an area in which the Christianity of the day gave way almost totally to the vigour of Islam only two and a half centuries later. It is an area we ought to understand. It is Numidia, and Augustine's birthplace was the town of "the most resplendent council of Thagaste."

NUMIDIA: THE FORGOTTEN MOULD

Numidia, although seldom given much attention by writers, played a vital role in the Roman conquest of the Carthaginian Empire. It was being moulded during those same critical centuries that saw Yahwism and Jewish life moving relentlessly towards the crisis of the Messiah and Christianity. Carthage, a city established before 800 BCE by Phoenician sailor/traders from Tyre, dominated the Western Mediterranean for hundreds of years. It was well established before Phoenicia was over-run by Assyria and it was remote enough to attract migration and grow rapidly while Tyre and Sidon were under siege.³ After only a few more years, in 722 BCE, most of the Jewish held territory south of Phoenicia was also overrun and the first of the great dispersions scattered Judaists, (or more correctly Yahwists at that stage), from the Nile to the Tigris.^{4 5} It is doubtful whether any Yahwists reached Carthage at that time, or at least in sufficient numbers to ensure a continuing presence, but as a result of the second Jewish dispersion when the Babylonians overran the balance of the Jewish territory and destroyed the Temple in Jerusalem 136 years later, (586 BCE), it is probable that some Yahwists sought refuge in Carthage as well as in Egypt and Cyrenaica. However some writers suggest that the first significant contact between the Jews and the western powers was between 400 BCE and 300 BCE. Certainly there were well established Jewish communities in Carthage during the Punic Wars between Rome and Carthage.

THE PUNIC WARS

When its conflicts with Rome began Carthage may have been much the bigger of the two cities, with an industrial and trading population of possibly a million people.⁶ It dominated Corsica, Sardinia, Sicily and coastal Spain and France as well as parts of North Africa. It assumed that its powerful navy would continue to dominate the Mediterranean. Its wealth had been built up very largely at the expense of its great slave population and its subordinate states and there was no bond of love or even a strong community of interest between Carthage as a republican city and its subject states. It had been forced into a loose alliance with the rapidly growing Roman power by a common enemy, Pyrrhus, king of Epirus, a small territory straddling the modern border between Greece and Albania. That alliance lasted for only eleven years after Pyrrhus was defeated. Then the first Punic War started as a battle for control of Sicily in 264 BCE. The first gladiatorial combat was held in Rome in the same year and the rapid growth of combat-to-the-death as a form of mass public entertainment reflects the moral state of Rome at the time.^{7 8} Coincidentally the Jewish Bible was being translated in Alexandria from Hebrew into Greek for the first time.^{9 10} After twenty four years of the most destructive war which had been recorded up to that time, during which Rome broke the naval supremacy of Carthage and gained the upper hand, Carthage sued for peace in 240 BCE. It forfeited Sicily to Rome and paid a massive war indemnity. Both powers had been bled to a state of misery, civil violence and economic disaster.

The Carthaginians tried to suppress uprisings by mass crucifixions, thousands at a time.¹¹ Corsica and Sardinia rose in revolt. For their part the Romans managed to stave off an uprising in Gaul by slaughtering forty thousand Gauls as they marched south. Human religious sacrifices were offered in Rome. Rome annexed Corsica and Sardinia, possibly as a diversion and possibly to offset its own economic chaos by screwing more territory and indemnities out of her adversary.

“Peace” could not last. Impatient for revenge Hamilcar, a general who had assumed a dominant position in Carthage, went to Spain to organize a land attack on Rome. It didn’t begin in his life time but ten years later, in 218 BCE, his son Hannibal reacted to provocation by Rome and invaded Italy in the early stages of the second Punic War. Hannibal’s fifteen years of rampage throughout Italy make fascinating reading. He was gradually cut off from Spain, which was lost piecemeal to Rome, and eventually he was cornered in the heel of Italy. Taking advantage of Hannibal’s plight Scipio, young and dynamic but under a political cloud, took the few Roman legions which the Senate would approve from Sicily to North Africa, to take the fight to Carthage from the rear.

At that stage Numidia was dragged directly into the action. Scipio attacked through the Numidian hinterland which formed a semicircle around Carthage in 202 BCE. He captured a Numidian king and destroyed two camps complete with vast numbers of men, arms and horses. So great was his pressure on Carthage itself that Hannibal was recalled with his army from the heel of Italy to defend the heart of the Carthaginian empire. This led to a brief truce. But the politicking during the truce resulted in the Numidians under King Massinissa changing their allegiance. When the truce collapsed Hannibal faced a greatly superior force for the first time. The final battle was brief but violent. Hannibal was routed. Carthage submitted. It had to pay more reparations, forfeit the balance of Spain and all of its navy, except a handful of vessels, to Rome and undertake not to go to war without Rome’s approval. Hannibal went into exile rather than surrender and died by suicide, betrayed, with the Romans baying at his heels in Bithynia 19 years later.

Another period of “peace” followed. It was longer this time. Fifty three years. Rome tightened its repressive grip so that allies gradually became tribute-paying provinces of its empire. Social and community life became more base. Its home economy had been wrecked by the wars with Carthage. The ruling land owner classes screwed the general population so hard that Italy changed from being a country of free farmers to a country of slave-worked cattle stations. In modern terms, Rome followed an expansionist policy and relied on military force rather than citizenship for a people in partnership to hold its foreign provinces in subjection. It was greedy. It taxed the foreigner to relieve the wealthy in Rome of a burden.

And it was greed and envy of the way in which Carthage was recovering and prospering from its commerce that led to the third Punic War. Some of Rome’s prominent citizens had been calling for the destruction of Carthage ever since the second Punic War and in 150 BCE Rome triggered the war by inciting the Numidians to encroach and settle on the remaining Carthaginian territory until the Carthaginians reacted and fought in despair. Rome pounced on Carthage for breaking the peace treaty. Carthage surrendered the balance of its arms and some territory and sent the hostages that Rome demanded. But, never satisfied, the wealthy Romans wanted no further trade competition from Carthage at all. They demanded that Carthage should be abandoned as a trading port and that the entire population should move at least ten miles inland. The Carthaginians resisted. Rome attacked. For two years its attacks were repulsed. Then in 146 BCE a Scipio of the third generation laid siege to Carthage. Despite fantastic suffering from famine the Carthaginians held out until the city was eventually stormed. Even then the street fighting lasted six days. It has been estimated that at the outbreak of that final war Carthage had 500,000 people. When it fell there were 50,000 left. They were all carried into slavery. The city was totally destroyed by fire and then by ploughing the ruins to wipe a civilization off the map completely.¹² Much the same treatment was handed out to Corinth the same year.

The total destruction of Carthage robbed Rome of the benefits of much trade, reduced the thriving rural area around it to economic ruin and deprived Rome itself of a foothold for expansion in Africa. Only the semi-barbaric kingdom of Numidia was left to fill the vacuum.

It appears that the vast majority of the people of the Jewish community of Carthage were killed or enslaved together with the rest of the city although remnants of the community survived in the surrounding country. It also appears that the religions of Rome, introduced to towns like Hippo Regius with the Roman 'arrival' in 202 BCE, lived quite happily alongside the Yahwism of existing Jewish communities.

It is probable that Jewish migration to Mediterranean territories such as Numidia increased after the Punic Wars under the stimulus of the vigorous expansionist activity in Palestine during the Hasmonaeen dynasty. As the last century of the pre-Christian era dawned the Hasmonaeans were taking advantage of the period of independence which followed the collapse of the Seleucid Syrian Empire. The Syrians had recognized Jewish independence in 142 BCE. In 130 BCE they tried to reimpose their authority but were discouraged by intervention from Rome. Then for the next fifty years or so the borders of the Jewish kingdom were pushed outward so that it rivalled or exceeded in area the kingdoms of David and Solomon when they were at their greatest.¹³ Areas of Transjordan, the Negev, north Galilee and the high range country which straddles the modern border between Syria and Lebanon were all occupied and the people forcibly Judaized and subjected to circumcision.^{14 15 16} The Jewish population in Egypt reached about a million with 100,000 in the city of Alexandria.¹⁷ Jewish trading and commercial activity reached a new peak.

CHANGES IN THE EMPIRE

In 118 BCE, twenty eight years after the destruction of Carthage, the ruthless but capable Jugurtha seized the throne of Numidia. He had served with the Roman armies in Spain and his knowledge of things Roman enabled him to defy Rome so effectively that, after a time, the Senate was provoked to intervene. It sent consuls, commissioners and generals to restore Roman authority. Jugurtha bought them all off! ¹⁸ After five years of being so snubbed Roman diplomacy gave way to war but Jugurtha held Rome at bay. The war dragged on. A young soldier, Marius, was appointed consul and sent to take charge of the Roman army. Instead of relying on yeomen who would serve citizen-army style for short periods, Marius recruited troops from the poorest classes – men who he believed were likely to respond to being well paid – trained and disciplined them effectively and, within two years, (106 BCE), had carried Jugurtha to Rome in Chains. Numidia had earned a place in military history books. Its resistance had led to the establishment of a crudely professional army made up entirely of paid troops for the first time. Numidia was back in subjection, but, of greater importance, the concept of a defence force had changed permanently. ¹⁹

It is perhaps only a matter of passing interest that while the Numidian War was being fought in North Africa, tribes of Germans were pressing down through Gaul into northern Italy. Marius was eventually recalled from Numidia where he had stayed on as Consul without formal authority and he defeated the Germans in 101 BCE by using the same means. He raised and trained the first truly professional army. ²⁰ It would have happened somewhere at sometime under some commander or other, but the tenacity of resistance at Numidia which triggered it became part of the Numidian heritage. It is also a matter of interest that when Ptolemy tried to invade the Jewish kingdom the following year he was repulsed when an alliance between the Hasmonaeans and the Egyptians brought intervention by an Egyptian army under the command of two Jewish generals. ²¹ Only four years latter he bequeathed his portion of the Ptolomaic empire, Cyrenaica, in modern day Libya, to Rome in exchange for Roman citizenship for its people. When Alexander II of Egypt proposed a similar arrangement fifteen years later Rome declined the offer. It was not until a generation before the birth of Jesus that Egypt became a part of the Roman empire. It was then as a consequence of Cleopatra and her relations with Julius Caesar and Antony and finally her suicide, which she preferred to being paraded through Rome by Octavian.

In the meantime Rome's relations with her allies and her subject peoples went through a series of ups and downs and wars. From the point of view of setting the scene for the religious tensions, manipulations and conflict which eventually erupted, the most important were the uprising of the Italian Provinces about 91 BCE and the revolt of the gladiators 20 years later.

The first, the so-called 'social' civil war, broke out over issues of debt abolition for the poor, land tax, and the demand for some political power for the ordinary Italians, especially the veterans of the 'new' armies, in place of the absolute rule of the Roman Senate. Reforms were slow in coming but in 89 BCE Roman citizenship was extended to include all free Italians and the masses of people eventually gained some debt relief after years of repressive civil war. These reforms meant that Rome's relationship with all its other provinces changed. The establishment of professional armies of men who had no land or trade to return to when hostilities ended turned out to be a very mixed blessing. Quite apart from the questions of citizenship and political rights for the veterans there were the struggles and intrigues between leaders for military control and the political power which went with it. These internal struggles actually led Rome into wars she otherwise might not have had to fight and weakened the fabric of the republic. Strangely enough these things were also factors in the decision of Nicomades, king of Bithynia, to cede his kingdom on the southern shore of the Black Sea to Rome in 74 BCE.

Then, only the next year, the capital and all Italy were shaken by the second event. It was an uprising which was the direct consequence of the depravity of the peasants and powers of the day. It was the revolt of the gladiators and the slaves. It could not have taken place unless a large 'pool' of gladiators had been built up from the slaves of the finest physique for the purpose of satiating the blood lust of the mob and thereby distracting them from issues such as poverty and political impotency. Spartacus and seventy other slaves being trained for the sport of killing each other broke out of a gladiatorial 'farm' at Capua. A few similar groups had already risen against their masters in Sicily but they had lacked the leadership or the ability to sustain an uprising. However Spartacus was joined by escaping groups of gladiators and slaves from many parts of Italy. Most of them were not greatly concerned about bringing the collapse of the system in which they counted for even less than pawns. Their main concern was about being able to get home. But both ideas were about equally impossible. During two years of freedom Spartacus and his colleagues brought terror to the ruling classes and most of the countryside, especially in southern Italy. Then when their natural fortress at Mount Vesuvius was overrun the Roman revenge knew no bounds. Six thousand captives were crucified. They were not even given a fighting chance in a final circus combat! ^{22 23} The uprising seems to have had little long term effect. Many historians don't even give it a mention. In fact gladiatorial combats apparently increased in frequency in parallel with the level of unemployment and with the unemployed in "constant attendance" at the games. ²⁴

AN EMPEROR FOR AN EMPIRE

So we move on towards the point at which this narrative began. Rome was concerned at the threat to its eastern interests from the armies of King Mithridates of Pontus, east of Bithynia in what is now northern Turkey. Pompey was sent to command the war against Pontus and from 66 BCE he progressively annexed territory as far east as the Caspian and south through Syria. It was in 63 BCE that he reached and annexed Jerusalem after a siege of three months which ended with the massacre of 12,000 Jews when he finally stormed the city. Pompey was well versed, no doubt, in the imperial heritage of bloody wars as Rome expanded and held onto its empire and in the circumstances he could not know that he had bitten off more than Rome could digest. As far as he was concerned he had annexed nothing more than an ordinary city: another piece of territory which would contribute to the security of the empire and the wealth of Rome. But as we have already noted, he had guaranteed that the Messiah would be born into the Roman empire rather than in some obscure independent and religiously exclusive kingdom. He had guaranteed rapid passage for the Messianic message right throughout the Roman Empire at a time in history when that message was needed more urgently than it had ever been needed before.

Following the siege of Jerusalem Pompey returned to Rome, expecting a hero's welcome. However in an error of judgement he disbanded his army before he reached Rome and in complex circumstances he had to rely on an arrangement with a man called Julius Caesar to secure his position and to obtain the approval of the Senate for what he had done. For a few years the ship of state sailed more or less smoothly and from 59 BCE Pompey, Julius Caesar and a third man named Crassus governed the Roman state as a Triumvirate. But when Crassus died Julius Caesar and Pompey fell out. Much political intrigue followed and eventually the two lined up their armies and did battle, amid civil war, in 48 BCE. Julius Caesar won. Pompey fled to Egypt, only to be murdered. Caesar intervened and, in effect, put Cleopatra on the throne of Egypt. He suppressed the remaining supporters of Pompey and took a firm grip on the empire. But it was not to hold for long. In 46 BCE he was proclaimed dictator for a ten year term. In 45 BCE that was changed to dictator for life. In 44 BCE it was all over. Julius Caesar was assassinated by a group of his former supporters who found his claims of divinity and his demands for personal emperor-worship intolerable.

However, in the short period of his dictatorship Caesar had set about reconstructing the administration and the economy of Rome which had reached a parlous state. He commenced the reconstruction of the cities of Carthage and Corinth, realizing that their destruction had wrecked the maritime trade of the entire Mediterranean. He used mass emigration of Rome's dole queues to achieve this and he extended Roman citizenship to the provinces on a selective basis.

After Caesar's death another triumvirate of Octavian, Antony and Lepidus emerged to command the empire. Octavian, commanding the west and being in effect the monarch of Rome, was by far the most influential. Antony commanded the east and Lepidus had charge of Africa where he continued the reconstruction of Carthage which Julius Caesar had begun. But struggles and intrigues continued. Antony's affair with Cleopatra, his pretensions of divine kingship and demands for personal worship along the lines of Julius Caesar could, under the circumstances, have only one result. They did. Ten years after the assassination of Julius Caesar the senate deposed Antony with encouragement from Octavian who set about him in a great naval battle. Cleopatra's desertion, Antony's pursuit, their reconciliation and inglorious demise, he by his own dagger and she by a snake smuggled to her, is the stuff of school drama productions but it is also the stuff that helps determine the paths of governments. Egypt, declined as a legacy just 50 years before, was annexed by Octavian. On returning to Rome he was wise enough to volunteer to relinquish his authority and the Senate was wise enough to know that a change in government was called for. Out of it all, after a period of uncertainty, Rome reverted to a system of government with something very much like a monarch-by-appointment and Octavian re-emerged in 27 BCE as Caesar Augustus. He survived for 41 years, until 14 CE.

The ever increasing exploitation of slaves for both rural and town work across the empire threw ordinary free men out of work by the thousands. To avoid a revolt and social collapse the state had to feed them and their families and keep them either usefully occupied or entertained by means of public sport. While Julius Caesar's solution to the unemployment problem and the costly grain queues was to export labour for provincial reconstruction, Caesar Augustus put the emphasis on employment through public works at home. He continued the public games and atrocious spectacles to keep the under-employed mobs in Rome amused but he also set about reorganizing the police and security systems to keep them disciplined. He was anxious to restore not only discipline but also the spirit of religious devotion and full employment. He erected massive public buildings including temples for those essential religious devotions, of course. Never mind the exploitation of slaves and the slaughter of gladiators as if life has no value – let's have our religious observance! Similar policies were adopted in the provinces. On reflection, Rome's substitution of slaves for free man bears remarkable similarities to the modern western world's substitution of machines and computers for men and women.

It was during this time that towns like Thagaste were established in Numidia. Large areas were brought under cultivation and Numidia was set on its course to a level of prosperity the like of which North Africa had never known before. Prosperity and the Roman Temple went hand in hand in precisely the same manner as economic development and the Christian Mission in Africa in a more recent period.

Previous emperors had brought under one rule an immense area of strategic importance in the unfolding affairs of man. Now, given the opportunity, Caesar Augustus was kneading it, and tuning it through sound administration and stability so that it was ready and receptive to absorb and provide a vehicle for whatever religious truths might be revealed. He was dealing with a population in desperate need for moral enlightenment and release from social injustices. He was dealing with a population in desperate need of salvation. His empire had just annexed the land of the chosen people. He vigorously encouraged religious observance. So much so that he was regarded as a religious fanatic by many. He probably saw the blessings of power and prosperity for the empire and stability as the gift of the gods in return for religious observance, but the masses saw it as a sign of favour for a chosen or superior people.

Such views did not die when Christianity became established. It would therefore be easy to criticize Augustus for failing to anticipate revealed truth or for failing to understand the significance of the birth of Jesus at Nazareth in the middle years of his lengthy reign. But we ought, rather, recognize that he resisted belief in imperial divinity along the lines that Julius Caesar, whom he followed, and Antony, with whom he had shared responsibility for some years, had adopted. It is also worthy of note that in spite of being steeped in one particular tradition he was happy to approve and provide temple sites for new and foreign religions, provided that they were not subversive or immoral. While the Roman state religion was carried forward with each outward thrust of its boundaries and was reinforced by Caesar Augustus' temple building program, a series of other religions continued to enjoy, or were given, official recognition as the empire overtook them.

Conquest and trade brought many foreign cults to Italy and to the notice of Rome's officials and, just like the current period, it was a period when social conditions stimulated a search, by some people, for religious truth, for a better basis for human relationships, and the criticism of existing beliefs. But at the same time those very same conditions led to a materialism in which many other people believed they could do without gods and personal restraints. Put simply, when Roman officials agreed to recognize a non-Roman cult and granted it a temple site or officially listed its festivals they made sure that it was adjusted to suit Roman tradition. Its rituals, terminology and even its legends may have been modified or even purged so that it didn't conflict with Roman attitudes.²⁵ The cult of the Great Mother, Cybele, of Mount Ida in Asia Minor had been introduced to Rome during the second war with Carthage so that, according to the claims of its supporters, Hannibal could be kept at bay.²⁶ The cult of Bacchus, introduced only a few years later, was one which was officially suppressed, but even its adherents could get permission, on grounds of conscience, to meet in small groups. However it was not until Gallienus issued his Edict of Religious Toleration in 261 CE²⁷ that Oriental gods from Egypt, Syria or Persia were officially allowed within the sacred city boundaries, even though they had been acceptable in the surrounding Italian provinces.

Many of these religious cults and philosophies were carried across the Mediterranean to Numidia during the period of glorious reconstruction and prosperity which came as result of Roman self-interest. They joined those which were North African in origin and those which had been carried westward from Egypt. While it appears that most of them did not take root, either because of competitive pressure or simply because their concepts were totally different to the existing African religions, several of importance did take root. In doing so they added to the religious confusion in the region at the same time that they helped to shape the beliefs and attitudes of the community at Thagaste into which Augustine was born in 354 CE.

Religious plurality in a community has the potential to foster discussion and tolerance and to lead to development or evolution in philosophical and religious thinking. However when one religious community carries the baggage of self acclaimed superiority and finality, tolerance gives way to arrogance, conflict and instability, and, as we have already noted, authorities seek stability through imposed religious conformity and manipulation. The opportunity for philosophical growth and religious evolution is lost or suppressed, especially if one of the parties is as uncertain of its foundations as it is arrogant

Such was the Christian church in Numidia into which Augustine was born and which, as a youth, he was expected to accept. It was uncertain, but dogmatic. Consoling, and yet oppressive. Universal, but fragmented and exclusive. Intensely divisive, and yet supported by the State. Augustine's mother, Monica, even carried a name derived from the local deity which her forebears had worshipped – the goddess Mon. Christian parents of her generation still took the precaution of dedicating their babies to Mon as well as practising the Christian customs laid down by the church. The 'benefits' of Christianity were, after all, tied to acting out the forms of worship of the church. That meant total subjection to its systems, if you believed what the church said.

The Numidia of Augustine's childhood was quite different to the Numidia of a few generations earlier in a number of ways. Gone was the glory of Roman reconstruction. A rule of terror had replaced the period of enlightened self interest under Augustus as later emperors struggled to keep Rome's grip on its empire, as they tried to finance its administration by heavy taxes on the provinces and as they used North Africa as a granary to be exploited to feed the capital with its continuing grain queues of people without income from employment. Numidia was being administered from the rebuilt Carthage. Public buildings were falling into disrepair. Agriculture was being rundown. The peasant farmers were becoming the poor relations or second class citizens of society. Those with money were stacking it away and accumulating capital as quickly as possible while those without were being squeezed by rampant inflation.

Only a few generations before Augustine was born there had been a peasant revolt in southern Numidia. It was tinged by one of the combative forms of Christianity.²⁸ Perhaps it was inspired by it. Who knows? About the same time, 347, the orthodox party of Caecilian turned to violence to suppress the Donatist movement. They had the capable and bloody assistance of an Imperial Commissioner, Count Macarius, in trying to frighten all of North Africa into submission to the Catholic Church. His holy task left a deep scar of bitterness under the superficial unity which he achieved.

At the time that Augustine was born Constans and Constantius, the sons of Constantine, were sharing the Imperial throne. Ulphilas was in Central Europe committing the Gothic language to writing and building a strongly Arian Christian base for the nation. When he was five, the strongly Arian Authorized Creed came into use but it doesn't seem to have had much influence in North Africa.²⁹ When he was seven Julian became emperor and tried to curb the power and correct the theology of the church and to give Mithraism official recognition again. But then when Jovian came to power in a church-supported backlash against the two years of Julian's reign, while Augustine was at the impressionable age of nine, the power and influence of the church became even greater. In spite of all the signs of decline and conflict the Romanized elite were still optimistic about a perpetual empire. They took for granted their positions of privilege and their right to that position.

AUGUSTINE: CAST AS THE MODEL FOR AN AGE

Augustine and his friends grew up and were educated in a community in which life and attitudes were marked by deep division. Personal self respect and inflated dignity went hand in hand with open cynicism and vehement personal hatreds. The subservience of the peasantry to the protectors of the community contrasted with the system of patronage under which Augustine would become one of the select few. The poor man was well advised to rise and bow deeply to his lord.³⁰

Augustine knew the impact of religious conflict both in a community and family sense right from his childhood. His very possessive and determined mother was a pious Christian who seems to have had a strong fear of the consequences of non-observance of the rituals of the time. She clung to traditional practices of the African church such as meals at the tombs of the dead and Sabbath feasts which educated men rejected as primitive. An age-worn maidservant in her parents household seems to have had more influence in her conversion and conduct, probably saving her from alcoholism, than her parents. She found the non-belief of Augustine's father very difficult to bear and there was constant tension and repeated conflict until he accepted conversion, almost certainly for the sake of domestic peace.

Augustine's descriptions of his mother are so lyrical that they seem more like adulation and promotional material directed at his readers than normal admiration. He wrote "... concerning that hand-maiden of yours [God] who brought me to birth, both in her flesh, so that I was born into this temporal light, and in her heart, that I might be born into eternal light. Not of her gifts, but of your gifts in her, will I speak. She neither made herself nor did she educate herself: you created her." ³¹ "Brought up modestly and soberly ... and made subject by you to her parents rather than by her parents to you, when she arrived at a marriageable age, she was given to a husband and served 'him as her lord'. She strove to win him to you, speaking to him about you through her conduct ... She endured offences against her marriage bed in such wise that she never had a quarrel with her husband over this matter. She looked forward to seeing your mercy upon him, so that he would believe in you and be made chaste." ³² "When she heard from either side many very bitter things, like something a swollen, undigested discord often vomits up, when a rough mass of hatred is belched out in biting talk to a present friend about an absent enemy, she would never betray a thing to either of them about the other except what would help towards their reconciliation." ³³ "Finally, towards the very end of his earthly life, she gained her husband for you. After he became one of the faithful, she did not have to complain of what she had endured from him when he was not yet a believer." ³⁴

A brilliant, sensitive child, Augustine was slow to reach physical maturity, being sixteen before he reached puberty. His father had some property, enjoyed Roman citizenship and was a member of the municipal curia. ³⁵ He was probably a minor official but he was certainly in a position of privilege for that period. Augustine wrote that "beyond the resources of his own estate" his father furnished every thing he needed to go to Carthage to take up his studies again after a break because of financial strain, and he notes how other people praised his father for this effort, but Augustine does not seem to have really grasped the significance of the personal sacrifice which his father made to raise the money for his education. ³⁶ He also wrote that neither of his parents took care "to save me by marriage from plunging into ruin. Their only care was that I should learn to make the finest orations and become a persuasive speaker." ³⁷ To his mother he attributes fine motives for this oversight, while his father gets only a blast.

Augustine writes at length and somewhat extravagantly of his adolescent immorality. "I was tossed about and spilt out in my fornications; I flowed out boiled over in them" ³⁸ "...the madness of lust, licensed by human shamelessness but forbidden by your laws, took me completely under its scepter, and I clutched it with both hands." ³⁹ Great stuff for cinema, but hardly convincing as autobiography.

Augustine was certainly a young man with problems. He found himself thrust into the university town of Carthage in a time of social and economic crisis and he was with a peer group much more mature, tending to violent escapades to intimidate teachers and civic dignitaries, but he had not shaken off the constraints and rituals of his idolized mother's brand of Catholicism. His mother, by then widowed, was at home in Thagaste struggling to finance his education.

It is hard to accept the self-portrait of a young libertine. It is much easier to accept a portrait of a sensitive young man deeply in need of counselling and support. After all, his "Confessions" were not written until he was 43. He had gone through his long years of searching for truth, bouncing from one philosophy to another. It was six years after he became a priest, he was riding hard to win a bishopric and his audience loved the image of a man who had "risen" from the levels of such debased conduct.

As we continue to study Augustine it becomes quite clear that in contrast to popular belief he was not a late convert from paganism after an early life of unbridled debauchery and irresponsibility. He never forgot that he had been "salted", or his pleading for baptism, or his upbringing in the "True Wisdom" of Christianity and he loved the solemn Easter vigils of the great basilicas. As a student in Carthage he remained loyal to the Catholic Church, at least in the sense that it was to church that he would go as a lonely stranger from the provinces in search of a girlfriend.⁴⁰ At the same time his religious thought apparently pivoted around Christ to the extent that impressive non-Christian ceremonials which he was to witness many times did not provide the inspiration for him that they did for most others of his generation.

Augustine had been at Carthage for about a year when his father died. Although their relationship seems to have been somewhat distant, it would have been difficult for Augustine to avoid a feeling of being sucked further into a vacuum. In reaching for an intimate personal relationship to fill that vacuum Augustine chose to live with a woman who, according to his "Confessions", loved him without being loved in return. He was "loving love" for sexual experience or gratification only. Hardly an unusual relationship, either for his day or ours. Their son, Adeodatus, was born the next year.

Augustine's disenchantment with some aspects of ritual Christianity increased. He became disappointed with the fruitlessness of his search for truth and wisdom in the books of the Bible then in circulation; the "half-hearted compromise with Judaism and the exceptional sensitivity of the bishops to any challenge to their authority. He found that Christianity as he knew it did not provide the spiritual wisdom which, as a student of Cicero, he was looking for. He reacted to the oppressive environment in which the Bible was treated as a quarry for rigorous legal rulings and in which a "true" Christian had to accept this "Law" completely and without debate.⁴¹ He became a Manichee hearer, or something like a student preparing for full involvement. The orthodox church regarded Manichaeism as an austere, illegal and sinister society. Orthodox Christians viewed it with fear and hatred. Many non-Christians were attracted to it because it disowned the authoritarianism of the official church, while others viewed it with horror. But the Manichees saw themselves as reformers of Christianity.

At that point Augustine changed career direction as well as religious step. He dropped law, which his parents had pushed him into, and trained to teach philosophy. When he returned to Thagaste in 375 (aged 21) to teach philosophy his mother shut him out as a heretic. Not even her own Manichee son could darken her orthodox doorway! But after a while she relented in the hope that he would return to the fold. His faith and his self-understanding took a shaking a year later when a close Manichee friend fell ill, was given Orthodox Christian baptism by his parents while in a coma, recovered temporarily, rejected Augustine and then died in a matter of days.

Augustine fled to Carthage to think through his situation and his beliefs. While he struggled with religious questions in Carthage the Arian Goths were beginning to push south from Germany towards Rome. News travelled quickly from Rome to Carthage. It travelled less quickly from Carthage to Thagaste. For seven years he continued to defy his mother and actively supported the Manichees. As he taught and continued to study the philosophers he found no contentment or finality and struggled from one minor crisis to the next. He was an active Manichee in Carthage in 380 and 381 when Gratian and Theodosius issued their edicts imposing Trinitarian orthodoxy on the whole empire, making conversion to paganism punishable AND requiring the Senate to disavow belief in the old religious systems.⁴²

THE PROFESSOR OF RHETORIC

Then fate smiled on Augustine. The Roman Pro-consuls in Carthage happened to be the son and a son-in-law of the tutor to the new boy-emperor. They and their senate colleagues in Rome were just as happy to form an association with Augustine, a teacher-philosopher, as he was to form one with them. He received plenty of encouragement to go to Rome to seek a better post and such a move might also have provided a convenient escape from a difficult situation. He was becoming disillusioned with the Manichees and they were an increasingly persecuted sect living in fear of denunciation. He sailed for Rome in 383, choosing to deceive his mother so that he could go without her. His first year in Rome was spent in misery and sickness. However he began to feel more at home when he was introduced by Manichee friends to Symmachus, a Prefect of Rome who had been a Pro-Consul in Carthage while Augustine was a student there. Symmachus had not accepted Christianity. Heretics and pagans had good reason to be allies in the shadow of intolerant state Catholicism. In 394, through the influence of Symmachus, Augustine was appointed professor of rhetoric for Milan where the imperial court was then residing.

Among the responsibilities of his new post was the preparation and delivery of the official panegyrics on the emperor and the consuls. These speeches had something of the nature of a twentieth century Australian State Governor's address at the opening of parliament, being carefully tuned to publicize the planned programs of the court. In that way the professor of rhetoric became something of a propaganda minister.⁴³ He was in the public eye as well as the emperor's. He could hardly avoid imperial edicts for very long even if he was "planted" on the emperor by the Manichees to influence him. Fear and disillusionment pressed on him again. He took to reading Cicero again.

Symmachus tried to use Augustine to persuade the boy-emperor, Valentine II, to reverse the edicts of 380 and 381, but he reckoned without his own cousin Ambrose. The son of a powerful administrator, Ambrose had been appointed to Milan as governor of Liguria Province but had promptly been "seized upon" as suitable to be ordained as bishop! That little exercise illustrates very well the relationship between the church and the state of the day. Ambrose was never baptized. He only received instruction for church membership. That is also very interesting indeed in view of the overpowering emphasis which he put on the baptism of others.⁴⁴ By the nature of his appointments Ambrose had become, beyond dispute, the most powerful man in Milan. He wrote to the boy-emperor reminding him that he was a catechumen of the Catholic Church, that the Roman gods were demons and that he would be barred from the bishop's church if he agreed to Symmachus' request.⁴⁵ Augustine soon adapted to the circumstances and the demands of his new station. He needed a legal wife rather than a concubine. Church, legal and social requirements meant that he couldn't simply change the status of his relationship with his son's mother. In 385 he dismissed her, sent her back to Africa an "obscure victim of the high Catholic principles and great snobbery of the Milanese" and became betrothed to a more suitable young heiress. Adeodatus, who was then twelve, stayed with his father.⁴⁶ Augustine also became a catechumen. He was an appointee of the Christian court. He could no longer be suspected of failing to uphold the edicts of the Christian emperor about whom he composed lyrical panegyrics or he would soon lose more than his post on religious grounds.

So much for his miraculous "conversion" at the hands of Ambrose. Augustine was learning about the power of the church and its strong men very quickly. But he was still shaken by misgivings. He lurched from the brink of baptism to Neoplatonism. Then the boy-emperor's mother, Justina, ordered the orthodox church to hand over one of its churches to the Arians. Ambrose refused. He portrayed it as a case of "the court against the city", barricaded his party in a basilica and prepared for a long siege. The court lost its nerve and Ambrose won. The Arians did not receive a church.⁴⁷

Augustine lurched all the way and formally accepted Catholicism. He put it down to his reading of Paul's epistle. But he could still not bring himself to face the trauma of baptism. The total rejection of life's pleasures, including the subjugation of all forms of sexual relations even for married couples, the break-up of family life because of this and the "heroic" stoicism which baptism involved for Christians of the late Roman era, especially as preached by Ambrose, were more than Augustine could stand.

To read Paul's letter to the Romans against this background, and to imagine oneself with Augustine in the Roman Imperial Court in Milan in that 'generation of St. Paul' just before the letters were canonized as part of the perpetual Christian 'truth' is stimulating indeed.⁴⁸ It is easy to see how Paul's efforts to balance or redirect the erroneous and highly superstitious beliefs of his sparsely educated era misfired. They produced equally strongly held beliefs and fears with a different and very divisive emphasis. Augustine, a brilliant speaker, copious writer and a scholar/philosopher in search of a place in life was trying to work his way through it and rationalize the positions of intense conflict into which he had stumbled through his particular chain of personal circumstances. His health failed. He was on the point of a complete breakdown. He had to give up his job. He rejected his proposed marriage and retired to a villa with his mother and his son to convalesce and to write philosophy. A year or so of that and he decided to return to Milan and to be baptized by Ambrose at Easter 387 in his awe-inspiring and mystical manner before returning to Numidia.

Augustine planned to live in Numidia by whatever enterprise would provide an income and his party would have made its departure except that civil war overtook them. Maximus, the Roman general who had already scored a line in the record books by being the first person to burn a heretic at the stake, Priscillian, ⁴⁹ had blockaded the harbours to Rome in an attempt to usurp the throne. Theodosius, the emperor at Constantinople who had signed the edicts of 380 and 381 and who had bought “peace” with the Goths ⁵⁰ was preparing to take him on. Augustine and his party had to stay at Ostia, a harbourside town, for the duration of the blockade. While they were there his mother died and it was not until 388 that he and his son reached Thagaste via Carthage. During their brief stop over in Carthage Augustine met Aurelius, a deacon who became bishop of Carthage in 392. They forged an alliance which, with Aurelius as President of the Council of Hippo and effectively primate of North Africa, was to be Augustine’s springboard to power and a sword to impose reforms which he proposed.

It is not clear how Augustine earned a living at Thagaste for the next two years. He must still have had a small income from property unless he had a little nest egg from his post in Milan. His son Adeodatus was still a student. He continued writing but he had not brought his text books with him and his views show a gradual change as he was thrust into face to face contact with the church in North Africa for the first time. He wrote of the incarnation. He wrote on creation. He wrote in defence of the Catholic Church and against Donatists. He had begun to see a post as a Catholic Bishop as an alternative to a life as an insignificant Neoplatonic recluse.

Adeodatus died, aged 16, in 390. What was left of Augustine’s personal world was shattered. Out of the ruins he seems to have pieced together an idea. He would establish a monastery. It would have the security of a permanent community bound together by a commitment to Christian charity. He headed for Hippo Regius on the Mediterranean coast about 150 kilometres away. That, he thought, would be a suitable place for a man of his experience to set up a monastery! He arrived in 391, a lonely but very determined man. With the traditional show of reluctance he accepted ordination as a priest almost immediately. Possibly he was disappointed at not being appointed directly to a bishopric as Ambrose had been in Milan. ⁵¹ But after all he wasn’t a provincial governor. He was an out of work professor.

Hippo was dominated by Donatists and the Manichees had a lot of influence around the fringes of a demoralized Catholic community. ⁵² The training, education and leadership of the clergy generally was pathetic and, quite naturally, Augustine was involved in preaching right from the start instead of being left on the sidelines at the bishop's feet. Only bishops preached! He also got approval to set up a monastery. Within a year he was debating publicly against the Manichees, among whom were his former friends who had helped him towards his professorial post in the imperial court.

THE PRIESTLY POWER GAME: DONATISTS MUST GO!

By December 393 he had really made it. Although still only a priest and not entitled to participate in a council of the church he was invited by Aurelius to address the Council of Hippo.⁵³ He took as his theme "On faith and the Creed." Because of that occasion he was soon known throughout the church, but more especially in North Africa. Very soon he was in full flight against the Donatists. He composed a jingle, "The ABC against the Donatists", which caught the public imagination and this led him to public debates in which his skills were, of course, decisive.

Against some strong opposition from fellow members of the clergy Aurelius arranged for Augustine to be appointed a coadjutor bishop in 395. At that time a bishop was idolized and venerated by his congregations in such a way that the belief that they were endowed with supernatural gifts and authority tended to be self-generating both among the clergy and the laity. They were provided with elevated sanctuaries, cloth-draped thrones and ceremonial processions with crowds of chanting consecrated virgins.⁵⁴ Augustine caught their imagination more than most.

In 395 there were about 600 bishops across North Africa. About half were Catholics and half were Donatists. Aurelius shared Augustine's attitudes towards the Donatists, he patronized his monastery, assisted its development as a seminary and then "planted" Augustine's protégés as bishops in leading towns across Numidia. These protégés were often men drawn from the imperial bureaucracy, including the dreaded secret police, and they enjoyed the support of some of the wealthiest landowners in the Western Empire.⁵⁵ In contrast the Donatist clergy tended to be drawn more from the poorer sections of the community, including the non-Romanized African peasantry. The balance of power and influence between the Catholics and the Donatists changed rapidly. So did the balance of power within the church and between the church and the state. The concentration of a ruthless power group in a single province, Numidia, was both a symptom and a factor in changing relationships across the empire.

Augustine had learned the power game in the shadow of Ambrose very well, but he became more and more dependent for support and for his authority on the wealthy and powerful landowners. In turn this complicated existing divisions between religious and secular groups in the community and concentrated power still further in the hands of the powerful. It was exercised ruthlessly. Augustine's clergy evolved into a distinct and powerful caste; celibate, living individually simple lives of poverty but being corporately wealthy, corrupt and austere.

They were intent on bringing to ruin every group which did not fall into line with their own theology and practices.

Theodosius, the emperor who had confiscated all Arian property and handed it to the Orthodox Trinitarians only 16 years before ⁵⁶ died only shortly before Augustine was appointed Coadjutor Bishop. He was succeeded by his juvenile sons Arcadius in the east and Honorius in the west. By their father's direction they were both subject to the guardianship of the Arian Gothic general Stilicho. ⁵⁷ Honorius was therefore very largely dependent on good relations with Stilicho for his ability to stay in power in the west and Arcadius had a similar dependence on Alaric, another Arian Goth, in the east. Whether this had anything to do with the eagerness which Aurelius showed to have Augustine in a position of authority is not clear. They had already combined to encourage or coerce changes such as the abolition of the celebrations of the anniversaries of martyrs in 394. The importance of the Goth uprising against Arcadius when he defaulted on military grants in 395 could hardly escape Augustine's notice. ⁵⁸ Progressively Aurelius and Augustine turned their wrath against the Donatists.

They denounced the tendency for Catholics to adopt Donatism in order to have any chance in law suits in communities such as Hippo where there was a numerical imbalance. In 397 they banned marriages between Catholics and Donatists – or any other non-Catholics for that matter, even for the sons of clergy! They drove the wedge more deeply into the community by forbidding the clergy to make donations or to leave legacies to non-Catholics. Within a few years they were using harsh police measures to suppress its activities. Shades of Macarius. They justified this because of the coercion which the Donatists had used to avoid a split within their own ranks.

Ambrose died the same year. Both the church and the state exploited the fantastic level of veneration which had built up around him. A Moor, Count Gildo, had been trying to usurp the power of Rome in North Africa. He had a strong base of popular support through his friendship with the elder statesman of the Donatists, Bishop Optatus of Timgad. Taking advantage of this, Augustine began to preach that the Donatists were trying to bring down the empire and Honorius sent troops against Gilda, inspired, or indoctrinated, with the belief that the ghost of Ambrose would protect them. They won, of course! Whether it was deliberate misuse of the Christian Church for political purposes or an example of theological error is not important in considering the consequences. Those actions compounded the veneration of "saints"; stimulated the hunt for more of them; helped to perpetuate belief in intervention by saints and intercession through intermediaries, whether living priests or dead saints; strengthened the mystical grip of the church over its adherents and the authority of the ordained, and thickened the cloud of theological garbage through which man had to struggle.

When a new count was appointed for North Africa there was a general hardening of Roman authority and in 399 imperial agents were used to close all pagan shrines. Augustine began to rail against an alliance of pagans, heretics and Jews which was supposed to be hell-bent on destroying the unity of Roman Catholicism. ⁵⁹ Mob wars erupted. Bitterness between the two major factions grew deeper. Converts were attacked by their former colleagues. After he had been beaten up and left for dead the Donatist-turned-Catholic Bishop of Bagai went to Rome in 404 to seek retribution and police protection.

When he arrived Rome itself was in confusion. Honorius had mounted a massive triumph in honour of Stilicho and the defeat of the Goths in their attacks on Rome during the previous two years but, at the same time, he was preparing to evacuate his government from Rome to the more easily secured Ravenna, except that religious affairs would be administered from Rome.⁶⁰ In the circumstances, to whom would the bishop of Bagai turn with his request that another “Count Macarius” be sent to Numidia to make the heretics toe the line? Whoever he appealed to, he didn’t get his wish. Instead in June 405, an ‘Edict of Unity’ was sent to Carthage. It declared all Donatists heretics; it declared all their property to belong to the Catholic Church, and of course it disbanded their organization.

It appears that at the time Augustine was not in favor of that course. He knew that the Catholic Church couldn’t absorb them all without force, without massive upheaval and without violence, but he accepted the decision as an act of Providence. He could not control the situation. The Edict did, of course, result in harsh repression of the Donatists. It helped to set a pattern for attitudes and conduct for the next generation. The pattern did not change – only the ferocity – and Augustine was soon taking full advantage of it.

AN EMPIRE IN COLLAPSE

On the other side of the Mediterranean the base of the empire was being eroded by civil wars which were triggered in part by efforts to enforce religious uniformity, in part by economic collapse, and in part by conflicting ethnic ambitions. The empire was under greater pressure from outside and the Goths were no longer sure that they should cooperate to prop up the empire. The frontier was no longer a defended line. “Authorized” barbarians settled or were employed and moved freely through the northern provinces. The “unauthorized” barbarians stayed outside more from choice than because they were prevented from moving into the empire.

The pace of collapse quickened. In 406 the frontier crumbled and a combined force of various tribes led by Vandals took control of Gaul. Stilicho, to whom Honorius had still been something of a puppet, fell, his murder contrived by the emperor in 408. So we have come to that power vacuum again.⁶¹

Alaric, the Goth to whom Arcadius had also been virtually a puppet in the east and who had already marched against Rome twice, took advantage of the vacuum and marched an army into Italy again only a few weeks later. Although it seems difficult to appreciate at this time difference, he apparently still didn’t want to bring the empire to ruin. He demanded more territory, a bigger say in government and more money for his army. But the emperor, well defended in Ravenna, wouldn’t oblige. To press his case Alaric laid siege to Rome twice during the next two years. The inhabitants were starved into cannibalism on occasions. Although the city had not been the political capital of the empire for some time it was still home to many of the empire's elite and Christians had been pounded with the idea that it was the God-given home of the church. Rome was therefore a symbol of empire, both earthly and heavenly.

These years were a period of crisis in North Africa but, preoccupied in Italy, the Roman authorities lost interest in Africa and left it largely to its own devices. Support for the Catholic Church was withdrawn, the campaign to suppress the Donatists was allowed to run down and the imperial laws against heresy were suspended. Emperor Honorius refused to reintroduce them without a full enquiry into the schism. The Donatists rejoiced and their bishop returned to Hippo. Augustine had to flee. Only an error by his guide saved him from martyrdom in an ambush. There was confusion and bitterness as disillusioned Catholics and reprieved Donatists fought for control of assets which had been forfeited by the Donatists under the Edict of 405, barely four years before. Segregation burst whole communities all over again.

Alaric finally entered Rome on August 24th, 410, when a traitor opened a gate. The city was "mildly" sacked and partly burned but the Arian Christian leader ordered that no churches of other Christian property was to be touched. Refugees headed for Numidia en masse and the authorities in Carthage panicked.

Only a matter of days after Alaric entered Rome a law was issued from Ravenna re-affirming all legislation against non-Catholics who included, of course, both Donatists and the heretic Arian Goths. Only a few weeks later, in October 410, Honorius convened a conference to be held in Carthage to resolve once and for all the position of the Donatists. He ordered that its work be completed within a few months.

Augustine continued to upset a lot of people. They were not only the "pagans, heretics and Jews" against whom he had been letting fly. They included a lot of orthodox Catholics on both sides of the Mediterranean. Prominent among them was a monk named Pelagius, thought to have been Irish, who had gone from Britain to Rome to take up an appointment about the same time as Augustine. He had read the "Confessions" which Augustine wrote and published progressively from 397 to about 401 and disagreed strongly with the author's views on sin and grace. In the wake of the sack of Rome, the disagreement came out into the open and developed into another of the major controversies of Christian theology, the so called Pelagian heresy. It compounded the crisis of doubts and fears for Christians, the bitterness of non-Christians towards the church which the fall of Rome had brought on, and the tensions in North Africa just as the conference called by Honorius was being organized.

Augustine joined yet another battle. He exaggerated and misrepresented the views of Pelagius in order to gain support to have them rejected and to maintain his own authority. In the meantime, in the months following the sack of Rome, his health failed again and he went to a friend's country estate to convalesce for a time. However illness did not force him into idleness. He began writing "City of God." Then on 18th May 411 the Donatist bishops arrived in Carthage in procession ready for the conference. When it opened on June 1st the Donatists declined to accept the arbitrator's proposal for a private conference with only seven representatives of each side meeting with him and insisted on an open conference with all bishops present. Thus 286 Catholic bishops faced 279 Donatists. Augustine naturally played a dominant role in the conference. Some writers give him credit for having arranged and conducted it and say that he and his supporters were prepared to resign their offices if the Donatists would “return to the community of believers.”⁶² Others put the emphasis on his efforts to prove that there was no basis for a split church because Caecilian, around whom the schism had originally developed, had no case against the church.⁶³

By June 9th it was all over. It had been a put up job anyway. The arbitrator, Marcellinus, was in no way independent. He was an orthodox Catholic, a friend of Augustine, appointed by the Emperor and really only interested in finding a basis on which to determine that the Donatists had no case. As may have been expected there was a brief calm of uncertainty before the storm burst.

Ravenna was pre-occupied with appeasing the Goths and the Vandals and the court was not inclined to waste time and effort on the church schism in North Africa. But Numidia's fortunes were changing again as a result of the sack of Rome and the power of its Catholic church increased dramatically. The Vandals and the Goths had grown to regard themselves as a part of the Roman Empire. They were simply struggling for a larger slice of the imperial cake and personal elevation within the imperial service.⁶⁴ The Goths in particular were prepared to go on supporting the basic system of the empire if not the detail. Their power in relation to Ravenna and the traditional aristocratic and landowning authorities of Italy increased. The price for their continued support was more land to settle and more money – to support their armies in the Imperial Service of course!

The concessions necessary for Ravenna to keep a tenuous hold on the reins of the empire deprived it of a big proportion of its provincial taxes and its grain supplies. North Africa was the only region from which it could hope to extract a big increase in both. It became, in effect, a sheet anchor for the emperor, but being safely out of reach of Ravenna, its loyalty and supplies had a very high price. When Honorius had to give the Goths almost four fifths of Gaul in 412 his position became critical. The wealthy landowners in Numidia extorted tax concessions as the price for their grain supplies and the ever increasing tax deficit had to be made up from somewhere. It could only be made up from the not-so-wealthy and the defenceless who were ground into the dirt. The Catholic bishops, urged on by Augustine, also got what they wanted: resolute imposition of the Catholic faith throughout the province.⁶⁵ Honorius issued an absolute edict against the Donatists which made the edict of 405 sound like child's play. Membership of the Catholic church was made mandatory. An exceptionally heavy “tariff” was imposed on anyone who failed to join the Catholic church, regardless of his station in life, and many estates were seized. Unparalleled and fanatical aggression was let loose on the Donatists. Augustine's preaching on predestination inspired and was used to justify mass slaughter of those who were not “predestined” to enter the “true faith.”

At this point Augustine began distributing the early parts of “City of God” although he did not complete the work until 426, by which time he had modified some of his earlier inflammatory attitudes and pronouncements. But at that stage the early parts had an immediate impact. They were designed to justify “Christianity”, to refute claims that the church had been responsible for the collapse of the empire, to defuse the antagonism towards the church which was being generated because of what was happening in Numidia, and to ensure for it a dominant role as the emperor’s grip continued to weaken and civil administration crumbled throughout the empire. Augustine had to be recognized as an authority. After all he had been a senior figure at court and he was now the key figure in the “true church” in the only reasonably stable province of the western empire.

By 414 the Goths had moved on from Gaul to Spain, with encouragement from the emperor, and they set about the elimination of the tribes of Vandals which had settled there. Other tribes, including the Alans who had settled in what is now Portugal, would have suffered the same fate except that Honorius, still clinging precariously to office, persuaded the Visigoths to accept south west France as an independent kingdom in recognition of services to the empire.⁶⁶

About this time Dulciticus, a pious Roman civil servant who had a brother in the priesthood, was posted to Numidia as Imperial Agent. He had to enforce the edict against the Donatists. He was shocked by the ferocity of ecclesiastical politics and went to discuss with Augustine the threat by Donatist bishop Gaudentius to burn himself with the members of his congregation who had barricaded themselves into their magnificent basilica.

Augustine observed that “Seeing that God, by a hidden, though just, disposition, has predestined some to the ultimate penalty (of Hellfire), it is doubtless better that an overwhelming majority of the Donatists should have been collected and reabsorbed... while a few perish in their own flames: better indeed, than all Donatists should burn in the flame of Hell for their sacrilegious dissension.”⁶⁷ He described the separate suicides chosen by thousands as preferable to the alternative of brutal murder as “a part of their accustomed behaviour.”

Augustine now found that he had to pull out all the stops in his campaign against Pelagius whose clear reasoning had been accepted in the east and was beginning to undermine his own influence both in Africa and in Rome.⁶⁸ Put in a nutshell, the Pelagian view was that man had a free will. Freedom was to be taken for granted and this did not conflict in any way with God’s demand for obedience and the pursuit of perfect conduct; baptism indicated acceptance of a certain direction in a person’s life; and predestination, with its implication that God condemned masses of mankind to fail to reach perfection and salvation was a load of garbage. Augustine, an expert on the subject after fifteen years of repression in Numidia, wasn’t about to allow free discussion now. Synods and councils were manipulated willi nilli because, in the eyes of the North Africans, only a decision carrying the full prestige of Rome could undo the effects of the judgement of an Eastern Synod (which had met in Jerusalem) in favour of Pelagius. But Augustine did not get the Papal decision in his favour that he was looking for. He got instead a lecture on tolerance!⁶⁹

Imperial interest in stability through theological uniformity then reared its ugly head again. A riot broke out among Pelagian supporters against officials thought to be lobbying the emperor in favour of Augustine. This was too much. Honorius was still beholden to the church and to the church in Numidia in particular. On April 30th 418 the imperial law hit rock bottom. An edict was issued to the effect that Pelagius and his supporters, the new boat-rockers, “think that it is a mark of lower class pettiness to agree with everybody else, and think that they are exceptionally knowledgeable because they destroy what is agreed upon by the whole community.” Pelagius was expelled from Rome and anyone who continued to lobby for him was to be dealt with appropriately. Naturally that round of repression failed to resolve the crisis and the controversy raged on with the church continuing to tear itself apart over the issue for some time.

THE SACK OF HIPPO

For how long could Augustine continue in such vein? He was getting old. Surely people could see what was happening. Perhaps. But it was the same old story. Once a chain of relationships has been firmly established self interest and the assumption of “rightness” carries it on and only the greater self interest of particular links in the chain or dynamic forces outside the chain will make it break. In the public arena it was left to a young southern Italian bishop with a wealthy family background, Julian, to lead a vigorous rearguard action against Augustine and his theology from 418 when Pelagius was expelled. He was not strong enough to break the chain. He too, was exiled.

The economic and social effects of the obsessive repression of Donatists in Numidia had become serious. The ordinary people were little better than slaves to Augustine’s landed gentry. The country could not function normally and the state would have little enthusiasm for pressing on with the policy of repression except for Augustine’s constant goading. For the ordinary people there was, still, underneath their thin veneer of Christian doctrine and practice, a deeper interest in the pagan literary circles, circuses and festivals. Augustine and his bishops had been active only for themselves and their protégés. Augustine therefore had to rely more and more on his personal relations with the army commanders to see that the official policy of suppression against the Donatists was carried out. In 418, with the Pelagian controversy at its height and his personal reputation and authority possibly at its lowest, he formed an alliance of mutual benefit with Boniface who was commanding a force of Arian Gothic mercenaries in the imperial service in Numidia. Boniface was an Arian, and therefore a heretic, but his wife was a Catholic. A combination of blackmail and intrigue led to him continuing to ‘protect’ the Catholics. When his wife died Boniface wanted to enter a monastery but Augustine persuaded him not to and to continue in his military role. He did so and Augustine had no option but to support his assumption of powers as the ‘count’ of Africa.

Boniface had his position confirmed in 426 during a visit to Ravenna, possibly because of Augustine’s apparent support for him, but Augustine was greatly dismayed when he returned to Numidia with an Arian second wife, with concubines as well, and with his daughters baptized by heretics. Augustine and Boniface drifted apart. Boniface fortified Carthage against attack from Rome and concentrated on securing his position against attack from the hinterland.

The campaign against the Donatists ground to another halt. The African ‘barbarians’, (a euphemism for non-Catholic), became restless. There was trouble brewing. In the meantime the empire in Europe was breaking up province by province. In 425 Valentinian III became emperor and forced an ‘enquiry’ to detect and suppress Pelagian supporters in Gaul. The bulk of the Arian Goths and Vandals had moved further west, leaving only a residue among the orthodox Catholic church communities which had already been there before the collapse of the frontier. Friction between the tribes which were cutting up France and Spain, and pressure on the Vandals from the Goths in particular, led to the Vandals looking for alternative territory in North Africa.

Ravenna’s dependence on grain from Numidia became so critical that Genseric was easily able to blackmail Valentinian into allowing him to ‘settle’ the most productive areas. With a total community of 80,000 Vandals which included only a small organized army he crossed the Strait of Gibraltar in 428 and moved east through Mauritania without resistance.^{70 71} The established Roman rule collapsed as they moved through but it was from the effects of long-standing internal conflicts rather than from any intervention by Genseric and his forces. The Catholic bishops in the Numidian country areas were totally demoralized. But when he reached Hippo in 429 Genseric found a different situation. For one thing Boniface was not about to give up his claims as Count of North Africa. For another, an emissary had been despatched from Ravenna to patch up the differences between Augustine, Boniface and the court and to settle the unrest of the ‘barbarians’ lest Genseric’s ‘settlement’ might prove to be a total annexation.

Boniface commanded the defence of Hippo with his Arian Gothic mercenaries but the Numidian countryside was left to the Vandals and each of the parties to thirty years of conflict helped to tear the heart out of it. Augustine could only watch and listen from his virtual prison in Hippo as reports came in of towns sacked and of villas burned with their owners killed or scattered as refugees. The bishops and clergy were on the run or murdered. The holy virgins and ascetics in their monasteries were dispersed, tortured or killed outright. Reversion to paganism was the rule rather than the exception as churches were closed or destroyed, and the sacraments were neither being sought nor offered, with few places available for the faithful to offer sacrifices to their God.⁷² Arian bishops began arriving. The Jewish communities gained confidence in challenging the exclusive position of the church.

Augustine fell ill in August 430 and died on August 28th. Hippo did not survive him long. It was evacuated and partly burned a few months later. What remained of the Catholic community was persecuted or driven out by the Arians as the Catholics had earlier driven out the Donatists. A Vandal kingdom was established and Arian Christianity was taught for just over 100 years.⁷³ Carthage itself remained in Roman hands as a military foothold in Africa until 439 although it was of little economic value once the surrounding granary of Europe had fallen to the Vandals, and Genseric was probably in no great hurry.

There was little left of Catholic North Africa. The province which had determined the course of the church in the Western Empire was being wiped off the map, but despite its annihilation it was leaving behind it the theology which would dominate Christianity for a thousand years. Fortunately Augustine's library, including his correspondence, survived when Hippo was overrun so that we are able to understand the things which influenced his actions, to understand his motives and to feel the atmosphere of his time. But centre stage was vacant

Although centre stage was vacant, Augustine's ideas could not be ignored for several reasons. His forceful character, his actions and the many decisions taken in which he had a personal influence during his active ministry, on both sides of the Mediterranean, left a legacy of mini-Augustines planted across North Africa. They were soon also planted as refugees over much of Europe, and, as a consequence, would have a lasting impact even without help from any other quarter. His protégés from the Hippo monastery so totally absorbed his thinking that their departure left a big void and meant the collapse of Catholic Numidia. Then there were his books and volumes of letters. They were studied and restudied, often in isolation from the context in which they were written, and they were often accorded status little different to that of the canonized books of the Bible. The historical importance of Augustine's writings can therefore hardly be exaggerated.

It has been argued that his 'Confessions' is the outstanding spiritual autobiography of a Christian writer, that his 'Literal Commentary on Genesis' sets the standard for later Biblical interpretation, that his 'Enarrations on the Psalms' was "most prized by the humanistic scholars of the Renaissance" and that his fifteen books 'On the Trinity' are unequaled in the early church.⁷⁴ On top of that it has often been said that no single book except the Bible had a greater influence on Europe in the Middle Ages than the book which Augustine regarded as his masterpiece. That book, 'City of God', almost defies evaluation in a few paragraphs.

A PRESCRIPTION FOR TRAGEDY

Some of Augustine's ideas have already been touched on but an outline of some of his other ideas will help to set the background to situations which unfolded progressively. The influence of his childhood, his own disastrous relationships with women and his reading of Platonism, for example, are all evident in his views on love and marriage. So is the impact of the strange roles reserved for women, especially virgins, in the church of his youth. Augustine believed that husbands should love the sexuality of their wives and the physical bonds of their families only as a Christian must love his enemies.⁷⁵ The taming of a man's carnal desires was supposed to be a symbol of his efforts to achieve a 'Kingdom of God' within himself.⁷⁶

Augustine played on the African Christian's fear of God as an awe-inspiring judge. He strengthened his personal authority through it and used it to encourage his flock to see him as an intercessory or as an intermediary with God. He told them that he would be responsible to God for the sins of his entire flock on the terrible judgement day.⁷⁷ He does not seem to have seen anything inconsistent between that attitude and his pronouncements on predestination. We may wonder how he could tell a man one minute that he was utterly dependent on God even for his first initiative in believing in God and then tell him the next minute that he, Augustine, was held responsible for the poor man's sins. He would even send members of his clergy who had deep-seated arguments or grievances between them to a shrine in Italy where Divine Judgement was supposed to detect any perjury! ^{78 79}

The man who, as a youth, was disenchanted with ritual Christianity and the insensitivity of the bishops in their insistence on their personal authority could later write some of the most shabby documents of the relations of Christianity to the civilization of the ancient world when he wanted to put pressure on a town council. ⁸⁰ He could idealize the church as morally without a spot or wrinkle. He could describe it as a mother giving birth and nourishing its predestined members to take their place in 'the Body of Christ' or in 'the Heavenly Jerusalem'. ^{81 82} Then, as if to snap the cap off a volcano of bigotry, he could incite the mob to "love wholeheartedly: then do what you like'. That was quite sufficient basis for bigots of his own and later generations to oppress and murder without restraint. ⁸³ The end, Augustine would maintain, justified the means as long as it was done in the name of Christ!

SACRAMENTS, BAPTISM AND ELECTION

That linked in with his attitude towards the church, the sacraments, and a Christian's personal responsibilities. He wrote that the church had two 'tiers' of member. The inner core was a defined number of 'elect' or 'true elite' surrounded by a mass of 'false' members who constantly needed correction. ^{84 85} The individual was guarded by his sacraments, but the life of a 'true elite' Christian implied a relationship with God of innocence and holiness, and coexistence with sinners in humility and integrity, but also authority to actively rebuke and correct sinners if need be with force which was not consistent with Christian love. ⁸⁶

In 390 Augustine interpreted baptism as the beginning of withdrawal from public life. However by 410, when Rome was sacked for the first time, his position had changed to the point that he could say to the Roman authorities that the disasters of the empire came from the toleration of paganism, heresy and immorality in the new Christian empire, not from the neglect of old rites by those withdrawn Christians. In his view Baptism had become both the only way to salvation and a badge authorizing the enforcement of Catholicism and the repression of heretics and pagans. ^{87 88} It was at that time that he began work on 'City of God' with the main aim of countering the claims of those who said that that Christianity had brought about the collapse of the empire and to push the blame onto the non-Christian religions and their gods. However it proved to be a 14-year effort and, as already mentioned, he put it into circulation piecemeal.

The pagans could hardly be expected to distinguish between the God of Christianity, the theology of its adherents and the structures and personalities of the church. As far as they were concerned all three were rolled up into one general influence. In that respect their attitude was no different to the attitude of Christians generally towards other faiths today. However

Augustine took full advantage of that confusion and he appears to have deliberately confused and merged all three factors. What is more, by debating the conduct and effectiveness of Roman gods instead of denying them outright he maintained a competitive outlook and often implied acceptance of a multitude of gods with the God of Christianity simply being more powerful than the others. He wrote, for example, "I have shown that, far from having done aught to save their worshippers from the miseries that lay heavy upon them, the false gods did their utmost to increase the burden beyond endurance." "The fact is that the gods did not ward off the evils which pagans dread, even at a time when they were freely worshipped, At various times and in different places before the coming of our Redeemer, calamities beyond counting and description were scourging mankind. Yet, what others besides your recreant gods did the world worship?"⁸⁹ His use of the expression 'true and supreme God' also implies the existence of inferior or subordinate gods.⁹⁰ There is none of the simple, clear authority of Moses' final instructions to his people which we read in Deuteronomy 4: 35 and 39: "This (creation, revelation and law) he showed you so that you might know that Yahweh is God indeed and that there is no other. ... Understand this today, therefore, and take it to heart: Yahweh is God indeed, in heaven above as on earth beneath, he and no other." Granted, Augustine was in debating mode to coerce people away from pagan worship, but Moses had a similar task to persuade his people not to revert to the worship of Baal. And considering the vigour with which Augustine attacked the Donatists and others for their variations on a theme of orthodox Christianity it is reasonable to expect that his writing would at least reflect the vigour and confidence of the doxology to the Letter of Jude, verse 25: "To God, the only God, who saves us through Jesus Christ our Lord, be the glory, majesty, authority and power, which he had before time began, now and for ever."⁹¹ Therefore, in the absence of such an approach we can hardly be surprised that people elevated angels and saints to demi-god status and continued to confuse the Trinity.

But Augustine had other aims which probably evolved as he went along. He tried to justify the church as the paramount civil authority. He did this by contrasting a 'City', or some ill-defined all-embracing community based on the rule of God through a predestined elite of lovers of Christ, with a community which, also by predestination, had either rejected, fallen from, or been thrown out of the City of God. He tried to identify these two cities at different levels. There were, he said, the two cities of earthly life as we know it and two cities of eternal life beyond the earthly world. In effect he was describing a simple, classical caste system. In the wider mystical sense he painted a picture of the city which was the work of God which could not exist without God, and without which even God would have no meaning. In the earthly sense he promoted the belief that Rome held the promise and the role of the City of God.

In order to strengthen the position of the church in relation to the only state which he understood – the collapsing Roman Empire – he replaced Jerusalem as the Biblical City of God with Rome. He compounded the attitude which the politics of the early centuries of the Christian Era had introduced. Jerusalem fell in significance for Christians. Rome became a focal point in their thinking. God was supposed to have shifted his seat of government! Over the next few centuries Jerusalem would lose any great significance for Christians. Some church leaders deliberately played it down to highlight the difference between Judaism and Christianity. They presented it as simply a historical factor in the development of Christianity which, of course, had superseded Judaism! On one hand the 'City of God' was something imposed by God but on the other hand it was something which 'elected' man had to strive for, establish and then defend. It was an obligation on the members of the 'City of God' to defend it! ⁹² The concept of Rome as the eternal city would bug men for a thousand years and then divide them viciously.

Across all of this Augustine superimposed his ideas on predestination or 'election' and the most amazing interpretations of life and death, He wrote: "... as the law is not evil, though it increases the concupiscence of sinners, neither is death good, though it increases the reward of martyrs. The law, when defied through love of evil produces sinners; death when suffered through love of truth produces martyrs. Thus, the law is good because it is the prohibition of sin; death is evil because it is the penalty of sin. Wickedness makes a bad use not only of evil, but also of good. In the same way, holiness makes a good use not only of good, but also of evil. Thus, sinners make a bad use of the law, although the law is good, while saints make a good use of death, although death is an evil." ⁹³

He follows that a few chapters later with: "... all Christians who really hold the Catholic faith believe that it is not by a law of nature that man is subject to bodily death since God created for man an immortal nature but as a just punishment for sin." ⁹⁴

Those thoughts became the basis of some of the church's most oppressive and frightening practices, personal coercion and financial manipulation on an unbelievable scale, the accumulation of power and wealth on an immense scale by the church, and a fanciful view of the role of the clergy. They substituted fear and depression for the freedom and joy which are the mainspring of the Gospel message. Augustine's views of two cities both assumed and perpetuated division within the community and he compounded the divisive influence of the teachings of Athanasius. His influence carried through in some Reformation views that people are 'saved' by being lifted from one city to the other. His oppressive emphasis on sin and the fall of man after Adam also had confusing and conflicting effects. In a few strokes of the pen it: emphasized both his theoretical acceptance of the 'oneness' of mankind and the absurdity of racial antagonism; highlighted his inconsistent and, in practice, ludicrous and pathetic attitude towards people beyond the borders of the Roman Empire; and contributed to Christians being anchored to the Bible as the literal, fixed and final word of God. Coupled with his claim that Holy Scripture was a more reliable source of historical information than the ancient historians ⁹⁵ it also reinforced the tendency to rigid fundamentalist attitudes in the church and resistance to social change and scientific experimentation. That resistance was so strong that the credibility of the church took a beating when Darwin eventually came along with the theory of evolution and it aggravated the growth of anti-Christian 'isms'.

It is, unfortunately, an apt description of Augustine that he was the first 'theologian of history' and 'the father of all philosophies of history'. ⁹⁶ He encouraged the belief that it was the responsibility of emperors to Christianize so that the world would be a single community made in the image of the Heavenly City, or the City of God. He twisted the parable of the great supper from chapter 14 of Luke's Gospel, ("... go out into the highways and hedges, and compel them to come in that my house may be filled ...") to justify his campaigns against heretics. His attitude was soon written into a decree by Gratian that "heretics have to be forced to their own salvation even against their will," ⁹⁷ and that cry was to echo and re-echo around Europe during the many inquisitions.

Augustine gave the church the reasoning which it was able to exploit to advantage in its efforts to dominate the state, or the empire, and at the same time he gave the state the justification for military conquest. It had to Christianize and bring people within the City of God! The same reasoning was used quite blatantly against northern Europe under pre-Reformation Roman Catholicism. It fanned the Crusades when Islam challenged the church's Augustinian view of itself. It was used by the entire church in the sixteenth century and it was used again in the 'enlightened' colonial era of the nineteenth century in Africa and Asia.

Such was the legacy of Augustine, Bishop of Hippo. We shall come to his name repeatedly. Undoubtedly, when he chose to become an official of the Roman state religion he devoted himself to his task with the same vigour and in the same conscientious manner that he would have if he had chosen some alternative field of law or teaching after he opted out of his earlier state office. Being no different to anyone else, he was influenced by his environment and by those with whom he came in contact and he reacted to the circumstances in which he found himself. And again, being no different to anyone else, he and his actions became a factor or an influence in the lives of others. The extent of his influence was a consequence of his personality, his education and experience, his opportunities and the fact that the church wanted to hear and to act on the things that he said and wrote. His attitudes and his direction of the church in Numidia quite clearly contributed to its collapse as the Vandals moved across North Africa.

If Augustine had said that the way to establish the City of God was by standing aloof from the state, by applying pressure for structural change in the community and the economy of the day, by dismantling the cumbersome machinery of the church and by simplifying Christian worship his books would not have been taken up with such fervour. The churchman of his day and of the following centuries wanted to dominate the civil organization of the state and they wanted some links with the military forces such that their will could be imposed. They needed a justification for what they wanted to do and Augustine was well aware of it. What ever else he may have been, Augustine was certainly intelligent, with tremendous drive and ambition for personal power. Because of his experience in Milan as propagandist for the emperor, alongside Ambrose, he was confident that with his rhetorical skill he could gain a position of personal power within the church. Once he had resigned himself to the fact of life that Christianity was the state religion the rest was simply a matter of course.

However to lay the blame for all that has been done on the basis of Augustine's writings on him alone is not realistic. The people who made up the church's leadership at that time, or since, could have cried "enough?" They must all share the responsibility. And besides, the power struggles within the church of the period of the Roman collapse were fought out between some other equally determined men for whom personal power was at least as important as salvation for all mankind. As Ling notes, "the period of greatest intellectual influence of Augustinian theology, the theology of the omnipotent deity, coincided with the period of greatest political influence of the papacy ... and the decline of the one also accompanied the decline of the other. The church was the City of God, of God the omnipotent ruler; the church was also, in the period which began towards the end of Augustine's own lifetime, the undisputed successor to the Roman Empire and its earthly ruler was Caesar's heir during the centuries when there was virtually no single secular power strong enough to resist ecclesiastical control." It was not until a new intellectual force – Aristotelian thought preserved and transmitted by Islamic philosophers – entered the European arena that there were serious challenges to the supremacy of both papal theology and secular control.⁹⁸

THEOTOKOS? NESTORIUS OBJECTS

The dust of the battle for Numidia between Augustine's Catholics and Genseric's Arian Vandals was just beginning to fly when another major controversy rocked both the church and the battered machinery of state. It cut deeper ruts in the road to the future and the church has never got out of them. In fact the chariots of the church have cut deeper and deeper even into the closing decades of the 20th century. It hinged around Mary, the mother of Jesus. As already mentioned, eagerness to absorb people of pre-Christian beliefs smoothly into Christianity had led to syncretism on a large scale in the earlier centuries of the Christian era. In particular this involved questions of the Trinity and Mary who was gradually elevated to a supernatural status because of her mystical relationship to God in the virgin birth. She was seen by many as something more than a person privileged to be an agent of God's will even though Tertullian was among the prominent churchmen who believed that Mary led a normal married life with Joseph after Jesus' birth.⁹⁹ The contrary proposition, that Mary was not only virgin when Jesus was conceived but that she remained a perpetual virgin seems to have gained ground from about the middle of the fourth century CE. The related issues of Mary's virginity, the encouragement of vows of chastity among young women, the role of virgins in church ceremonial and the presumption that these issues were consistent with Jesus' teachings became something of an obsession, or at least a preoccupation, in many areas. If we look on the bright side, it encouraged the growth of teaching and nursing orders for women. However on the dark side it complicated Christian understanding of God and Jesus and it put yet another barrier in the way of salvation by colouring people's attitudes towards the role of women in the community and by helping to perpetuate their position as persons with restricted domestic and community roles.

Among the descriptions of Mary which came into use during those early centuries and the titles which were applied to her were “spiritual fleece of salvation” and “spotless mother of holiness”, (both used by Theodatus); “hope of Christians” and “mediatress between God and men”, (drawn from Greek legends); “the new Eve”, (Justin); the “cause of salvation”; “the pure womb which regenerates men unto God”; “Mother of Life”, (Gregory of Nyssa); “the type of the church”, (Ambrose); and “Theotokos” or “Mother of God”, (Athanasius).

Very few of the church’s thinkers showed much concern at the direction which Marian devotion was taking or even seemed to be aware of its implications until December 23rd 428, (about the time that Genseric and his Vandal force were crossing from Spain into North Africa). On that day Proclus preached a controversial sermon in honour of Mary in front of his patriarch, Nestorius, in the cathedral of Constantinople. He called Mary “the rational paradise of the second Adam” and emphasized the idea that she was the Theotokos, the god-bearer. Nestorius took him to task and contradicted him in front of the congregation in the cathedral. The row was on. Nestorius was accused of not only belittling Mary but of undermining the doctrine of the Trinity by disputing the two natures of Christ. Proclus and the Mariologists appealed to Rome for a decision in their favour. This was a strange development because devotion to Mary had been most pronounced in the east until then. Feasts to commemorate Mary as “Mother of God” and to stress her stainless virginity had already taken root there but not in the west where the issue had not received much attention.

As patriarch of Constantinople Nestorius was, historically, in a sound position to debate with his counterpart in Rome on an equal footing. When he had moved his capital from Rome to Constantinople over 100 years before, Constantine had, of course, moved both his seat of government and the seat of the church as the state religion. But the bishops of Rome had clung to their authority with tenacity. They had actually been able to increase their grip on the church because they didn’t have the emperor breathing down their necks.¹⁰⁰ In spite of the subsequent division of the empire into two distinct administrative units, with the civil authorities in the east becoming increasingly independent of Rome, the bishops of Rome were able to keep their grip tight. However it began to slip very badly from 395 when, on the advice of the Trinitarian churchman Synesius from Cyrenaica, Arcadius defaulted on military grants to the Arian Goths and as a consequence rapidly became a puppet of their leader Alaric. The Roman bishops could see the church splitting not just on geographic lines but on theological lines as well with a Trinitarian west based on Rome and an Arian east based on Constantinople. From that stage the Roman bishops began to lean heavily on the historical association between Peter and Paul and the development of the church in Rome to justify their supremacy and authority. But then surprise, surprise after the fall of Rome to those very same Arian Goths in 410 they introduced a new twist! Faced with the real possibility of Arian theology being imposed in place of their Trinitarian orthodoxy they called on scripture. They quoted Matthew 16:18, “...Thou art Peter, and upon this rock I will build my church...”

LET'S SUPPRESS A CHALLENGE

Against that background the pope could see that it could be disastrous, at least from his point of view, if Nestorius in Constantinople were to win this round. He turned to Augustine for some ammunition to fire at Nestorius. Augustine's teaching on sin and the fall of man had fueled the view that in God's plan Mary was to undo the damage that the once-virgin Eve had done. His reasoning went that she was no mere physical tool in the great work of salvation. Through her obedient acceptance of God's will she became a counterfoil to Eve. The final disobedience which sealed man's fate was Adam's but Eve had a secondary role. (Not even equality for women in that sense!) His reasoning continued that Mary also had a secondary role in redemption. She was, he said, to prepare the way for salvation and life in the same way that Eve had prepared the way for condemnation and death.¹⁰¹ Augustine then took this a step further. In a fantastic exercise in semantics he described the church as "the bride of Christ" and "the mother of Christ" and the people of the church as "members of Christ." Not bad all in one breath, more or less. Giving free rein to his rhetoric he then asked "Whence ... is Mary the Mother of Christ, if not because she gave birth to the members of Christ?" He then related Mary to "Mother Church", saying "This mother is holy, honoured, similar to Mary, she brings forth, yet is a virgin. That she brings forth I prove through you: for you are born from her; she also brings forth Christ, for you are the members of Christ ... let the members of Christ give birth in mind, as Mary as a virgin gave birth to him in her womb; and thus you will be mothers of Christ."¹⁰²

The vital fact soon emerged. You can't debate the elevation of Mary to some supernatural position without either making certain assumptions about Jesus or debating the nature of Jesus as the Messiah. The emphasis in the debate swung back and forth from the nature of Mary to the nature of Jesus himself. This had been a matter of controversy between the schools of Alexandria and Antioch for some years. Put very simply the argument was whether Jesus was a human being under divine influence or whether he had two natures human and divine merged into one being like fire in a glowing coal.¹⁰³ It opened up many of the old sores of the Trinitarian disputes. It was in fact simply another aspect of that dispute.

Even though Nestorius himself did not dispute the divinity of Jesus the Messiah the new round of disputes led others to do so. It also led some to deny that he was human at all. The tyrannical patriarch Cyril of Alexandria, whose intrigue, barbarism and ambition seem to have been exceeded only by his hatred of Jews, had been eager to assert his superiority over the patriarch of Constantinople for some time. Shades of Rome! He saw an opportunity in the anti-Theotokos stand which Nestorius was taking. Skillfully mixing bribery, flattery and cunning manipulation he gained the pope's support. On the surface that would not appear to have been a very difficult task, but there could have been similar animosity between him and the pope. However he attacked Nestorius with a vengeance and undermined his position. Nestorius in turn gained the support of the eastern emperor, Theodosius II.

In 431, with both religious and political polarization deepening, Theodosius and Valentinian II in Rome summoned another council at Ephesus. They were back to the old bind. They hoped to achieve political stability through theological uniformity. In the event, Cyril's intrigue kept Nestorius and his supporters out and two counter-councils met a few days apart. It was like a re-run of some of the earlier councils which had been called to resolve disputes. Condemnation and counter-condemnation. Both Nestorius and Cyril were arrested but while Cyril was allowed to return to Alexandria, Nestorius was banished.^{104 105} The 'proper' council, under the sponsorship of the pope, condemned Nestorius and his teaching and approved and defined Theotokos as the title for Mary, mother of the second person of the Trinity or the Son-of-God-made-man. It also 'finalized' the controversy between Pelagius (who had died eleven years before) and Augustine (who had died under siege only a matter of months before) by finding in favour of Augustine and condemning Pelagianism. The question of Mary was therefore officially resolved but, like the controversy over the nature of Jesus, it refused to go away. However some of Nestorius' supporters did.

When Nestorius was banished his supporters saw the writing on the wall and fled to Persia where, under the protection of an agreement reached nine years earlier, they were allowed to practice and even teach their faith. While Rome could not tolerate any variation from orthodoxy and found it necessary for domestic reasons to try to prevent the intrusion of any religion from outside, Constantinople was finding it wise for 'foreign affairs reasons' to be a little more accommodating. Seven years earlier, in 422, it had reached an agreement with Persia that each would respect and permit the other's religions.¹⁰⁶ Within a short time the Nestorians established a number of Christian Churches and regained a degree of toleration along the fringe of the empire. Later they established two major schools of theology and a most impressive missionary program. In the same way that Christianity was first carried north beyond the Roman Empire by the Arians and not by the orthodox church, so the Nestorians first took it through Central Asia and deep into China, Tibet and Turkestan.

That is a matter for a later chapter, but it is important to note now that the establishment of the Nestorian Church was one of the few successful efforts to break with orthodox Roman theology before the final collapse of the Roman Empire. It was to be the first separated or 'reformed' church founded from the Roman church which would continue as a real force to the present day. The very early Ethiopian Church was also established beyond the borders of the empire, and free of any influence from it because of the local circumstances at the time, but it was not a reformed church. Both the Nestorian Church and the Arian movement before it had to move beyond the empire to survive and in doing so they became genuinely evangelical movements. After the Council of Nicaea the continuing influence of the Arian movement came from the Arian Christian churches which were established beyond the empire, mainly in southern and central Europe, and from the assumed threat to the authority and power of the parent church in the event of an occupation of Rome by a people which had accepted Arian theology. The threat was essentially to the positions of a few people and not to the welfare of the people generally.

The Arian churches had been established in what was nearly a religious vacuum. They did not step into an existing church/state framework such as in pre-Christian Rome. They had a simple, uncluttered theology and system of worship, and without the orthodox church's flamboyant view of its relationship with God, which could only be justified within the framework of the Trinitarian interpretation which it clung to. The Arians had no place for a state church. It is interesting to wonder what would have happened if Arian victors had tried to introduce Arian theology over the framework of the Roman state church. It would have been a case of square holes and round pegs. As events progressed the Arian churches were ill-equipped to compete and they failed to survive the trauma of the following centuries as the church of Rome rampaged across Europe. During the middle ages all that was left of Arius' influence was the occasional library book and the records of his heresy in the archives of those who had condemned him. There was no serious attempt to reappraise his theology until the 16th century when a number of Polish and British theologians took up the Unitarian issue. In due course, in the 18th century, an Arian school of thought developed in the USA, in the New England area, and gradually this crystallized into the present system of Unitarian congregations and conferences. ^{107 108}

But back to the question of Mary. The orthodox reasoning went that if Mary was not Theotokos, if she had not given birth to God-made-man, then Christ was not really God. On that basis the use of the title Theotokos was said to safeguard the true divinity and unity of Christ's person. It is therefore little wonder that the Nestorian controversy did nothing to offset the growing practices of adoration or worship of Mary. In fact the publicity given to the decision of the council greatly encouraged such practices. In some places the ritual of prayer to Mary as an intermediary between man and God became a substitute for prayer to God and even took precedence over it. The prayer "Mother of God hear my supplications: suffer us not to be in adversity, but deliver us from danger. Thou alone ..." is thought to date from some time between 290 and 350, but with the stimulus of the new controversy it now came into common use. ¹⁰⁹

FEASTS, SAINTS AND SUPERSTITION

The slightest pretext was enough to justify a new feast or a new practice and some sermon or other by one of the early fathers could always be found to explain it, so it is no wonder that the council's decision was followed immediately by the wide spread celebration of the feast for the Annunciation of Mary which became an annual event. Shrines in honour of Mary and sanctuaries where her aid could be enlisted began to appear throughout the east. In turn these things, coupled as they were with the teachings and superstitions of the day, encouraged the belief that intercession through other saints was both valid and more effective than prayer direct to God. Saints were discovered under every second gravestone. What else was to be expected? In the time of Nestorius it was accepted as within the religious competence of a bishop to declare any deceased person a saint and worthy of public veneration. After all, if, as Augustine said, a bishop was responsible to God for the sins of every member of his flock and was on the intimate terms with God that such ideas imply, was there any reason to doubt his pronouncement on a person's saintliness?

Eventually, after many centuries, the church established formal procedures for canonization of saints but it remained essentially a local function until 1171 when Pope Alexander III 'reserved' the process for the Holy See. Only in 1588 – well into the counter-reformation years a Sacred Congregation of Rites “for the principal purpose of handling causes for beatification and canonization” was set up.¹¹⁰ According to the current teaching of the Catholic Church every person in heaven is a saint, not only those whom it has canonized, but it then distinguishes between “ordinary saints” and “patron saints” who are venerated as special intercessors before God on behalf of particular communities, occupations, professions or in times of special needs.¹¹¹ It bounces from one dogma to another in order to justify these practices and claims that canonization is an infallible declaration that a person who died as a martyr and (or) who practised Christian virtue to an heroic degree is in heaven and is worthy of honor in liturgical worship throughout the universal church.¹¹² A person's reputation for holiness, writings and miracles ascribed to him or her intercession after death are considered in the investigations before Canonization, except in the case of a martyr for whom the church does not require miracles. The Pope may, according to the church's current procedures, dispense with some of the formalities in such cases.

Butler's unofficial Lives of the Saints (1956) is reported to contain 2,565 entries but, apparently, many more saints have simply faded out of recorded or living memory and today the Church of Rome officially recognizes a limited list of saints. It appears to recognize those who have been passed down by tradition plus those added after nomination and investigation by the Congregation for the Causes of Saints (the body which succeeded the Congregation of Rites) according to procedures which have been revised at least three times this century. The most recent revision was carried out by the reigning pontiff, Pope John Paul II, in 1983.¹¹³ Even so, the 1990 Catholic Almanac gives brief biographical notes for 272 saints; 223 occupations or professions are listed as having recognized patron saints; 70 countries or places are similarly listed; the Roman Calendar for 1990 lists feast days for well over 200 saints, and there has been a sharp rise in the number of canonizations in recent years. In the period of 85 years from 1878–1963, roughly corresponding to the period between the first and second Vatican Councils, 102 persons were canonized as saints under the authority of six popes at an annual rate of little more than one each year. In contrast, during the 26 years from 1963 to 1989 a total of 339 persons were canonized under the authority of only two popes – at the rate of 13 persons per year. This matter will be considered again when we reach the post World War II period.

A disturbing proportion of the saints honoured with feast days are from the ghastly period within a hundred years before and after the Council of Ephesus. That period was also marked by other upheavals which we have not yet looked at and Augustine's teaching contributed to some of them as well. His ideas on predestination and two tiers of 'elect' and 'false' or 'half saved' Christians encouraged a rash of benefactions from the wealthy who wanted to jump from the outer tier to the inner. The accumulation of this wealth on top of the state's contributions to the operation of the church led to a rash of monasteries being set up right across southern Europe. The life of a monk was very bearable indeed! Valentinian had already found it necessary to protect wealthy widows, spinsters and virgins who sacrificed pleasure and luxury for the praise of chastity from the over-zealous attentions of monks and clergy by banning the church from accepting benefactions from them. They had become prey to licentious clerics of real or apparent sanctity who had hastened to join the church to enjoy the monastic profession and who were chosen to direct the conscience and amuse the tenderness of heart of these virtuous virgins and widows. ¹¹⁴

In turn, those who entered the monasteries found it wise to pay close attention to whatever the powerful Augustine wrote. When one of them unearthed a copy of a letter written by Augustine in the heat of the Pelagian controversy, when any bishop suspected of Pelagian views was liable to be deposed and exiled by imperial decree, it led to a revolt of the monasteries. The reasoning of the monks went that if the destinies and personal actions of every person were predestined by God, and if those destinies were an expression of God's wisdom, and if God only prepared a few numbered people to join the 'elect' and if even the first stirrings of a person's will were controlled by God then no one had the right to rebuke them. Not even the abbot. He should content himself with praying to God for their amendment. ¹¹⁵

The revolt against discipline was soon widespread and disruptive. It followed an earlier revolt by monks in Africa against their being expected to do any menial tasks which had been based on a similar line of reasoning. Total obedience to either man or God lost any point if men were to believe that they had never been free to give up their freedom or their wealth for that matter. The lack of freedom to make a choice or a decision of any sort which Augustine's views implied was especially crushing to noblemen and landed gentry in Gaul who had entered monasteries as suppliant sinners after they had lost everything when their territories were overrun by the Arian Goths and Vandals who did not accept such views anyway.

Followed to a logical conclusion such views also make a mockery of criminal law codes and systems of justice and retribution imposed by the indignant victims of other people's decisions to commit a felony. It doesn't matter whether such systems of law are administered by a civil authority on behalf of some political machine of state, or whether they are administered by the church. Or could it be that the need for a system of law and justice makes a mockery of such views? About the time of the council of Ephesus, morale within the church was very near rock bottom and there was bitter antagonism towards it from both civil administrators and non-Christians. It was under strong attack from those who still said that it was a major factor in the breaking up of the empire, But its ruthless, ambitious leaders could see that a power vacuum was forming. They wanted to fill it. Instead of diving for cover, or at least keeping a low profile, they met the attacks front-on. In trench warfare terminology they stuck their heads up and fired back. They wanted a scapegoat towards which they could deflect the blame and the attacks, and they wanted no competition at all. Who better to use as a scapegoat than the Jews?

The church put pressure on emperor Theodosius II in Constantinople and in 438 he responded by issuing an edict in which he condemned Judaism and declared Jews to be a people apart. He used an expression remarkably similar to that which Jews themselves had used to describe their situation 501 years before, in 63 BCE, when they first became subject to a Roman emperor.

Cyril of Alexandria, not content with destroying Nestorius, vented his wrath against anyone who did not accept the church's teachings – and Jews in particular. Taking full advantage of the imperial edict and a civil riot in which both Jews and Christians were engaged, he appeared at the head of an armed force, expelled the Jews from the city and watched calmly while their houses were sacked. When the city prefect, Orestes, tried to intervene Cyril brought in 500 monks, sword in hand, to set the matter right. They surrounded the prefect, abused him as a heathen and idolater, and left him badly wounded by one of the villainous monks. The prefect was rescued by members of the public who then murdered the monk. Summary justice, perhaps. Or was it his predestined fate, Augustine style? Cyril's response was to preach a sermon in honour of the dead scoundrel, name him Thaumasius the Wonderful and give him the honours of a martyr. Cyril was subsequently canonized, proclaimed a doctor of the church in 1882 and honoured with a feast day on June 27.¹¹⁶

AN EMPIRE GONE

While the church was carrying on in this manner and weak emperors clung to the last vestiges of power in the western empire, Attila was strengthening the empire of the Huns to the north. From 433 he extracted additional land and enormous subsidies from the eastern empire. Shades of the Goth Alaric and Arcadius only 40 years before. When he took control of Germany and thrashed the Burgundians in 436 their survivors suffered the fate of homeless refugees until they were able to settle around Geneva in 443 under an arrangement with the Romans.

Probably soon after the capture of Carthage, Attila formed some sort of alliance with Genseric in Numidia who, having gained absolute control of the former 'granary of the empire', faced a joint threat from the western and eastern emperors who thought to make a desperate bid to recover it. It was probably this alliance which prompted Attila's next move which was to declare open war against the remnant western empire. However instead of marching straight for Rome he marched on France in 451 where the Goths and a mixture of allies had gained so much independence that they were regarded as a part of the Roman Empire in not much more than name only. In view of that it is interesting that large Roman forces joined with the Goths, Franks and Burgundians who made up the bulk of the army, for the bitter defensive battles that were mounted. The emperor didn't seem to mind his army fighting alongside Arian heretics instead of suppressing and slaughtering them, even if the church had to do a volte-face to justify it! It had done so before, when Arian mercenaries had helped defend the imperial presence and the Trinitarian line in Augustine's Numidia, and we must not forget the role of an Arian Goth named Stilicho, so why should it not do so again? In the decisive battle at Troyes over 150,000 men were killed on both sides.¹¹⁷ Attila, then aged 45, was checked in his tracks for the first time since becoming king of the nomadic Mongolian Huns at the age of 28. He fell back with his army to Hungary to lick his wounds and plan for another day.

While the sabres were rattling in France the state church was again meeting in council, this time in Chalcedon, to try to resolve the divisive controversy over the nature of Jesus which still refused to go away. During the twenty years since the council of Ephesus (when Nestorius had been banished) the Monophysite view had gained ground steadily, especially in the east. In a sense this was the exact opposite of the Arian view. The Arian view denied that Jesus was divine and maintained that he was human. The Monophysite view on the other hand denied that Jesus had a human nature at all. A 'Robber Synod', not recognized by Rome, had declared in favour of the Monophysite view two years before and Rome was intent on setting the record straight according to its own view that Christ had two natures, divine and human, coexisting as one. It did. The council of Chalcedon condemned both Monophysitism and the 'Robber Synod'. But the idea still didn't die and eventually it triggered a big split which is still evident today. A number of churches in countries from Armenia to Ethiopia still adhere to the Monophysite view and are not in full communion with Rome.^{118 119}

The church had failed to learn from Nicaea or Ephesus or any of the other controversies that crises of religious belief and faith are not eliminated or finalized by dogmatically finding in favour of one idea and condemning anything contrary to it. A few months later, in 452, sabres were rattling yet again. This time it was because Attila had turned his attention to Italy and Rome, and Emperor Valentinian III was powerless to stop him. Attila destroyed several major cities, looted Milan and prepared to capture Rome but stopped short. Pope Leo I is given the credit for persuading him not to attack Rome. In fact he bought him off, but his prestige and the authority of the Church in a civil and political sense increased strongly. Attila died within a year, on the night that he married again, and his sons were unable to hold the empire of the Huns together. In 454 the Germans revolted and crushed their overlords who then began to make their way piecemeal back towards Asia, leaving behind a series of tribal kingdoms.

Events moved on apace. For a short time Rome was in a power vacuum. Genseric and his Vandals took full advantage of it and having gained naval control of the central Mediterranean, made short work of sacking the city in 455. Emperor Valentinian was killed in the battle and there was no trade off with Leo in lieu of the spoils of victory for them, except that they agreed not to burn the city – if we accept the suggestions of church historians that it had been their intention to do so. Again Leo's standing rose and although the next 21 years saw a succession of puppet emperors supported by Constantinople and either accepted or deposed by the various invaders, the structure of the church and the autonomy of the pope were not interfered with very greatly.

In 476 the Teutonic Arian Odoacer put an end to the farce. He told Constantinople that he no longer recognized a Western Roman Emperor but that he would, as king of Italy, recognize the suzerainty of the Eastern Empire as long as no attempt was made to enforce it! Officially Constantinople became the capital of a unified Roman Empire, but Dalmatia, being all that was really left of the western empire, was tacked onto its domain so that in fact it became the capital of a Romanized Byzantine Empire. There was no Roman Empire. In place of the imperial power which, 539 years before, had annexed an insignificant piece of territory with a troublesome population of religious fanatics there were three power regions. One was the new Byzantine empire in the eastern Mediterranean region, including part of North Africa, with its capital at Constantinople. The second was a series of warring, fluid kingdoms in central and western Europe. The third was the balance of North Africa with separate Vandal and Berber kingdoms.

The one thing which they all had in common was that they had each come under the influence of a new religious movement which had arisen within a small nation of religious fanatics which had been conquered by the mighty Roman Empire as it reached its greatest extent. According to its view of itself the new religious movement had an awesome responsibility. By virtue of the new situation it certainly had an unprecedented opportunity. But could it match the opportunity to the responsibility?

CHAPTER 5

THE LOST OPPORTUNITY: FROM ROME TO MEDINA

The church had an awesome responsibility. The Roman Empire was no more. However the growth of an empire indicates that a power has adopted a policy of expansionism to gain economic benefit through the long term domination of other people. That domination, while it continues, ensures that the imperial power benefits from both the personal effort and the natural resources of its subjects. But even if that domination also provides benefits for the subject people through the development of trade, transport and government it always carries with it the seeds of its own undoing and the demise of the empire. Even if the subject people are not prompted into revolt by some totally unacceptable factor such as religious or racial intolerance or economic or political oppression there are always competitors beyond the empire who are prompted by either need, greed or jealousy into an attempt on the empire – and disenchanted citizens. It may start as a piecemeal nibble at the fringes of the empire; it may start with a carefully planned frontal assault, or it may be triggered by internal dissent which causes social and economic disruption and fragmentation. Only one thing is certain: whatever the mechanism, the end is inevitable. The Roman Empire had therefore gone the inevitable way of empires before and after it but, because ‘empire’ also implies substantial military strength, its sudden demise had left a great power vacuum.

Up to 1945 the deployment of forces was always necessary to impose and maintain the interests of empire but developments during and since World War II have brought major changes. It may not be necessary for an imperial power to deploy military forces or to occupy the territory in which it is interested all the time, but the forces (either in manpower or non-manpower resources) must be available for deployment to “protect” or enforce its interests and to ensure the expansion. Whatever the perceived need or the justification for the forces is, it imposes a burden either financial or social which eventually becomes unacceptable. Pieces of the empire are progressively ‘liberated’ either by conquest by other powers, revolt, political negotiation, default, lack of interest from the imperial power or a combination of many of these.

This pattern of rise and fall of imperial powers began when humans began to settle. As humanity evolved from elementary beginnings, possibly in Ethiopia three or four million years ago, people developed simple systems of community and social organization. ¹ Gradually people changed from a pattern of nomadic existence, heavily dependent on herded grazing animals, to settled agriculture with cultivation, organized water supplies and permanent buildings. It is not a matter of 'civilization'. It is a matter of urbanization. A nomadic people can be, and often are, highly civilized. An urbanized people can be, and often are, selfish, irresponsible and exploitative. In short they are often less civilized.

But of course it is very difficult to sustain an empire on a nomadic basis and without permanent buildings, so there have been few of them. Perhaps the best known, partly because it is the most recent, was that of the Huns whose activities in Europe helped to bring down the Roman Empire. As empires go, it was very short lived. It was only a little over 80 years from the time that the Huns entered Europe from Asia to their overthrow and withdrawal. What ever the immediate causes may have been, the decline of the Roman Empire was just as inevitable as the decline of the famous Babylonian Empire, or the empire of the Huns, the British Empire or the imperial positions of Soviet Russia and the United States of America. The speed and manner of imperial decline will always vary, because it is decided by human relationships. It is only the fact of decline which is inevitable.

We should certainly not be at all surprised at the breakup of the Roman Empire. In Rome's immoderate greatness prosperity generated decay and the causes of destruction multiplied with the extent of conquest. As soon as time, circumstances and man had combined to remove its artificial supports the stupendous fabric ripped apart under the tensions of its own making, just as it did with the Soviet Union.

Oppression by victorious legions which acquired the vices of strangers and mercenaries, corruption, the weakening of military government and the deluge of nomadic barbarians all contributed. ² The division of the empire must have had some effect but it is likely that as a factor on its own the establishment of Constantinople as capital contributed more to the strengthening of the east than to the loss of the west.³ It had, after all, been established in a concerted bid to strengthen the whole empire.

The abuse of Christianity also had a big bearing on the rate of decline of the empire. It was certainly not the Gospel of Jesus Christ. Among the things we can recognize, the effects of misinterpretation and corruption of the Gospel are prominent, of course, but not the Gospel itself. There is the way in which public and private wealth was consecrated to the false demands of charity and devotion. Then there is also the way in which funds which could have gone to the army for defence were lavished on the useless multitudes of both sexes who could only plead the merits of abstinence and chastity in the monastic system. However, among the most important factors was a complete misunderstanding of both the role of the church and the church's relationship to God. This led to the massive misuse of its powers as the state religion as it tried to enforce conversion and theological conformity.

The bloody, exhausting and distracting political intrigue, corruption and oppression which resulted from Rome's efforts to develop and impose a system of doctrine and the resultant faction fighting diverted the attention of the emperors away from matters of government, foreign relations and defence. Councils came before Camps. Persecuted sects became subversive elements within the empire.⁴ It was not to be the only time.

Such was the overall influence of the new religious movement which was based on the teachings and instructions of a man called Jesus to his followers. They were simple enough instructions. Go out to the whole world and proclaim the Good News of the universal love and lordship of God and the message of Salvation for all mankind.⁵ There, indeed, was the church's awesome responsibility. The Catholic Church at Rome, the major organized portion of the movement, had an immense network of about 1,800 churches spread across the old empire. It had scores of monasteries and an inestimable total number of clergy, monks and nuns. The basic network, excluding much of the monastic system, had been established at state expense over a period of 150 years. It was very firmly established and the bishops had quasi-judicial and civil powers under the defunct but still highly regarded imperial constitution.

Although the church's direct links with the political and military authorities had been broken throughout the former western empire these links still existed in the eastern or Byzantine empire and its pyramid-style organization based on the geography of the former joint empire was still functioning. It had run in parallel with the failing imperial administration. Its very confident administration now provided a framework on which the feudal administration of the various tribal fragments of the empire could be hung or, perhaps, to which they could cling. It had been dependent to a very large extent on the use of imperial decrees to enforce its wishes but it had also used fear and coercion very effectively in its religious rites. Because of these things it had not only become a religious institution along the lines of any other priestly religion but it had developed a firm grip on the minds of the people as well. Furthermore, it was still associated with the glory, power and reputation of old Rome even though political leadership had fled from there a couple of generations before. In fact it had no option. It had to perpetuate the myth of Rome's omnipotence because it had put a great deal of effort into justifying Rome's claims on both historical and Biblical grounds. To back out at this stage would expose several generations of manipulation for what it was and it would undermine the credibility of the church in all respects.

A MATTER OF PRIORITIES

What, then, was the great opportunity which the collapse of the Roman Empire thrust at the church? As its ruthless and ambitious leaders saw it, it was to take the place of the former imperial power in the great administrative and political vacuum. They only had to link into each of the tribal kingdoms and hold onto their links with the Byzantine Empire to be able to impose their will through the concepts discussed in Augustine's "City of God." The former Roman Empire was, as they saw it, all that mattered. They neither understood nor cared about the people in the continents which fanned out from their Mediterranean base. Of course they had never heard about the Americas or Australia, Japan and the countries of the Indian and Pacific Oceans, the land masses and people totally separated from the land mass and people of Europe by those daunting expanses of water. But there was the great bulk of Europe, untouched except by the so-called heretical Arians. There was the entire area of Asia stretching from Arabia to India, China and Russia untouched except by the Monophysites and an early sortie or two by the Nestorians into the Arabian Peninsula and Mesopotamia. And there was also the continent of Africa, untouched except for the northern fringe, more than half of which was now in the hands of either the Arians or the independent Ethiopian Church.

In fact the attitudes of the Roman church's self-indoctrinated leaders meant that they did not just ignore those areas but they positively rejected them as not subject to or entitled to the Good News. They did not warrant recognition in either of Augustine's two tiers of 'elect' and 'half-saved' Christians! That left the church free, in its view anyway, to concentrate on the institutional Christianization of the collapsing Roman Empire along similar lines to those which it had been pressing relentlessly for 150 years, but with greater control over the lives and actions of the people and with greater authority in its own right.

But the church was mistaken. That was not the real opportunity. Its leaders just could not see the real opportunity for their self made blinkers. Now that they were no longer the state religion of the Western Empire they had the opportunity to free themselves of any obligations to the state. They had the opportunity to 'think world' in place of 'empire' and to mix freely among all the mass movements of people backwards and forwards across Europe and to Asia and to carry the Good News where ever those movements took them. That opportunity didn't require a static institution. It didn't require massive funds, although of course the church had already accumulated them, mainly at state expense or by extortion. It only needed a relatively small number of inspired people who were not looking for the security of professional or public service type positions and who were prepared to face the unknown and probably a bit of hardship as they carried the Good News with them. It required social action or community activity. Not political administration. Not empire building. It also required an effort to understand other people either in their own land or on the move.

It is too easy to think that the mass tribal movements which had been taking place across Europe for 1,500 years suddenly stopped when Rome fell. They didn't. They continued for another thousand years. Commentators often talk about the mass movements of people and conquests and counter conquests across the cradle of western civilization in Mesopotamia and the Middle East while omitting to note that most of those movements didn't stop there and similar movements took place right across Europe and Asia. Indeed the pressure of the Huns and the Outer Mongols against the city states civilization of China in the centuries before Christ was intense. That civilization was itself already a product of interchange and the mingling between Mongolian influences of the north and various influences from the south. At that time it was, apparently, more humane and with a higher level of culture than its counterparts in Mesopotamia and Europe, even though it was essentially feudal and experienced centuries of perpetual warfare.⁶

While Rome and Carthage were caught up in the first and second Punic Wars Ch'in Shih Huang Ti was busy reunifying China under a central government and destroying the basis of feudal power. He codified the nation's laws, standardized weights and measures and standardized the system of writing Chinese language so that it could be read throughout the nation. He set up a road network radiating from his capital, a system of canals for trade and communications and massive land reclamation and irrigation schemes. He also built the Great Wall of China to buffer the nation against the aggression of the Huns who could not adjust to the unity and culture of China. ⁷ In doing that he effectively deflected the attacks of the Huns away from China and west towards southern Russia, Europe, Rome...and the church! Unfortunately to achieve all that in one lifetime he also resorted to ruthless tactics.

While Rome was setting up its first gladiator schools or farms to appease the population and to strengthen the grip of the ruling elite, Huang Ti was vigorously suppressing the teachings of the Confucian monks in order to break the grip of the elite. Confucianism had come to be a conservative bulwark which the feudal overlords used as a shield against social change. Huang Ti beheaded or buried alive some 460 Confucian teachers who would not renounce their teaching. It appears that after his death the teachings of the great idealist had gradually become corrupted and institutionalized until the Duke of Lu ordered sacrifices to Confucius and examinations in his teachings as a condition for entry into the public service. Shades of Rome and Christianity. Confucius (the name coined by the Jesuits for K'ung Fu-tzu) had actually denounced the greed of the aristocracy and taught a system of ethics which were aimed at reforming Chinese society and at introducing a new world of justice and peace through honesty and hard work. ⁸ Siddhartha Gautama (Buddha) was preaching his noble truths in an effort to offset human suffering and misery in India at the same time. ⁹

Born in other parts of Asia within a generation or so of the fall of Jerusalem in 587 BCE, Confucius and Buddha were both young men while Ezekiel was still prophesying to the Jews. Ezekiel had preached first to the Jews in Palestine about the impending fall of Jerusalem as Yahweh's punishment for their misconduct. Later he preached in an effort to bolster the spirits of the exiles in Babylon with plans for a new Temple and a new priesthood. ¹⁰ Of course Ezekiel was not on his own. He was a young contemporary of Jeremiah and built on the older man's message as well as being a part of the long established tradition of religious thought in Yahwism. However none of these three – Ezekiel, Confucius or Buddha – knew of the life or work of the other two because of the lack of effective communications between the great civilizations of the day. Of course there were many other inspired teachers straining to bring enlightenment and more civilized conduct to their particular communities, like the Hindu Sages in India and Zoroaster in Persia. But the coincidence of these three great Servants of God in their completely separate and isolated civilizations about seven hundred years after Moses received the Law on Mount Sinai illustrates again the need for man to know Yahweh and to live according to an agreed code of conduct towards each other. The need was growing, very rapidly, as empires and civilizations developed and men and women gave free rein to their greed and selfishness. Mankind was flexing his muscles, exercising his skills and shrinking the distance between he and his neighbours very rapidly. Distance was shrinking and men were coming into conflict at a far greater rate than Yahwism was carrying an understanding of God and the divine will outwards from Jerusalem.

After Huang Ti and his attack on Confucianism the reunification and development of China went on apace. Within a hundred years of his death and still one hundred years before Christ, China had penetrated the geographical barriers to the west. It ruled Tibet and Western Turkestan and traded by camel caravan with the Persian Empire. In contrast the defunct Roman Empire and the church neither knew or seemed to care about what was going on around it except to the extent that its neighbours may have been a threat to its authority.

LET'S GO OUR OWN WAY. THE ROME/BYZANTIUM SPLIT

Ever since Rome had occupied Judea – long before Constantine sensed the importance of the Christians as allies in his bid for power – successive emperors had struggled through a fog of intrigue and politicking to achieve political stability through religious conformity. It was that which had triggered the original confrontation between the Roman authorities and the Jewish people. Now, with the empire in tatters, the Catholic hierarchy in Rome found itself surrounded by a sea of Arian Christianity. The entire area of the former Western Empire, except the British Isles, was controlled by Arians. Even Italy.

Rome was no longer a proud bustling, commercial and government centre and the vibrant hub of an empire. The loss of both the Numidian corn trade and control of the sea left its commerce depressed. Over dependence on slavery had given it an unsolvable unemployment problem and a level of depression which had long ago led to lawlessness and gross immorality. These all contributed to depopulation. The government and civil service still sat at Ravenna, and several wars helped speed up the depopulation. A couple of partial sackings, domestic vandalism and the lack of will and resources to carry out maintenance or rebuilding left large sections of the city derelict. Why should the new rulers waste their resources to put it back in order for very little purpose? The church could have it! But the church was clearly and quite definitely isolated from the Catholic-controlled Byzantine Empire. Its state finances had dried up to a large extent and it was in total disarray. Was this a signal for the church to become more tolerant and more concerned with people than with power? Was it perhaps an opportunity to rethink the theology and the attitudes which had become so bitterly entrenched? It was certainly an opportunity. It was not taken as a signal. It was not acted upon. The hierarchy dug its toes in. It continued its bitter assault on anyone who rocked the theological boat and tightened the reins in the Eastern (Byzantine) Empire as firmly as it could.

Despite renewed repressive measures, the Monophysite rebellion continued to rumble. It had gathered strength in Syria, Palestine and Egypt and in 475 Basiliscus, regarded by the church as an imperial usurper, issued an edict of toleration in an effort to relieve the tension and to bring unity within the church. Rome reacted with bitter antagonism but the following year Emperor Zeno found it necessary to confirm that tolerance towards the Monophysites. He issued a ‘compromise formula’ which became known as the Henoticon. Even that incurred the wrath of Rome and Zeno was under pressure to toe the line even though this meant more tension and more defiance from the dissidents.

In 483 the Nestorians, on the other side of the theological fence, called quits and formally broke from the orthodox church to establish the Nestorian Church based on their school at Edessa. How dare they! Six years later Zeno was forced to close it. His action – or the pressure from the dominant wing of the church – simply and effectively fostered Christian missionary work. The Nestorians moved their base to Nisibin, the important trading city which sat on both the silk and spice routes to the east through Persia and Arabia, where the Persian king was very pleased to continue to give them protection. They also went south into what was almost an imperial no-man’s-land – the Arabian Peninsula.

In the meantime, in 484, Acacius, the Patriarch of Constantinople, showing more tolerance than Rome, assented to Zeno’s compromise formula in an effort to hold the Monophysites within the church. He was promptly excommunicated. But the Pope, Felix III, went even further and dissolved the ecclesiastical bond between Rome and the East because of ‘excessive Monophysite influence’. Clergy ordained by the patriarchs of the east were not recognized and an effort was made to place Roman ordained clergy to dislodge or compete with them, but to little avail. Rome’s influence in the Byzantine Empire fell. For quite some years the patriarchates of Alexandria, Jerusalem and Antioch were all held by Monophysites as well as Constantinople.

CLOVIS AND THE CATHOLICIZATION OF THE FRANKS

The schism dragged on. In 494 with the new emperor, Anastasius, pressing hard for compromise but generally supporting the Patriarch of Constantinople, the Pope, Gelasius I, wrote him a very curt letter declaring that the Pope had power and authority over the emperor in spiritual matters! ¹¹ It had become theologically fashionable to dissent from Rome in the east but it was fast becoming politically expedient to accept it in the west. In Italy, focal point of the old empire, the church of Rome had a firm grip on the majority of the population through its immense network of churches, clergy and monasteries, even in spite of the state of the church. It sought a working relationship with the new rulers but at the same time it took every opportunity to ensure that relations between those new Arian masters from Germany and the local population were strained or, at best, distant. In addition, almost all of the 125 episcopal towns established across Europe by the former empire under its state-church arrangements survived the conquest by Germanic tribes and remained focal points for commerce and government. This automatically placed the Catholic bishops in a strong position when, only partly as a means of appeasing the population, the new rulers took no action to expel or shackle them but accepted them either with genuine tolerance or, at least, in a passive sense. Furthermore, what ever the motives for such policies of toleration were, the proud, isolated stand of the German Arians showed through. Their refusal to either adopt or to actively support Catholicism did little to endear them to their new subjects. In fact it was a constant reminder of the narrow base and foreign nature of the Gothic and Frankish rule, and an impediment to the ambitions of the more powerful of the Germanic rulers which the Catholic church was adept and quick to exploit.

Theodoric was completely disenchanted with the Roman church's conduct, its attitude to his rule and its theology. He devised a plan to swamp it and to force reform by means of an alliance of all of the Arian tribes and the populations of the areas over which they had gained control.¹² Rome would again become the focal point of an empire: an Arian Germanic empire. But Theodoric was trumped by one of the classic examples of a change of faith for political opportunism. Clovis, the Frankish king of a small Belgium territory and one of Theodoric's competitors, accepted Catholic baptism, probably a couple of years before the turn of the century (although some commentators put it at the time of his coup in 507).¹³ This brought him the political support of the church and led to the almost automatic conversion of the entire Frankish population to Roman Catholicism. So much for their understanding of the finer points of theology. This meant an easy run for Clovis in his battle at Vouille against the Arian Visigoths in that fateful year 507 because he was able to pose as the liberator of the Roman provincials and their priests.¹⁴ Perhaps he was a student of Constantine. The Church of Rome not only felt very much less isolated, it was reprieved. Its political power recovered dramatically. One by one other tribal kingdoms went the same way. The Burgundians were suddenly inspired to adopt Catholicism in 516 and by 528 Catholic influenced rulers again controlled most of modern day France, Belgium and the Basque region of Spain.

As we have seen, the Byzantine emperor was in real trouble with his church during this period and relations with Rome were at a very low ebb. To placate the Roman Church, Emperor Anastasius found it wise to honor Clovis in some way so that he in turn would feel beholden to both the Byzantine Empire and the church. In 510 Anastasius awarded Clovis the rank of Roman Honorary Consul.¹⁵ It worked. Clovis felt obliged to protect the Catholic population and its bishops throughout the areas of Frankish influence. The population came to regard him as the legitimate governor of a province which they saw as part of a loosely-bound greater Roman Empire. However, although Clovis became the most powerful man in the west, Italy's Catholics were still ruled by his main rival – and brother-in-law – the Arian Ostrogothic king, Theodoric the Great.¹⁶ Theodoric had previously been encouraged to overthrow Odoacer by the eastern emperor and the church became a very effective fifth column in Theodoric's ranks. It steadily undermined his position, especially when Clovis started handing out court posts and land grants from the public purse to the clergy.¹⁷ To top it off the emperor prohibited Arianism throughout the empire in 523 and precipitated an open confrontation between Theodoric and the church in Rome.

Out of all of this classic politicking there was, quite naturally, a throwback towards the pagan attitudes of a god for a people or, almost, a god for each occasion. The ordinary Franks saw their new power and prestige as a flow-on from their new religion. They also saw themselves as special protégés of Christ, being granted victory and a dominant position since they changed faith. The Lex Salica, drafted towards the end of Clovis' reign in 511 to codify the old Salic-Frankish law, began with the words: "Long live Christ, who loves the Franks! May he guard their kingdom, fill their rulers with the light of his grace, protect their army, provide the supports of faith, and grant peace, joy and happiness, he, the Lord of Lords, Jesus Christ." ¹⁸ Shades of Valentinian III! In an edict 66 years before, (445), he had proclaimed: 'We are convinced that the only defence for us and for our Empire is in the favour of the God of Heaven: and in order to deserve this favour it is our first care to support the Christian faith and its venerable religion.' He went on to promote the supremacy of the bishop of Rome over all others. "Therefore, in as much as the preeminence of the Apostolic See is assured by the merit of St. Peter, the first of the bishops, by the leading position of the city of Rome and also by the authority of the holy synod, let not presumption strive to attempt anything contrary to the authority of that See ... if any bishop summoned before the pope of Rome shall neglect to attend, let him be compelled to appear by the governor of the province ..." ¹⁹

The church was very quick to support and promote such ideas as well as any others which developed around them which showed the church and its clergy as the sole purveyors of Christianity and totally responsible for bringing such favours to the Franks. The popes and Charlemagne later took full advantage of the idea that the Franks were the new imperial people chosen to represent and institute the rule of Christ in western society after the fall of old Rome. In spite of the opportunity and the challenge to break the chains binding it to Europe the church was sinking further into the mire of politics which would find people in later centuries saying "Europe is Christianity: Christianity is Europe: let the rest of the world keep its own religions." The rest of the world was to find out the hard way that it may indeed have been better off keeping its old religions rather than being swamped by what has gone hand in hand with institutional Christianity. But that was still in the future. Or was it?

There is no point in trying to follow in detail here the toing-and-froing and power play of Western Europe for the next couple of generations. It is sufficient to note that the power play led very quickly to a deplorable situation with morality and ethics across the ballooning Frankish Empire plummeting to rock bottom. The results of mass conversions for political or selfish motives have seldom been any different. The forms of the church and the motions of its worship services may have been present but an understanding of the Gospel and of humanity's relationship to God certainly were not. Moral degeneration set in across the Frankish Empire like a disease. The kings assumed the role of master of the church in much the same way that Constantine had presided over his young state church at the same time that he held onto the role of pontifex maximus. They put their families and their aristocratic buddies into all the powerful ecclesiastical positions and made all decisions. Clovis had, after all, made a political bargain. Why shouldn't his successors extract their price? More and more pagan practices were adopted as Christian practices and any religious observance at all became a mere formality. During successive generations the royal household and the church of the Franks became sicker and sicker, to the point where it was almost completely devoid of any moral worth. ²⁰ Rome's influence in the Frankish Empire weakened, but that didn't stop it from taking advantage of Frankish armies in the "Christianization" of other territories.

Right across Europe, but especially in the areas controlled by Clovis, the pattern of the times put a lot of strain on those men and women who, for what ever reason, adhered to the church. There was an upsurge in interest in monasteries. They sprung up everywhere. For some people the ascetic life of the Monasteries gave stimulus to faith and service in God's name. For many it offered peace, stability and security which were not available outside. Perhaps an escape. Perhaps a refuge. It also offered status. For a while there was a tendency for the ascetics to adopt the style of their eastern counterparts or to head for the caves but, quite quickly, people like Martin of Tours and Benedict put them on an organized basis with rules for conduct and lifestyles tuned to the European environment. Even Benedict began his religious career at about the age of 40 in 520 as a hermit in a cave near Subiaco. As followers gathered around him he organized them into monasteries of a dozen monks in each. When his following aroused the jealousy of a local priest he was forced to leave and in about 529 he set up a formal monastery at Monte Casino. A little later his sister set up a convent for women at Plombariola, not far away. The system which he organized provided a pattern for the establishment of many orders, including that named after him about 50 years later by a monk who founded the monastery of St. Andrew in Rome, became its abbot and was later elected pontiff as Pope Gregory.²¹

The development of the monastic system under the auspices of Rome was to have very mixed consequences over the next thousand years. But Benedict should not be blamed for the misuse of the system which he pioneered. In fact while he demanded firm discipline, more work than had been customary under earlier monastic models and a rigorous timetable in devotions to God he showed a level of tolerance towards those whose views differed from the establishment which was quite unusual at the time. He worked hard to reconcile the Arian Goths and the orthodox Catholics of Italy and for this reason he (and his successors) achieved considerable political influence as well.²² It has been said that the 'rule of Benedict' enabled monasticism to make a positive contribution to human progress and that it "might otherwise have wrought nothing but evil."²³

DEVELOPMENTS IN THE EAST

While the development of the monastic system was taking place in the west there were other critical developments taking place in the east. On the political front the Byzantine emperors and traders were beginning to flex their muscles and to see themselves – and certainly not the Franks – as the successors of the Roman Empire. They were, after all, steeped in the Hellenic tradition as well as the Roman tradition. Perhaps they yearned to take up history again where Alexander had left off. Greek was the language spoken most commonly throughout the region which now formed the empire and so it was made the official language again. The Byzantines eyed the trade routes supplying Europe with goods from the east with envy. There was the silk route from China across central Asia and Persia. There was the main spice route from India via the Persian Gulf, along the Tigris through Babylonia (Iraq), meeting the silk route at Nisibin east of Antioch. And there was the much less important spice and ivory route via the Red Sea, Nile Valley and Alexandria. Could the Red Sea route be encouraged at the expense of the other routes? It was worth a try.

The Byzantines began to meddle in the affairs of the Bedouins of Northern Arabia, Abyssinia (Ethiopia) and the Yemen in Southern Arabia. To do so they had to cooperate with heretics and non-Christians in several places. Southern Arabia, including the region of the Yemen, was still an important agricultural area at that time with large scale irrigation from the huge dam at Ma'rib. The dam had burst about 450 but the kingdom was strong enough to call on surrounding tribes to mend it without delay.²⁴ Mecca was a growing trading centre on the Red Sea linking India and Syria by a land route which the Byzantines were happy enough to encourage, to compliment the existing sea route, provided of course that the rulers were sympathetic to Byzantium rather than Persia.

On the religious front both the Monophysites and the Nestorians were expanding their missionary activities. The Monophysites had developed a strong base in Abyssinia, extended their influence strongly into the Yemen and cooperated with Byzantium in an exercise which forced the Himyarite king of Yemen, Dhu Nuwas, to flee inland about the turn of the century. He adopted Judaism which had achieved an impressive spread in the region during the two centuries which followed the repeated destruction of the temple in Jerusalem, strengthened his little kingdom's position by making a more formal alliance with Persia, and turned the tables on the Abyssinian Christians who suffered fierce persecution for a few years. The tables were turned again in 525 when the king was killed and the Yemen became an Abyssinian satrapy.²⁵

MONOPHYSITES, PARTNERS AND NON-BELIEVERS

The small state of Ghassan in Northern Arabia, a vassal of Persia to the east of Jerusalem in what is now the Kingdom of Jordan, had also adopted Monophysitism. In the meantime, about two or three generations before, the Nestorians had established a see at Hira, further east in the fringe territory between Arabia and Persia when they first came under pressure from Rome. They gradually pushed south and developed a solid base at Najran, in Southern Arabia. Quite apart from their less complicated theology which people found more readily understandable and acceptable, a major reason for the Nestorian Church being tolerated completely in Persia was its break with the orthodox church.²⁶ The Nestorian bishops were free from any direction from the Byzantine or Roman patriarchs. This removed any suspicion of political duplicity and any overtones of racial or national superiority or exclusiveness. It gave the church's message a more universal outlook. It was closer to the basics of the Gospel. However, when the Abyssinian Monophysites forced the Yemenite king to flee, the cult centre at Najran also suffered and declined for some time after he had regrouped and turned the persecution back against the Christians.

By this time the Acacian schism which had been triggered by Zeno's bid to raise the level of tolerance towards the Monophysites had weakened Rome's influence in the east for more than a generation. Faced with the continuing growth of anti-orthodox branches of Christianity – "heretical" according to Rome's pronouncements – and with problems with both the Franks and the Byzantine Emperor, the church of Rome finally conceded that it had to resolve the dispute. It was officially patched up in 519. On the surface at any rate, the Byzantine emperor accepted the pope in Rome as head of his church and all of the clergy were again in communion with Rome. But there were clear signs that other splits were likely and it was probably as a part of his constant manipulation to avoid these (as well as to maintain his own position) that he prohibited Arianism throughout the empire four years later, in 523.

Within the orthodox Christian community Mariology had been given more and more prominence in the east since the Council of Ephesus and by this time, in places, it almost completely replaced the orthodox Trinitarian worship based on recognition of the Father, Son and Holy Spirit. Preachers and writers began to talk of Mary's bodily assumption to heaven and to present the most plausible sounding human logic in support of it. It is intriguing that the world had to wait until 1950 for a pope to give this the staggering status of dogma, but it was already having immense impact. Legends about Mary, concocted from earlier Greek stories, also took on the status of factual history in the minds of a very gullible people. After all, who were they to believe if not their clergy? And besides, there was very little Arian influence left in the east at that time to help restrain the development of religious fantasy. Along came a Syrian poet named Jacob of Sarug to introduce yet another title for Mary. "Mother of Mercy." Another Syrian writer, Romanos, expounded the idea that Mary remained for ever a virgin, that she was not only Christ's mother but mother of all men, and that she prays to God for all men. Such themes caught the Eastern mind very quickly and encouraged not only the use of icons, paintings, statues and jewelry, with images of Mary but also the collection and adoration of relics supposed to be from her earthly life. These were considered to have all sorts of mystical powers and to protect believers from all kinds of misfortunes.

But what about the non-believers? What were they doing? While the Christians were fighting among themselves over points of theology and for political power, Jewish scholars at Sura and Pumbeditha in Persia had been quietly compiling a more comprehensive collection of sacred and historical writings. Their Babylonian Talmud was completed in the early years of the sixth century and provided an encyclopaedia-like handbook of Jewish religious law and observance. It helped to strengthen the religious self-understanding and resolve of the Jewish community generally, but its publication was not an unmitigated blessing and some divisions developed around the use of the Talmud in later years.²⁷ Their people had not been free of harassment, but there was not, generally, the intense persecution of earlier centuries. In 460 the Persian ruler had tried to forcibly convert all Jewish children in Isfahan to his emperor-worshipping version of Zoroastrianism, Mazdaism, but it was a relatively isolated occurrence. The main concentration of Jews under Persian rule was not around Isfahan but along the Tigris and Euphrates Rivers in Mesopotamia (or Babylonia) where there were an estimated 806,000 Jews by about 600 CE. With such a concentration of population developing it is not surprising that the Jews in Mesopotamia were looking for a bit of self government. However no government, or emperor, ever enjoys a secession move by a section of the population, especially on religious grounds, and when Mar Zutra set up an independent Jewish kingdom of Mahoza in the rich Tigris Valley in 513 the Persians were most displeased. In 520 they did battle with him, won, as was to be expected, and crucified him and his grandfather.²⁸

BYZANTIUM'S TWIN AMBITIONS

A number of Jewish communities had settled successfully and peaceably, as they usually did, in Southern Arabia during the previous few generations. Being in company with both Monophysite and Nestorian Christians as well as pagans, they were inevitably caught up in Byzantine political manipulation. When Justinian began his 38 year reign (527–565) two years after the death of the Himyarite king of Yemen, things really began to buzz. He set out to achieve the twin Byzantine ambitions of reconquering the west and eliminating all heresy – especially Arianism – both of which had gradually crystallized, in the shortest possible time.²⁹ No one would stand in his way! But of course people did. They included the Persians to his east and the Germanic tribes to his west, now in control of the whole of the western Mediterranean.

Justinian set as his first target the recapture of the west including Gaul, North Africa, Italy and Spain. Such a target required a defensive policy in the east and some sort of diversion or arrangement with Persia which would relieve the pressure from the east. He had to secure his flank. In 529 he marched on Ghassan, the Persian vassal state in Northern Arabia, to begin his campaign. Ghassan, the Monophysite stronghold, became a vassal of Byzantium instead of Persia, the phylarch, Harith ibn Jabala, received some new titles for his trouble and Monophysites throughout the east naturally gained a lot more support, prestige and influence.³⁰ Hira, the Nestorian stronghold, remained a faithful vassal of Persia. The church hierarchy at Rome was unable to do anything about either development. They didn't want to reopen the schism. Some sort of accommodation between Byzantium and Persia held for a couple of years but it was thrown out the window in 531 when Chosroes I assumed the Persian throne.

Of course Justinian's target also required the absolute cooperation and support of the church at Rome. But, as always, that cooperation and support had its price. After all it was only about 20 years since the church had forged its links with the Franks and, even if they were ethically reprehensible and as difficult to manage as a tail wagging the dog, it was an arrangement which had to be recognized! Within two years of the start of his reign Justinian closed the schools of the Greek philosophers in Athens which had been the last real source of opposition to the authority of the Christian church. They, too, fled to Persia.

Justinian captured Naples from the Ostrogoths and achieved both a foothold back on Italian soil and easy access to Rome just along the coast. By 532 he built the immense basilica of Sancta Sophia in Constantinople and, as a sponsor of the fine arts, he encouraged religious art in particular. This coupled with the wave of Mariology and iconography to produce a spate of major works depicting the Creator with the Virgin and Child which dominated many of the main churches including Sancta Sophia. Justinian's first major military victory came in 533 when the Vandal kingdom in Numidia collapsed with unexpected speed. The first major slice of the heretical Arian-controlled territory had now, in Rome's view, been "liberated" to enable it to return to the true faith. According to the church the conversion of the Franks, Burgundians and others had been either "reasoned", "inspired" or at least "voluntary"! But Justinian had to lend a blood soiled hand. In 534 he promulgated the Corpus Juris Civilis as a 'guide' to civil and ecclesiastical law. Arianism was banned, again. The screws were beginning to turn. Just on 100 years after the death of Augustine, the Arian Vandal victory and the end of the Roman oppression of the Donatists which Augustine had orchestrated, the Numidians were again to experience the heavy hand of the church. But Judaism was also banned. Three years earlier Jews had been banned from giving evidence against Christians. Now they could not legally worship according to their long established practices.

However victory in Numidia did not bring the major trade advantage which Justinian was looking for because the Vandals, with Carthage again the capital, had neither been able to maintain control of the inland farming areas or trade with the Roman Empire effectively and corn production had fallen away sharply. Throughout his long reign Justinian was no more successful. He was back to the old bind of having religious dissension to contend with as well as political antagonism.

Sicily was the next to fall, in 535, and then Justinian turned his attention to Italy. He was able to apply a pincer movement from Sicily and his mainland base at Naples, and the expected quick collapse took place, with the encouragement of Rome, naturally. However the Ostrogoths rallied, recovered a lot of ground, and were not finally defeated until 17 years later when a second army was despatched by the land route. Italy was wrecked and shockingly divided. Agricultural production dropped sharply as large areas were deserted in more senses than one. But none of this mattered because the Church of Rome was back in command of the pulpits and men's minds. Or did it?

Nine years after the total ban on Judaism and nine years before the final defeat of the Ostrogoths, in 542–43, the attention of the population was diverted for a time from the glories of empire rebuilding. Bubonic plague struck. It was very largely the consequence of the attitudes and policies which had been followed over a long period. Political power had been given priority over public health. Urbanization was both a requirement and a result of the political policies of the two components of the empire – the state and the church – and both were therefore partly responsible for the tragedy. Granted, there was little detailed knowledge of the mechanism of disease and of epidemics but even the rudiments of personal and public hygiene were bypassed or, at best, neglected.

The state shared responsibility because the public purse had been drained for military purposes and the development of the urban areas to make living conditions a little better had been neglected. Slums had spread like ulcers. The church shared responsibility because it had deliberately rejected the Jewish codes of conduct and hygiene which had formed part of the Jewish Law and therefore part of the Christian heritage from earliest times. The Jewish codes were portrayed as defunct religious rites in a conscious effort to dissociate Christianity from Judaism and to socially isolate Jews within the community. For this reason, once Jews had accepted the idea of their imposed social isolation and grouped together in sub-communities of their own they were never affected by sanitation-related plagues to the same extent as the rest of the community. This in turn became another point of friction between Christians and Jews, especially in later centuries when Jews were accused of actively spreading plagues in Christian areas. But in Justinian's Constantinople the Christian mind had not yet become quite so devious and although 10,000 people died in that city in one day alone (and it is said that one third of the total population died ³¹) no statistics have come down to us from that period to show a distinction between Christian and Jewish deaths. One consideration was that the laws and anti-Jewish guidelines of 534 had spurred a burst of Jewish migration out of the empire. From Constantinople Jews trickled northwest to the Crimea and from Italy they began to move north into Germany via the Rhone Valley and the three mountain passes of St. Gothard, the Brenner and Loebel pass.

Coinciding with the plague in Europe, Southern Arabia also had to cope with a calamity on a grand scale. The great Ma'rib dam on which the region depended for its social and economic cohesion, failed in 542 for the second time. Reconstruction had been achieved without undue difficulty after the first breach in 450 because there was strong regional leadership and cohesion. But by 542 that cohesion had been lost, probably because of the foreign incursions, politicking and religious interference of the previous few decades, and it required arduous negotiation by the local ruler with other feudal lords to ensure voluntary collaboration in the reconstruction of the dam. ³²

But the plague was a very temporary diversion for Byzantium. There was still a large part of the west to be regained and pressures building up in the east to be repulsed. Justinian bought an armistice with Persia in 549 by forfeiting any interest in Iberia and by paying a gold tribute. It is interesting that the philosophers who had fled to Persia 20 years before, when Justinian closed their schools, had not found the philosophical freedom which they had sought and the armistice included special provision for them to return to Byzantium.

Even further east, on the northern fringe of the unified and heavily defended Chinese Empire a revolt was brewing among the Turkish subjects of the Mongolian Empire. The revolt succeeded in 552 and the Turks first took charge of Mongolia and then pushed west to crush the major force of Huns whose empire in Europe had fallen 100 years before. They soon controlled a huge area stretching as far as the Caspian Sea. The people whom they defeated, the Jöuans, moved further west ahead of them, teamed up with the remnant of the White Huns, became known as the Avars, and accepted a deal with Justinian in 559. He paid them to suppress the other Hunnish and Slav tribes and to occupy their land in order to protect the northern flank of the Byzantine Empire. Within three years the Avars had control of almost all the territory from the Caspian to the Frankish border. ³³ Only the next year, 563, they took advantage of Justinian's decision to make a push by land against Italy and pushed further west themselves. They took part of Thuringia from Rome's other protectors, the Franks, and neither Rome nor Constantinople were in a position to dissuade them.

The arrival of the Avars illustrates the limited vision of the Roman church hierarchy at the time and its total failure to understand the opportunity that the collapse of the empire had provided. In spite of the facts that, firstly, the Avars had done a deal with Justinian and were therefore to be regarded as allies and, secondly, that they were a new people controlling territory where either no Christian group had previously been active or where the Arians had been successful, the church does not appear to have taken any real evangelical interest in them. It appears to have taken the view that the Avars were foreigners, not part of the Empire, and the church had Spain to worry about. It is as if the church was deliberately acting on those nationalistic declarations by Valentinian III and Clovis that Christ was strictly the God and Saviour of particular elements of its empire. The business of re-imposing its will on the people to whom the Gospel was already known, in a fashion, in the old Western Empire had become a total preoccupation with Rome to the point of distraction. This is strange indeed, considering that a civil war between the Arian Christian Visigothic tribes in Spain had made Justinian's evil task a lot easier. In 554, five years before his deal with the Avars, he and the Roman Church occupied the southern one third of the Iberian Peninsula. Neither Justinian nor the church had forgotten about their parent faith and life for the Jews in Spain who had not been bothered by the former Arian Christian masters, became distinctly uncomfortable. The ban on the practice of Judaism, as well as Arian Christianity, was extended to Spain by that victory, naturally!

In the east a general council of the church was held in Constantinople in 553 while the Turks, the newest of the Asian invaders, were beginning their push west to within a few days march of the capital. But the conference wasn't about how to evangelize this wave of Asiatic people either. The church was no more interested in them than it was in the Avars. The council was a complicated affair convened by Justinian in a bid to resolve another heresy hunt and it highlighted that fact that all was not well in the corridors of ecclesiastical power. Justinian and the pope, Vigilius, disagreed about decisions which had been taken two years earlier and about tactics to resolve the crisis. The emperor wanted steps taken to appease the Monophysites in the interests of imperial stability. The church had to tolerate the Monophysites for political advantage and because a number of them still held influential posts, but why should it have to tolerate any pseudo Nestorians when their colleagues had gone and set up a competing church in Persia? The pope refused to attend or to sanction the council but in his absence it condemned a series of ideas which had become known as semi-Nestorianism and which were being circulated by three different writers in what became known as the incident of "the three chapters." The following year, after a bit of man-handling and threats of deportation from Justinian, Vigilius reluctantly ratified the decisions taken and the council stands in the record books as a recognized ecumenical council. The council may have eased a few immediate political problems for Justinian but it did nothing for the church, except to deepen the divisions which already existed between east and west, and between the factions within the church.

According to church historians “the prestige of the papacy sank enormously, and all through the fault of an ultra-confident and theologically incompetent emperor and of a wavering pope who lacked the strength to perform his duty” (Baus).³⁴ In reality the incident confirmed that the emperor was boss, that he saw the church as an instrument of the state, and that the church’s theology and decision making were still riddled with inconsistency.

During the period of the ‘incident of the three chapters’ Abraha, the reputedly Christian general who succeeded the Jewish king of the Yemen in 525, tried to strengthen his position across Southern Arabia, and in the trading centre of Mecca in particular, by using the influence of the Abyssinian Monophysites. However the social and economic life of the Meccan region was very complex and apparently revolved around three levels or elements of traders, the most influential being the ‘Quraish of the inside’, followed by the ‘Quraish of the outside’, then the ‘proletariat of foreigners and Bedouin’ with the Arabs of the Quraish in the surrounding region.³⁵ The basic religious and community life of the few oasis-based towns was also very complex, involving tribal cults which were symbolized by a stone or some other object which was guarded by the Sheikhly house. In the case of Mecca these had been brought together to form the Ka’ba to ensure more community cohesion, but this had the effect of weakening the consensus-based sheikhly authority and introducing a kind of oligarchy of ruling families.³⁶ The presence of some Judaism, Persian religious influence and Christianity naturally tended to confuse the situation. In the circumstances Abraha’s bid to use the Abyssinian Monophysite Christians to gain control of the city was repulsed around 550 or 560 and served merely to strengthen the national pride of the Meccans.^{37 38}

AN EMPIRE RETREATS, BUT DOCTRINE DICTATES

When Justinian died in 565 at the end of his 38-year reign there was a big gap in Byzantine cum Roman leadership. There was also a lot of serious questioning about the expansionist policy which he had pursued. Had the ‘recovery’, or more correctly the re-subjugation, of areas previously dominated by Rome been justified? The great recovery in trade and the increase in cheap resource supplies which Justinian had expected had not materialized. His only unqualified economic success came from introducing silk worms by stealth in the late 540s and this certainly didn’t win him any diplomatic or political friends to the east.³⁹ He had previously failed in his attempt to divert the silk trade away from Persia by negotiating with the Turks of the Oxus for a new route north of the Caspian. He also failed to significantly increase the spice and metals trade through the Red Sea/Nile Valley route at the expense of the Persian Gulf route but, naturally, both of these exercises had further antagonized the Persians. Under Justinian the power and prestige of the empire had certainly grown but it was dependent on continuity of policy, leadership and military expenditure. The military effort required, the disaster of the plague, the divisive and exhausting civil process of enforcing reconversion from Arianism to Catholicism, and pressure from Persia, Avars, and then the Turks all played their part in undermining the morale of the 'home countries' and the ability of Justinian's successors to govern effectively.

The powers to the north and to the east quickly took advantage of the situation. The Avar Khan saw his chance to gain from a war between the Gepids and the Lombards, two independent kingdoms in Austria and Hungary. He took sides with the Lombards. The Gepids in Hungary were annihilated. The price for the Avar Khan's support for the Lombards was their territory. They kept their lives, their identity and basic independence but they were relieved of their country. They moved west and, again with the Avar Khan's support, they relieved the Byzantines of control of most of northern Italy by 568. They left Rome in control of the coastal strip which included Venice and Ravenna. Attempts by Rome to win revenge against the Avar Khan by seizing Belgrade proved counter productive. Although it took him until 581 to expel them, he then moved to invade the Balkans. The Byzantines, preoccupied with a war with Persia, had to buy him off.⁴⁰ While this was going on the Lombards were also able to gain territory in southern Italy. Between 572 and 582 they set up two large Duchies in the middle of Byzantine territory so that the country was in a more confused mess than ever.

For practical purposes Rome was again surrounded by an Arian population. The Lombards were the last of the major Arian Germanic tribes in central Europe with the Visigoths well isolated in Spain. Some churchmen saw this as another opportunity for theological discussion and, perhaps, either re-evaluation or compromise to bring accord within the church but others, including the man who became Pope Gregory "The Great" a few years later, saw it as a wonderful political opportunity to crush the life out of this anti-Christ heresy. "Divine intervention" enabled him to do it through petticoat politics. Queen Theodelinda, wife of the Lombard King, adopted Catholicism and, being under pressure from Gregory, applied pressure within the royal household so that it first became divided, with friction between the northern Lombards and the southern duchies, and then capitulated and adopted Catholicism.⁴¹

This was not the first time and neither was it to be the last time that sectarian or denominational division within Christian homes would have far-reaching consequences. We usually think of denominational division within families having little influence beyond the immediate home, but history reminds us that this is not the case even if we are not conscious of the problem in our own community. Justinian's wife, Queen Theodora I, who was crowned as co-regent empress in 527, was personally sympathetic to the Monophysite cause and has been credited with influencing Justinian towards conciliation with them, especially in the condemnation of the 'three chapters'.⁴²

Out west, in Spain, the Visigoths recovered from the sectarian civil war which had allowed Justinian to capture a third of it and by 575 his successors could only claim to be holding a small and decreasing strip along the southern coast. In 587 Recared, having succeeded his father as king the previous year, decided to adopt Catholicism in an effort to unify the country since the Catholic Church had by then become politically more powerful than the less highly organized Arians. That old axiom again: political stability comes through religious conformity!

43

In the other direction the Persians had sought to rebuild their influence in Arabia and to deny Byzantium the Red Sea trade route. Also, by 575 they had expelled the Byzantine-sponsored Abyssinian rule in the Yemen and reduced it to a Persian satrapy. At that point the Turks proved a distraction for both Persia and Byzantium. They succeeded in pushing further west the next year and occupied much of the Caucasus. However only a few years later it was their turn to be torn by domestic strife and in 582 the Western Turkish Khanate, being the main body of Turks, withdrew to east of the Aral Sea. They left only one Turkish tribe in the Caucasus. It set up the Khazar Khanate. In 582 it seemed to be of little consequence. But keep it in mind. It became a very important factor in long term world affairs as people chopped and changed their faiths and their relationships.

During this period there were also further important developments in Southern Arabia. In 570 the Ma'rib dam burst again, for the third time. Political disintegration as a result of the repeated invasions by the Byzantine and Persian empires as they sought to control the buffer region between them, with repeated changes in suzerainty and the allegiance of vassal states, meant that there was no will for the neighbouring communities to cooperate in its reconstruction. There can be no doubt that the long-running religious infighting and confusion contributed to the political disintegration. The catastrophe resulted in a great loss of fertile land and productivity and the social upheaval was made worse by Bedouin reoccupying large tracts of land. ⁴⁴In, or about, the same year the Byzantine-backed Abyssinians were pushed out of the Yemen by the Persians (in a sea-borne invasion) who then favoured a Nestorian Christian presence in place of the Monophysites. Not to be outdone, the Byzantines promptly tried to gain a foothold back in the region by bringing a pro-Byzantine regime to power in Mecca but the Meccans, while they are said to have been more friendly to the Byzantines than to the Persians, did not want this kind of subordination to one of the great powers. The would-be princeling fled. ⁴⁵

Then it was Persia's turn for civil war and King Chosroes II was toppled from his throne. However instead of going quietly into foreign exile and disappearing from history he fled to his arch enemy, Emperor Maurice in Constantinople, and bought his help for an attempt to regain the Persian throne. It was successful. In 591, after the Byzantine army had reinstated him, Chosroes II ceded Iberia (the territory in which Justinian had forfeited any interest in his bought peace only 42 years earlier) and most of Armenia to his benefactors. The vassal Monophysite Arab state of Ghassan also accepted direct Byzantine rule but it received subsidies for its trouble – for a few years, anyway – until Heraclius stopped them as an economy measure because of the cost of the Persian wars.

For Byzantium these territorial gains at Persia's expense made up in part for the mess in Italy. They also gave the church the opportunity to push its influence a little further east under the protection of Constantinople. It came into bitter conflict again with the Nestorians who were well established as an independent church. The Nestorians were the losers. However they soon made up for it when the state of Hira, the Nestorian Persian vassal, came directly under the control of Arabs from further south only a few years later, about 604. Quite undaunted by the change, they took advantage of their continuing good standing in the eyes of their new political masters and happily carried their message of the Gospel still further south with them.

The church in Rome was quite content to go on its priestly, ritualistic and self centred way. Pope Gregory had begun his 14-year reign in 590 just as the Bubonic plague which had swept through Constantinople a generation before was sweeping through Rome. Perhaps it was a coincidence or perhaps he was eager to deflect some of the blame for the plague onto the Jewish community, but he certainly hardened the church's attitude towards them. They were allowed to retain their existing synagogues and to worship according to their normal practices, (this means, of course, that Justinian's total ban on Jewish worship in 534 had been just as impossible to implement as every other ban which we have read about), positive persecution was discouraged and forced baptism was deprecated. However they were not permitted to build new synagogues nor embellish old ones, proselytism was sternly repressed, the imitation of Jewish rites in Christian worship was prohibited, they were not permitted to own Christian slaves under any circumstances, they were excluded from appointment to public offices and Jewish physicians were only permitted to attend Christian patients in restricted circumstances. Of course not all clergy took the pope's restrictions on their rights seriously (did he really expect them to?) and in some areas direct persecution and forced baptisms continued.⁴⁶

To Pope Gregory also goes the credit – or the awesome responsibility – for the development of doctrines defining purgatory and transubstantiation, for the enforcement of papal supremacy and clerical celibacy, for strengthening the pope's position in relation to the emperor, and for the increased use and adoration of images.^{47 48} People were expected to believe that irrespective of the teaching of Jesus there is a "state or condition in which those who have died in the state of grace, but with some attachment to sin, suffer for a time before they are admitted to the glory and happiness of heaven." They were told that "in this state [of purgatory] and period of passive suffering, they are purified of unrepented venial sins, satisfy the demands of divine justice for temporal punishment due to sins, and are thus converted to a state of worthiness of the beatific vision."⁴⁹

Pursuing a similar tack, Pope Gregory introduced special penitential practices to be observed on a day at the beginning of the church's period of Lent, which he called Ash Wednesday. People were ceremoniously admitted to the beginning of a program of physical privation or 'penance' which, it was claimed, would bring about the forgiveness or remission of their sins. Various rituals involving sprinkling or 'crossing' a person with ashes were adopted and while they are still said, today, to be justified on the grounds of symbolism they were imposed and accepted as having mystical or magical effects. Was Pope Gregory perhaps trying either a cure or a distraction from the plague? Such rituals hung like a murky cloud of priestly corruption to blind man to the free and uninhibited Grace of God which Jesus' teaching had uncovered. They further complicated the church's teaching on such theological concepts as Augustine's predestination. Slowly the church and its adherents – or subjects – were being dragged down to the level of indulgences.

In addition, pursuing the concept that Christ died sacrificially for the benefit of mankind, and to capitalize on the systems of ritual practised by some of the non-Christian religions, the generally uneducated masses were expected to believe that in commemorating his personal sacrifice in a communal act by sharing bread and wine they were actually eating and drinking the body and blood of Jesus of Nazareth. A touch of priestly hocus pocus helped to reinforce the state-imposed authority of the clergy, distract people from the mystical practices of their pagan priests, and encourage them to believe that – in the church’s words – “...Christ is made present ... by the change of the whole substance of the bread into his body, and of the whole substance of the wine into his blood ...[through]... this unique and wonderful change the Catholic Church rightly calls transubstantiation’. ⁵⁰

Let there be no doubt that the church intended these things to be swallowed complete. In his paper ‘Faith and revealed truth’ ⁵¹ G. D. Smith writes: “...the act of faith by which a Catholic believes the dogmas of the Church does not differ essentially from the act of divine faith ... [and]... the infallible authority of the church is by no means confined to the teaching of ‘dogmas’. The church is not only the teacher of revealed truth, she is also its guardian; and in the office of protecting God’s truth against error she needs to pronounce infallibly upon many matters which, although they are not formally revealed by God, are nevertheless intimately connected with revelation. It cannot be too strongly emphasized that Catholics are bound under pain of grave sin to believe the truths thus infallibly taught by the Church.’ [Emphasis added.]

BYZANTIUM, PERSIA AND A MESSENGER FROM THE EAST

But we are jumping ahead again. Let’s leave the mystique and mystery for a moment and come back to facts. Since the Avars had pushed the Lombards into Italy, relations between them and the Byzantine Emperor had changed rapidly. Instead of a loose alliance in which the Avars had accepted Constantinople’s financial support in return for providing a buffer against the other fluid masses of people such as the Slavs, Huns and Turks we find a bitter armed struggle. In 602 the Byzantine army wanted to sue for peace but Emperor Maurice wouldn’t hear of it. The army revolted, marched on Constantinople and disposed of the emperor. The empire began to crumble. The Avars marched into the Balkans which had been left defenceless by the army’s withdrawal to march on their own emperor. But they didn’t hold much of it for long. The Slavs moved south and engulfed them. Chosroes II, so recently reinstated by the murdered Maurice, took full advantage of the situation also. From 606 he moved systematically through the eastern provinces so that within ten years he controlled Egypt and Palestine as well as Mesopotamia, Syria, Armenia Iberia and part of Anatolia (Turkey). In fact his armies reached Chalcedon and faced Constantinople across the Bosphorus in both 606 and 615 before being repulsed.

For a couple of decades neither of the great powers seemed to be very much concerned with the Arabian Peninsula. It was a massive territory. It was greater in physical land area than either the Byzantine or Persian empires of the time. They had previously competed for vassal states to control its trade routes and access to the Red Sea but it was of very little interest at the moment. It was very arid and hostile, sparsely populated, with very few settlements or nomadic tribes of more than 600 people, and it lacked resources which they could use. They were preoccupied with the real face to face war and it had no strategic importance as far as that war was concerned so they both ignored it. In fact about 610, when he became emperor, Heraclius thought so little of Constantinople's relations with the Ghassanids of Northern Arabia that he stopped the payment of subsidies to them as an economy measure. He doesn't seem to have learned from Arcadius (Chapter 3) that when you withdraw aid or subsidies from an ally you invite him to become an enemy. Of course it must be admitted in his defence that his coffers and his ability to administer his bruised empire were pretty low at that time.

Only the year before Heraclius came to power the church had consecrated the Pantheon in Rome as a Christian church for the honour of Our Lady and the Martyrs. Mariology, previously practised mainly in the east, was taking a firm grip. The Pantheon had been the main temple of pagan cults linked to Pantheism, a confused system of beliefs that the universe and God are in some way identical, or that everything and every living creature or person, good or evil, has both some input from, and some influence on God. In consecrating that temple the church may have picked up a few more ready-made 'converts' from those who continued to use the great building but in doing so it swallowed yet another massive dose of syncretism by encouraging people to confuse the teachings of the church and the teachings of the Pantheists. But it didn't seem to matter. The church was supremely confident in the role which it defined for itself as the appointed Body-of-Christ-on-earth and as the sole and absolute authority for the imposition of God's will, as it interpreted that will, throughout the world. It had never enjoyed a stronger position in relation to the Emperor and rulers of independent kingdoms with whom it was in direct contact.⁵² It had either crushed or reached a political accommodation with all but one of the sects or groups whose theological insights differed from its own within the broad scope of Christianity. Judaism had been shattered as a major religious influence, or so the church thought, and it was having no real difficulty keeping the isolated pockets of Jews who had clung together either submerged or subjected. And after a pretty rough period following the collapse of the Roman Empire the church was again healthy and wealthy. Nothing stood in its way. Nothing. All it had to do was make the necessary political alliances which would carry it – always as the state religion of course – into or over those populations which had resisted it or which still had no knowledge of it.

It was then that news of discord in that trading town of Mecca, midway along the Red Sea coast of Arabia, which Byzantium had been trying to manipulate, started to filter out through the land caravans to Syria. The third husband of some wealthy merchant's widow, said to be of noble birth but orphaned at six, poor and of little note until he married, was stirring up trouble. A bit of a dreamer with a sharp social conscience, he was supposed to be having visions and was gathering a few supporters around him. He was preaching vigorously against the corruption and paganism of the merchants and they were out to shut him up. And although he was preaching that there was only one God he was critical of both Jews and Christians. Nobody in Constantinople or Rome took any notice. Why should they? There had been lots of these local religious phenomena before. His fellows would soon tire of his pinpricking disruption and put an end to him.

In any case neither Constantinople nor Rome were really interested in Arabia. Constantinople had enough on its plate trying to hold the empire together against Persia, and Rome was finally flexing its muscles for a push among unknown peoples in northern Europe. And besides, the population of Arabia is small, mainly nomadic, pretty rough and tough, and unlikely to want to have much to do with some religious freak. After all, haven't the Ethiopians, the Monophysites, the Nestorians, the Jews and the Zoroastrians all had a chop at converting those Arab pagans without much success? So both Byzantium and Rome ignored the first news of Muhammad.

By 616 Persia had succeeded in pushing Byzantium out of Syria, Palestine and Egypt. Jerusalem had fallen in 614 with the aid of Jewish allies to whom Chosroes II handed control of the city.⁵³ In Jerusalem, as in Constantinople, the veneration of relics of Jesus, Mary, and anyone or anything connected with the Apostolic period had become prominent in Christian worship and liturgy. Some say this was almost to the point of paranoia. This was partly a reflection of Monophysite influence over a very long period. At this time the city was officially orthodox Roman but there was still a strong Monophysite presence and, in addition, a heavy feeling of the supernatural pervading the city of the crucifixion and resurrection. Every church wanted a relic of the crucifixion. For centuries there had been a good trade in splinters and pieces of wood from the 'true cross'. Probably enough such splinters had left Jerusalem to build several crosses. In addition to that, Constantine's mother, Helena, as well as claiming to identify the sites of the crucifixion and the Sepulchre in which Jesus had been buried, also located what she announced to be the actual cross on which Jesus died. Most historians treat her claims with derision and considering the total destruction of the city two centuries earlier, there is little reason to do otherwise.⁵⁴ There is further confusion about whether she had all or part of what ever it was she located taken to Rome or whether it was held in Jerusalem and set up in the Basilica of the Holy Sepulchre which Constantine ordered to be built on the site nominated by his mother.

However, from somewhere or other the church in Jerusalem had produced something it called the 'true cross' and this was the object of much adoration. When the city fell to him Chosroes II destroyed the basilica but whipped the cross off to Ctesiphon on the Tigris. Why he did would be interesting to know. Certainly he was not a Christian so it would not have had any direct religious significance or attachment for him. He probably assumed it to be false anyway, because the Nestorians to whom he gave full protection did not accept such practices. Perhaps it was simply one of the spoils of victory or perhaps he was he trying to teach the Monophysites and the orthodox church of Rome something.

By 619 all of Byzantium's other possessions east of the Ceyhan River in modern Turkey had fallen to Chosroes II as well. That put a very effective buffer between the cities of Constantinople and Rome in Christian Europe and the infant religious movement in Arabia. Trade with the east would have fallen to a trickle and there was probably very little news reaching Europe from Arabia.

However it was then, while he was under imminent threat from both Persia and the Avars that Heraclius took stock of his tattered empire and considered shifting his capital to a more secure area on the untouched coast of North Africa.⁵⁵ He decided to hold his ground, but for a while the going was very tough indeed. In 619 the Barbarian Slavs actually attacked Constantinople itself. So fierce was the assault that works of art, icons and religious relics were taken from the great churches for safe keeping. They included a veil supposed to have been worn by Mary, the mother of Jesus, and very highly venerated. When the attack was repulsed the veil was returned to its shrine at Blachernae with great ceremony and a feast was instituted to commemorate the occasion. Whether the church deliberately tried to attach a mystical empire-saving capacity to the veil, giving its veneration very heavy overtones of idolatry, or whether the street mobs spontaneously adopted it in that sense probably doesn't matter. The church could have prevented it and it was the church's long-standing support for Mariology and the veneration of relics and icons which made it possible.⁵⁶ The feast of the veil is still celebrated in some eastern churches on July 2nd each year.⁵⁷

The toing and froing continued for the next few years on all of the borders of the Byzantine Empire so it is quite understandable that neither Constantinople nor Rome were very impressed to hear, in 622, that the Arab religious upstart Muhammad had been forced to flee with his followers from Mecca to Medina. We can almost hear the pope saying to his informants "I told you so: we won't hear much more of him!" The year of the Hijra had arrived. The community of Islam had been established. But the only Christians who felt any ripples were the few communities in Central Arabia.

While Muhammad was hurriedly shifting home, beating an attempt on his life by only hours, Heraclius was planning his counter attack on Persia. With shortened perimeters to defend and the great sense of urgency from the threat of complete destruction of the empire he was able to rebuild his army and regroup it in the east at the expense of the west quite quickly. He was determined not to waste his regrouped forces with long drawn out battles to regain ground inch by inch. In any case he had to keep strong forces at home to protect Constantinople. He decided to take the Persians by surprise. He would drive a wedge straight through to the heart of the Persian Empire. It was a very risky business because it meant virtually isolating a major army without protection for its long line of communication with Constantinople. It would have to be totally self-sufficient or live off captured Persian resources. But the threat to Byzantium was so great that the risk had to be taken. He succeeded.

Heraclius broke through the Persian front and got as far as the Tigris quite quickly, in 623. But Chosroes II wouldn't fight a set piece battle there. He chose to keep his main army on the front, make an alliance with the Avars, and to harass Constantinople. The Persians and the Avars attacked together in 626. The Avars couldn't breach the city walls and the Byzantines, having naval control of the straits, prevented the Persians from crossing the Bosphorus. It appeared to be a stalemate with each empire having an army ravaging the other's territory. Then Heraclius got the upper hand, forced a major battle near the ruins of ancient Nineveh, the former Assyrian capital famed as the subject of Jonah's prophetic mission about 800 BCE, and won. Both sides were militarily exhausted. Each had an army at the doorstep of the other's capital but couldn't strike the final blow. Heraclius couldn't take Ctesiphon but Chosroes II couldn't expel him. Similarly Chosroes II's army couldn't cross the Bosphorus to get at Constantinople but the Byzantine defenders couldn't push them back. Within a few months Chosroes II was deposed again, but this time he was murdered by his nobles. They were not giving him another chance. His son Kavadh, said to have been among the plotters, took the throne and sued for peace.

The armistice provided for each empire to evacuate the territory of the other so that the boundaries of 610 would be restored. Egypt, Palestine and Syria were all returned to the grasping hands of Byzantium. The trade routes and their caravans from the east again carried goods and news through Byzantine territory to Alexandria in Egypt and through Palestine to Damascus and Antioch in Syria. Byzantium and its church again rubbed shoulders with the Arab world. Communications and trade soon returned to normal. The buffer between Byzantium and the Arabian Peninsula was gone – rubbed out by the armistice.

In spite of the demands of his military affairs Heraclius did not lose interest in religious affairs. Dissatisfied with the effectiveness of the restrictions which Pope Gregory had imposed on Jews, Heraclius imposed another total ban on Jewish worship along the lines of Justinian in 534, and let it be known that he thought other rulers should follow his example throughout Europe. Some of them took up the challenge and persecution increased throughout the regions in which Catholicism was established. In Gaul in 626, about the time that the Byzantines and the Persians were tearing each other apart, King Dagobert ordered a general expulsion of all Jews except those who 'consented' to adopt Christianity, and a similar policy was adopted in both Burgundy and Lombardy. But Heraclius had no need to worry about cooperation in Spain. King Sisebut was ten years ahead of him. In 616 he had totally banned the public display of Judaism and successive church councils in Toledo, at which the king presided, laid down measures including the seizure of Jewish children for rearing as Christians in Catholic households, and the exiling of any families found practicing Jewish rites in the privacy of their homes.⁵⁸

Out east, as a result of the armistice, Kavadh agreed to return the so-called 'true cross' to the Byzantine authorities and Heraclius replaced it in Jerusalem with great pomp and ceremony on March 21st 629. Idolatry and religious imperialism or nationalism came to the fore again. Christian apologists call it symbolism. Another feast day was instituted to perpetuate the memory of the return of the 'true cross'. It has since been renamed the feast of the 'Triumph of the Cross' in an effort to adjust the emphasis. It is celebrated as one of the Catholic Church's principal feast days on September 14th each year in both the Roman and the Byzantine Rites. In its modern form it commemorates Helena's discoveries and the consecration of the Basilica of the Holy Sepulchre as well as the return of the 'true cross'.^{59 60}

At times the return of the cross from Ctesiphon by Kavadh has been compared with the return of the Ark of the Covenant to Israel by the Philistines.⁶¹ Similarly the celebration of the event has been compared with the ceremonies and celebrations which King Solomon ordered when the Ark of the Covenant was placed in the newly-completed Temple.^{62 63} Such comparisons are odious. The cross, even if it was genuine, was basically a relic which put the emphasis on death. It served to concentrate the attention of the gentiles on the involvement of his own community in Jesus' crucifixion. It therefore further poisoned relations between the people who had been converted to Christianity by syncretism, and the Jewish community. It drew attention away from the resurrection which is the real message of Christ's ministry. The Ark was, on the other hand, the most tangible record of the covenant relationship between the people Israel and God, and the demands which God made of them. But in addition, it was partly from their misunderstanding of the Ark and their dependence on it as a 'shield' in battle that the Jews began to see Yahweh in the narrow restrictive sense of the God of the nation Israel. In this sense the comparison simply supports the criticism that the celebration of the return of the cross was a sign of religious imperialism and a distraction from the obligations of the new covenant which were to live according to the teachings of the gospel. Anti-Judaism and anti-Semitism or retribution for the trial and crucifixion of Jesus were certainly not part of the gospel message. A key injunction was to commemorate and reflect on his life-sustaining mission at a communal meal aided by the symbolism of sharing life-sustaining bread and wine.

While the war with Persia was in progress Heraclius set up his imperial headquarters in the wilderness south of Damascus. It was fortuitous that he did so, for while he was there, either in 628 or 629, an envoy approached him with a brief message. There is no certainty whether the message was written or oral, but it is probable that the messenger carried a letter written in Arabic which was the obscure Semitic language of the nomadic tribes of the Arabian Peninsula. In any case the message was simple. It called on Heraclius to acknowledge and to serve the one true God and to adopt the faith of Islam. It was from Muhammad.^{64 65}

CHAPTER 6

TURN BACK THE CLOCK!

Neither the Church of Rome nor the authorities of the Byzantine Empire paid much attention to the brief message from the leader of a new religious movement which had been spawned way out in the desert of Northern Arabia. They could not comprehend that out of revelation to one man in a pretty insignificant territory in which neither Rome nor Constantinople had very much interest had grown the embryo for a mighty community of faith. Islam had joined Judaism and Christianity as a universal religion based around Abraham and Jerusalem.

If we think in terms of parallel streams of faith within Yahwism, the third stream had begun to flow. In 628 it was certainly only the headwaters of the river which would very soon flood out across the plains of the Near East, North Africa, Asia and the southern perimeter of Europe with a wedge into the very heart of the continent. It must have required faith of quite extraordinary depth for its members to believe that they could have any influence on the affairs of the world, religious or otherwise. The story of the first band of followers who gathered with Muhammad at Medina is in the same tradition as the Acts of the Apostles and the flight of the Hebrew tribes from Egypt.

“How preposterous! This man Muhammad telling me to acknowledge and serve the one true God! Doesn’t he know who he’s talking to? Doesn’t he know that I am ruler of an empire charged with the responsibility of protecting the one true church of the one true God and to impose its God-given message throughout the world?” Maybe they were not the exact thoughts that ran through Heraclius’ mind when he received that first rather informal message from Muhammad but we can assume they were along such lines. His actual response has not come down to us. He may have just laughed. After all, he had been pushing efforts to bring uniformity of worship within his empire, he had recently taken steps to rid the empire and the whole of Europe of Jewish worship, and he had supported moves to strengthen the Christian presence in Southern Arabia. Chosroes II was dead but the armistice negotiated with Kavadh had not been finalized. The True Cross – or at least what was claimed to be the true cross – was still at Ctesiphon. After he had recovered Jerusalem and restored the True Cross to its rightful position he could then turn his attention to other religious matters.

Of one thing we can be sure. Muhammad knew quite well the position and power of the man at Damascus who was still licking his wounds and counting his gains and losses from his encounter with the Persians. He had got very much the better of the armistice. He was now in a strong position to squash any irritating little sorties by raiding parties from places like Medina. Muhammad didn't even have the backing of his country or a national army to press the point of his message.

We are told that Kavadh was hopping mad when he was confronted with the same message from Muhammad. He was fully occupied at Ctesiphon trying to get the badly mauled Persian army back into fighting shape and he certainly wasn't going to waste time in idle chatter over such matters. He had his own state religion to foster and had shown unexpected tolerance in accepting and giving full protection to the Nestorian branch of the Christian Church. He wanted no more sects setting up in his empire and, in any case, the message was something of a personal insult in view of his personal heritage of god-kings. He tore up the message and threw the fragments at the messenger.^{1 2}

Of the four others who are believed to have received the same message one, the chief of the Banu Hanifa in South-east Arabia, was in an area of Persian influence and the others were a part of the Byzantine camp. The Negus of Abyssinia was in alliance with Constantinople in their joint efforts to get control of southern Arabia and its trade routes and the dominant religious influences in his territory were the independent Ethiopian Church and the Monophysites who were gradually merging into one stream. The Regent of Egypt was a subject of Byzantium, ascetic monasticism had first developed there and Monophysite influence was very strong indeed, possibly dominant by then, in his country. The Prince of Ghassan may have still been smarting from the withdrawal of Byzantine subsidies but he was still aligned with the empire and his state was one of the strongest pockets of Monophysite influence.

Actually there is no historical certainty about the number of leaders to whom Muhammad sent messages at that time, nor about whether they were verbal or written. Wells refers to the message to Heraclius as a letter in Arabic, suggests that only a deprecatory interpretation of it may have reached the emperor, and notes that there is no actual record of it being received. He then refers to Kavadh receiving a written message in the same terms, tearing it up and flinging the fragments at the envoy. According to von Grunebaum only the Persian king received the envoys unkindly and the others despatched them "with encouraging words and valuable gifts." However he then notes that the historicity of these events cannot be seriously upheld. What the reports demonstrate is that Muhammad was successful in establishing relations with the outside world and "his successors who devised the wording of the letters desired to provide documentary evidence that Muhammad had been sent to all peoples and not only to the Arabs."

In recent times the religious movement which evolved around Muhammad has been described in many different ways by observers according to their standpoint. It was a religio-political movement among the Arabs. It was the great enemy of medieval Europe.³ It has been to some an heretical development of Judaism, but it has been equally a Christian heresy more dangerous and more powerful than Arianism or Gnosticism.⁴ To some church historians trying to reconcile its success to their own faith it has been superior to the paganism which it displaced in Arabia, stronger than the type of Christianity which it met and overcame, with some favourable aspects and elements of value to the world ⁵, while to others it has been simply a religion of the desert and the Middle East with outliers in all directions but not a universal religion. ⁶

Unfortunately the level of bigotry which was whipped up within an ignorant community by a fearful church in order to conduct the crusades was such that for several hundred years Christians generally regarded Muhammad as an impostor and as an instrument of the devil. In 1734 George Sale, a lawyer and linguist with experience in Arabia, published the first serious English translation of the Qur'an. He worked from the original Arabic instead of from Latin or French translations and provided detailed historical notes and explanations so that it could be used by Christians as a study volume. When R. A. Davenport republished the work in 1869, 135 years later, he wrote in a brief Life of George Sale that the translator had been vilified with "slander (and) the blind merciless rage which are characteristic of Bigotry."⁷ Sale was a founding member of a society for the encouragement of learning but he was also a member of the Society for the Promoting of Christian Knowledge and he made his own belief in the superiority of Christianity perfectly obvious. In a note inscribing his translation in honour of Lord Carteret he referred to "the detestation with which the name of Mohammad [sic] is loaded" because of calamities brought on by Arab conquests after he had formed them into an empire, and then wrote:

But as Mohammad gave his Arabs the best religion he could, preferable, at least, to those of the ancient pagan lawgivers, I confess I cannot see why he deserves not equal respect, though not with Moses or Jesus Christ, whose laws came really from heaven, yet with Minos or Numa, notwithstanding the distinction of a learned writer, who seems to think it a greater crime to make use of an imposture to set up a new religion, founded on the acknowledgment of one true God, and to destroy idolatry, than to use the same means to gain reception to rules and regulations for the more orderly practice of heathenism already established" ⁸

Sale's detractors accused him of belief in the divine mission of Muhammad and of placing Islam equal with Christianity. In his defence, Davenport wrote:

Sale was not one of those who imagine that the end sanctifies the means, and that the best interests of mankind can be advanced by violence, by railing, or by deviating from the laws of truth, in order to blacken an adversary. He enters into the consideration of the character of Mohammad with a calm philosophic spirit; repeatedly censuring his imposture, touching upon his subterfuges and inventions, but doing justice to him on those points on which the pretended prophet is really worthy of praise. The rules which, in his address to the reader, he lays down for the conversion of Mohammedans, are dictated by sound sense and amiable feelings. They are however not calculated to satisfy those who think the sword and the faggot to be the only proper instruments for the extirpation of heresy. That he places Islamism on an equality with Christianity is a gross falsehood. ⁹

However probably the most widespread Western perception of Islam during the middle generations of the twentieth century was that it was an outpouring of Arab Nationalism combined with religious fervour based loosely on Jewish and Christian beliefs and that the political leaders of the day simply took advantage of it in much the same way that the European powers took advantage of Christianity. It has been perceived as a mechanism to generate political stability and national strength through religious conformity or, perhaps more accurately, to provide a religious justification for anti-Western adventures and desert wars of expansion. It has also been assumed by people in the West who have a short memory for history that as an instrument of Arab Nationalism it would never attract people beyond the region of its origins and that it would therefore not be a serious competitor or threat to the West and Christianity. After all (their reasoning went) the Arabs could never rise up and seriously compete with the superior powers of Europe!

Certainly the development of Islam from Muhammad's teaching, and under his leadership, accelerated the development of Arab Nationalism, but it had already begun and his religious community did not merge with the Arab community to produce a nation which could challenge the great religious communities and empires around it during the prophet's lifetime. However, the challenge to the Christian Church to re-examine itself and its teachings was quite clear. While some people took it seriously the majority did not and the imperial powers rejected it out of hand.

To Muslims, Islam is as the Qur'an describes it: a community of believers against non-believers. It is therefore most important that we look at what makes a 'believer' and the things he believes. However this brief Sura cannot be, nor is it the place for, a detailed discussion of Islamic theology. There are ample excellent references available for those who want such a discussion. These notes can only indicate key thrusts of Qur'anic teaching, put Islam in perspective together with the other two streams of Abrahamic messianic faith, and provide the background for the unfolding trouble in the triangle.

THE RELIGIOUS HERITAGE OF ISLAM

For too long the western world was fed the story that the Church had not been active in Arabia before Muhammad and therefore any understanding he had of Christianity was hearsay picked up on his caravan trips to Syria. It was implied from this that his criticism of Christianity and the church was both ill founded and unfair. Furthermore, it was said that he must have been a phoney or an impostor, that he could not have received revelation from God through inspired visions and that all of his knowledge of Judaic and Christian writings must have come from contacts on his travels.

Fortunately such statements appear less and less in Christian writings today but great damage was done over many centuries. They were used to justify the church's inflexible stand against Islam and, later, the crusades, and they generated bigotry towards Muslims among Christians on a frightening scale which is being broken down only very slowly.

It is correct that the official orthodox church of Rome had not set an evangelical foot into Arabia. Hung up by its Church State relationship and its doctrines, already noted, it had not seriously set such a foot anywhere outside the bounds of the Roman or Byzantine Empires on an organized basis, except in Ireland where it had been carried by force of circumstances which we shall come to. But the Monophysites and the Ethiopians, both in communion with Rome, and the Nestorians had all been very active.

It was the same Christian general, Abraha, who pushed the Jewish king out of the Yemen and led the abortive Byzantine-sponsored push by Abyssinia for Mecca via the Yemen some time before 570, the year that (according to tradition) Muhammad was born.¹⁰ At that stage there were two confirmed Christian tribes in the Mecca/Medina region, known as the Hijaz. They were the Judham and the 'Udhra, and there were probably others. Large numbers of Hijaz Arabs had been baptized before Muhammad was born and the Monophysites had appointed many bishops with a priest and a deacon to each tribe in the region. Their women wore veils out of doors. They had founded churches and fasting and alms-giving were regularly practiced. Their monasteries, which were open to travellers 24 hours a day, gave food and drink to visitors before sending them on their way. Many towns had Nestorian schools, but mainly in the eastern region, including Bahrayn (Bahrain) which was a logical extension from their base at Hira.¹¹

The antagonism between these two branches of Christianity which resulted from their confrontation under Byzantium was inevitably carried into Arabia. It was compounded by the political situation. The north western region provided many mercenaries for Byzantium while the north eastern region did the same for Persia. Rivalry and raids between tribes of the two regions naturally took sectarian as well as tribal overtones. The clergy joined in the sordid displays and persecutions and anathema were commonplace. The divisions became so deep that instead of some four or so Arab kingdoms the peninsula fragmented into about fifteen principalities. The reputation and moral authority of the Christian churches were torn to shreds, heresy and corruption knew no bounds and contributed to the environment in which the young Muhammad would grow up.¹² Even the tribal system began to break down with infighting. Loosely knit confederacies would form and break up.

Then when the great Ma'rib dam burst for the third time in 570 there was no will and no prince strong enough to rebuild it. Organized irrigated farming in Southern Arabia came to an end and much of the fertile land was lost to erosion. Food shortages and the lack of work led to further inter-tribal strife, barbarism, a shift in power in favour of nomadic tribes and reoccupation of some districts by Bedouin tribes from further north. Uncertainty was always a characteristic of the Bedouin life style but in the wake of such a catastrophe it tended to give way to distress. The stronger tribes began to extort protection money from the weaker ones as well as from the merchants in trading centres such as Mecca who had previously gained most from both the stable farm production of the south and long distance trade.¹³

MUHAMMAD'S EARLY YEARS

At that time Muhammad, whose full name was Muhammad ibn 'Abdallāh, was an impressionable young boy, being reared as an orphan by relatives. Muhammad's father died before he was born. His mother was from another tribe and, as was the custom, she sent him to be wet-nursed with desert clansmen, but although his grandfather, 'Abd-al-Muttalib, head of the noble Quraish clan of Hāshim, was his guardian he is thought to have spent a lot of his time with her until she died when he was six. After she died Muhammad was directly under the care of his grandfather until he also died two years later and his uncle, Abu-Talib, became both head of the clan and his guardian.¹⁴

During his youth, Muhammad travelled the Arabian desert trade routes with caravans in company with Abu-Talib. He is known to have visited Syria, and he had contact with the merchants of Mecca who, although the region was in decline, were able to gain commercial advantage from the new Persian domination of the region so that their commercial interests and prestige were growing. Muhammad therefore saw all aspects of life in Southern Arabia: the petty conflict between clans, the Bedouin incursions into previously settled areas, its very confused religious life and practices, and the politicking and dubious trade practices and trade organizations of Mecca. His clan played a leading role in the affairs of a sort of chamber of commerce known as The League of the Virtuous and this apparently gave him the opportunity for commercial and matrimonial contacts which, as a poor orphan, he would not otherwise have had. In due course, at the age of 25 and having demonstrated his commercial negotiating skills to her satisfaction, Muhammad received and accepted a proposal of marriage from a wealthy widowed woman trader named Khadijah who, it is thought, was fifteen years his senior.¹⁵

Muhammad's marriage to Khadijah enabled him to develop his commercial skills so that, together, they were able to engage in profitable enterprises. However the more important aspect of their marriage was the personal support and encouragement which Muhammad received from Khadijah as he struggled with his spiritual development, the way to respond to the visions and revelations which he began to experience, and his "moments of desolation" when he doubted his commission to be a prophet.¹⁶ According to the records available Muhammad began preaching in Mecca and claiming to be a prophet in 610, at the age of about 40, or about 15 years after his marriage, and 613 is taken as the year when his substantial ministry began.

In the intervening years conflict within and between the urban and nomadic communities had taken on new dimensions. Tribes would become aligned around issues such as the exclusion of Yemenite merchants from the Meccan trade. Then, either as a consequence of those alignments or in order to justify them, religious allegiance and access to shrines and oases on route would become an issue also.

In the case of the Yemen it is hardly to be wondered at. The failure of the hated Abyssinian Monophysite, Abraha, in his effort to annex Mecca to his semi-independent satrapy sometime about 560 strengthened Arab national pride and weakened the position of Monophysites in Mecca. They could after all, have provided some sort of foreign fifth column or at least have had divided loyalties – like Catholic Romans in the middle of Arian Italy for example. A few years later, as also noted in Sura 7, the Yemenites rebelled against Abraha and expelled him and his Abyssinian forces with the aid of Persia. Then in 597, because of internal division still threatening the stability of Southern Arabia in the wake of the collapse of the Ma'rib dam,

Persia decided to put an end to Yemen independence. At the stroke of a pen it converted all of the Yemen's Christians from Monophysites to Nestorians because of its hostility towards anything associated with Byzantium. Then the Persians went further. They gave Nestorian Christianity the status of State Religion of the second rank.¹⁷

Most of the Meccan traders had continued to practise pagan rites and stood aloof from the new religions of Judaism, Zoroastrianism and the two branches of Christianity. This was partly because of the ways in which these had been introduced and propagated, and partly because of the imperial links which they implied. If a merchant wished to trade freely in all directions, especially with Persia and Byzantium, he could not afford to be seen to be politically aligned.

This religious conservatism of the merchants certainly helped to strengthen paganism and to perpetuate animal sacrifices and other animist rites in the main towns including Mecca where a great number of deities were worshipped. A feature of pagan religious life was an annual pilgrimage to the shrine of one's choice. However those pilgrimages were, in turn, another factor in the religious conservatism of the merchants. Like Christmas in the Christian West, they were highly profitable and neither the merchants nor those who were the custodians of the Holy Shrines and oases on pilgrimage routes could afford to do without them.

THE PROPHET'S MINISTRY

Against this background Muhammad began his prophetic ministry and it was therefore inevitable that once he began preaching against the worship of pagan gods and against corrupt religious practices he would antagonize the merchant class in Mecca even though he had become one of them through marriage. No criticism stings more or is more difficult to reject than criticism by a member of one's peer group.

There is no evidence to suggest that Muhammad set out either to establish a new religious movement or to build an Arab Empire. He responded to a call to clean up religious practices and to bring his fellows to see the simple truth that there is one God. This is illustrated by Sura 23 which begins with reflections on earlier signs of God's authority and the relationship between God and humanity and then turns to the issue of the role of the Jewish community and its prophets. It reads, in part:

Then We sent Musa [Moses] and his brother Harun [Aaron] with Our signs and clear authority to Pharaoh and his nobles. But they received them with scorn, for they were arrogant men. 'What!' they said. 'Are we to believe in two mortals like us, whose people are our bondsmen?' They denied them, and thus incurred destruction. And We gave Musa the Book, so that his people might be rightly guided.

We made the son of Mariam [Mary] and his mother a sign to mankind and gave them a shelter on a peaceful hill-side watered by a fresh spring.

Apostles! Eat of that which is wholesome and do good works: I have knowledge of all your actions. Your brotherhood is but one brotherhood, and I am your only Lord: therefore fear Me.

TURN BACK THE CLOCK!

Yet men have divided themselves into different sects, each rejoicing in what it had. Leave them in their error till death overtakes them.

Do they think that in giving them wealth and children We are hastening to do them good? By no means! They do not understand.

Those who live in fear of their Lord; who believe in the revelations of their Lord; who worship none besides their Lord; who give what they give with their hearts filled with awe, (knowing) that they will return to their Lord: these hasten to good things and are the first to attain them. [Sura 23:45–57] ^{18 19 20}

[Unless otherwise attributed, quotations from the Qur'an are from the translation checked and revised by Mahmud Y. Zayid and approved by the Supreme Sunni and Shii Councils of the Republic of Lebanon (Beirut: Dar Al-Choura, 1980)]

However once Muhammad responded to that call to clean up religious practices and to bring his fellows to see the simple truth that there is one God his understanding of God and his religious insights developed in such a way that conflict with each of the established religions became inevitable. His limited knowledge of their mainstream practices gave them plenty of ammunition with which to attack him.

Six centuries earlier the apparently coincidental annexation of Palestine by the Roman Empire had provided the vehicle which carried Christianity across Europe, North Africa and East Asia and dispersed Judaism across the same region. Now, in the seventh century, in a very similar manner, the apparently coincidental development of Arab Nationalism was to provide the vehicle which would sweep Islam across the bulk of that area and place the Christian Church under intense self-searching pressure. These two factors, rejection of the prophet's call for reform, and the availability of a ready made vehicle to carry that call, made the evolution of Muhammad's movement into another religious institution inevitable. It was as inevitable as the establishment of Christianity once the people of mainstream Judaism had refused to acknowledge the Apostles' understanding of Jesus of Nazareth as Messiah. It was also as inevitable as the establishment of reformed churches once the church of Rome had rejected Martin Luther's call for a big clean up 900 years later.

It had taken a very long period for Judaism to evolve in its role as an instrument of God's will. Christianity, once having been triggered, evolved very quickly and became a force of major proportions in a much shorter time, say two or three hundred years. Islam, in its turn, once having been triggered, was a force of major proportions within a generation.

To insist that all three are equally instruments of God's will does not imply that they must, or will, be perpetuated in their present form, or that any more such messianic religions will necessarily be revealed. Yahwist tradition and Judaic prophecy made it clear that a Messiah would come through Israel to usher in an era of new relationships or, put another way, to lead mankind towards Salvation. There was nothing, other than prophecy that the Messiah would not be recognized, to suggest that establishment of a new religion or the rejection of the old would occur or was necessary. The subject of prophecy was a Messiah, not the Christian Church. The Apostles could have remained within the Hebrew tradition and synagogue worship, and an understanding of the Gospel message as an extension of the message of the Torah and the prophets could have evolved quite rationally. As we have seen, the evolution of a second movement and the establishment of the church only occurred when Christ's disciples and the Apostles could not fully understand his relationship to God and sought to define it in terms which would attract non-Jews and which the Hebrew community could not accept. It is not so much a case of the Jewish authorities rejecting the Messianic message but of, firstly, failing to recognize the person of the Messiah and, subsequently, rejecting the Apostles' definition of Christ as Messiah. That definition was totally at odds with their scriptural expectation

It becomes quite clear from what we know of the Christian Church in the early centuries and of Muhammad's message that a third movement only became necessary because the church ran off the rails and also proved unable to grasp, or to spread, the Messianic message. The role of Islam was to push it back on the rails. Unfortunately it ran out of steam and jumped the tracks in much the same way as the Church. There was another stalemate or, rather, a period of stagnation.

Then we find the world moving forward again until we reach the present situation. We find our meat sandwich. We find Israel being the catalyst, or the meat in the sandwich, in a three-way confrontation between the people of Judaism, Christianity and Islam. But we can see only the obvious factors like the political and economic conflict over material resources, the territorial claims and counter claims – and the chilling distraction of the ruthless imposition of Islamic law when radical Muslims begin to dominate a country. We are again absorbed by the problems and by the status to be gained or lost, like the church at the time of the fall of the Roman Empire. Our thinking is dominated by concern for a potential catastrophe for the western world and, for some anyway, the institution of the church.

However the church overall is showing insufficient awareness of the opportunities which have been thrust at it. It has taken the church two generations since the establishment of the State of Israel and one generation since the crises of the Yom Kippur War and the oil embargo to develop a meaningful interest in its relationships with its partners and their joint responsibilities towards people of other faiths and those who have no religious faith at all. However it is being pushed relentlessly and inevitably towards three-way dialogue between Judaism, Christianity and Islam which can only result in the evolution of one common messianic understanding with a multi-pronged monotheistic religious movement carrying the Messianic message of love and salvation for all mankind. The circumstances which have locked us into that three way dialogue have taken a very long time to develop since Muhammad sent his message to Heraclius at Damascus.

Unfortunately Muhammad's message has suffered much the same fate as Christ's. Aside from the Qur'an, most of the statements attributed to Muhammad were not committed to verifiable records. It was not until after his death that a concerted effort was made to gather together and codify all the notes which he dictated, and subsequently these were not retained in chronological sequence. The Qur'an has been subject to interpretation in the same way as the Christian Gospels. It has been put on a pedestal, canonized and declared absolute truth in exactly the same way as those papers which were selected for inclusion in the various Bibles of the Christian churches.

Subsequently it has been adapted, interpreted, modified, and added to by various streams of his followers as they have syncretised pagan, Jewish and Christian practices and ideas, developed heresies, caused schisms and fragmented into divisions and sects which, while they are no where nearly as numerous as Christian rites, churches and sects, are certainly just as confusing.

To find out what Muhammad really taught one would no more go to the first muezzin (crier) one saw in a Muslim minaret than one would go to the first brother found swinging a church bell to find out what Jesus really taught. Perhaps the Imam on the one hand, and the Priest on the other, but even then we would expect to get a particular denominational interpretation. We would reach for the Qur'an and the Gospels respectively to get as near to Muhammad and to Jesus as available records allow and we would probably be startled by some of the similarities.

THE THIRD PARALLEL STREAM

Muhammad's message, stripped of all the circumstantial detail which made it immediately relevant to the people among whom he lived and preached, looks remarkably like Jesus' message. Or put another way, the Christian message, stripped of all the syncretistic, priestly and idolatrous ideas and practices which have been attached to it over almost two thousand years, looks remarkably like Muhammad's message.

The Church's claim that Muhammad learned all he knew of God directly from Christian and Jewish hearsay does not stand serious scrutiny. There was no Arabic translation of the Bible available in pre-Islamic days. There were Jewish religious writings translated into Arabic but it is very doubtful whether Muhammad would have had access to a comprehensive set of these. The education and understanding of Christian bishops, priests and deacons in Arabia at that time would very likely have been restricted to the doctrines and rituals thought necessary at the time. Muhammad simply did not have access to the sort of material or people who could tell him what was Christ's basic teaching and what was syncretistic or dogmatic teaching tacked on by the church. This means that if we ask ourselves what could have been the sources of his teaching we are left with only two alternative answers: divine revelation or an acuteness of reasoning and insight which, according to the Church's teaching, is a gift through the Grace of God.

It is not necessary to work through the growth of Muhammad's following and the establishment of the Islamic Community at Medina in detail. Let's take them as read, or reach for a reputable book on the subject, but it is necessary to look at Muhammad's basic beliefs before moving on to the military and political confrontation between European Christianity and the Islamic Arab Empire.

No GOD BUT GOD

Muhammad preached with great vigour that there is no god but God. There is no room for prayer to another deity or to any subordinate god-form. There is not even room for the use of alternative names for God. To use or to allow any other names amounts to admitting polytheism.

That basic statement of faith was aimed firstly at polytheists and other pagans but it was also directed squarely at Christians. Jews have no trouble with it at all but Christians who adhere to the doctrine of the Trinity have real difficulty with it. The statement that God is comprised of three equal 'persons', namely God the Father, God the Son and God the Holy Spirit, is simply not reconcilable with the concept that only God is God and all other 'persons' or 'forms' or 'presences' are subordinate to God and are instruments of God's will.

The Arian Christians, as we have noted, did not accept the doctrine of the Trinity. They placed Jesus and the Holy Spirit as subject to God, and Muhammad therefore had no issue with them. However the Catholic Church had succeeded in almost totally persecuting or politicking them out of existence by the beginning of Muhammad's prophetic mission about 610. The last of the Arian rulers, the Lombards and Visigoths, had been coerced into Catholicism a few years earlier and the few remaining Arian communities were being either swamped or induced to forsake their 'heresy' for the true faith one by one.

There were marked similarities between the views of the Nestorians and the Arians in as much as the Nestorians believed there was a divine presence or influence in the man Jesus and that they were not united in a god-man. But, of course, there were none of them left in the empire of Rome and Constantinople either. They had all been expelled as heretics and had taken their dynamic missions into Persia and beyond. They and Muhammad each had a close understanding of the other's position on the issue and the founder of Islam reached an arrangement with the Nestorians more favourable than that which he permitted for the orthodox Christian church.

Naturally the Monophysites incurred the special displeasure of the prophet because of their belief that Jesus was totally divine. Their doctrine was open to gross misinterpretation and encouraged mystical beliefs, rites, and behaviour which Muhammad could only see as polytheism or the worship of two separate and equal gods. One bishop, Julian, at first of Halicarnassus on the Aegean coast and later in refuge at Alexandria, had a big influence in fostering extreme Monophysite views among sects in Egypt and Abyssinia, and quite probably in Arabia also in view of the links between the churches of those countries. He died long before Muhammad began preaching but the influence of his teaching, known by the ghastly term Aphthartodocetae, that Jesus' earthly body was incorruptible, immortal and totally free of feeling, suffering or emotion, had a lasting impact.²¹

It was, as we have seen, the Monophysites who were numerically strongest and most firmly established along the Red Sea coast of Arabia, in Abyssinia and in the Yemen. They therefore had a profound influence in determining Muslim attitudes towards the Christian Church. They were hard pressed to satisfy Muhammad and his followers that they worshipped one God and only God.

THE MESSIAH?

Muhammad has often been accused of giving Jesus nothing more than the status of a Jewish prophet. This has usually been to discredit him in the eyes of Trinitarian Christians but sometimes out of sheer ignorance of the Qur'an. While Muslims are encouraged to read the Bible to complement their study of the Qur'an it is indeed rare to hear a Christian minister encourage his congregation to pick up a copy of the Qur'an.

Jesus, repeatedly referred to in the Qur'an as "son of Mary," is given the title of Messiah in the context of being a sign to the Jews, and a guide whose life and teaching in the Gospel completes the law and prophecies of the Torah. His Messiahship is not disputed. It is supported very strongly. It is the definition, or the Christian interpretation of the status of Messiah which is disputed in the Qur'an.

We have revealed the Torah having guidance and light. By it, the prophets who surrendered themselves to Allah judged the Jews, and so did the rabbis and the divines, by what they were required to guard of Allah's books, and to what they are witnesses. [5:44]

After those prophets We sent forth Isa, [Jesus] the son of Mariam, confirming the Torah already revealed, and gave him the Gospel, in which there is guidance and light, corroborating that which was revealed before it in the Torah, a guide and an admonition to the righteous. Therefore let the followers of the Gospel judge in accordance with What Allah has revealed therein. Evil-doers are those that do not base their judgements on Allah's revelations. [5:46–47]

Say: 'People of the Book, you stand for nothing until you observe the Torah and the Gospel and that which is revealed to you from the Lord.' [5:68]

Unbelievers are those that say: 'Allah is al-Masih, [the Messiah] the son of Mariam.' For al-Masih himself said: 'Children of Israel, serve Allah, my Lord and your Lord.' He that worships other Gods besides Allah shall be forbidden Paradise by Allah, and his abode shall be in the Fire. The evil-doers shall have no helpers.

Unbelievers are those that say: 'Allah is one of three. There is but one God. If they do not desist from so saying, those of them that disbelieve shall be sternly punished.

Will they not turn to Allah in repentance and seek forgiveness of Him? He is Forgiving, Merciful.

Al-Masih, the son of Mariam, was no more than an apostle: other apostles had gone before him. His mother was a truthful woman. They both ate earthly food. [5:68, 71–75]

There could be no more direct call for Jews to recognize Jesus as the Messiah of Hebrew prophesy and for Christians to continue recognizing Judaism, than the way of the Torah and the Gospel are linked in that manner.

Say: 'People of the Book, Let us come to an equitable agreement among us that we will worship none but Allah, that we will associate none with Him, and that we will not set up one another lords besides Him.'

If they refuse, say: 'Bear witness that we are Muslims.' [3:63–64]

THE VIRGIN BIRTH

Similarly, Muhammad did not dispute Christ's Virgin birth. He taught that it was by God's command, not as an act of fatherhood in the sense of having a son and successor, but as a sign to the Jews. In line with that, the Qur'an states quite categorically that Mary, while virtuous and honoured, was in no sense mother of God or even mother of the Son of God.

Never has Allah begotten a son, nor is there any other God besides Him. Were this otherwise, each god would govern his own creation, each holding himself above the other. Exalted be Allah above their falsehoods! [23:91]

The angels said to Mariam: 'Allah bids you rejoice in a Word from Him. His name is al-Masih, Isa the son of Mariam. He shall be noble in this world and in the next, and shall be favoured by Allah. He shall speak to men in his cradle and in the prime of manhood, and shall lead a righteous life.'

'Lord,' she said, 'how can I bear a child when no man has touched me?'

He replied: 'Such is the will of Allah. He creates whom he will. When He decrees a thing, He need only say: "Be," and it is. He will instruct him in the Book and in wisdom, in the Torah and in the Gospel, and send him forth as an apostle to the children of Israel.' [3:45–48]

The same issue is taken up in other passages also.

'I am the messenger of your Lord,' he relied, 'and have come to give you a holy son.'

'How shall I bear a child,' she answered, 'when I am not touched by man and not unchaste?'

'Thus it will be,' your Lord said: 'That is easy for Me. And We shall make him a sign to mankind and a mercy from Us. This is Our decree.' [19:19–21]

MARY'S STATUS

In line with that belief, Muhammad was particularly vigorous in his preaching against Mariology and the concept of Mary as the mother of God. The Qur'an records:

Say: 'Allah is One, the Eternal God. He begot none, nor was He begotten. None in equal to Him.' [112:1–4]

In the context of the absolute, sole authority of God, that is as powerful, as definite as any statement in the Old Testament, including Moses' instructions to his people, Deuteronomy 4: 35, 39.

Say: 'None can protect me from Allah, nor can I find any refuge besides Him.' [72:22]

Say: 'Praise be to Allah who has never begotten a son; who has no partner in His sovereignty; who needs none to defend Him from humiliation.' Proclaim His greatness. [17:111]

Putting the spotlight squarely on statements attributed to Jesus by the writers of the Gospels a passage of the Qur'an says:

The Allah will say: 'Isa, son of Mariam, did you ever say to mankind: "Worship me and my mother as gods beside Allah?"'

'Glory to You,' he will answer, 'how could I say that to which I have no right? If I had ever said so, You would have surely known it. You know what is in my mind, but I cannot tell what is in Yours. You alone know what is hidden. I spoke to them of nothing except what You bade me. (I said): "Serve Allah, my Lord and your Lord." I watched over them whilst living in their midst, and ever since You took me to You, You Yourself have been watching over them. You are the witness to all things. If You punish them, they surely are Your servants; and if You forgive them, surely You are Mighty, Wise.' [5:116–118]

JESUS' DELEGATED AUTHORITY

But, in contrast to those denials of Jesus' equality with God, Muhammad reinforces Jesus' subordinate or delegated authority and his capacity to perform miracles in God's name time and time again.

Then Allah will say: 'Isa, son of Mariam, remember the favour I have bestowed on you and on your mother: how I strengthened you with the Holy Spirit, so that you preached to men in your cradle and in the prime of manhood; how I instructed you in the Book and in wisdom, in the Torah and in the Gospel; how by My leave you fashioned from clay the likeness of a bird and breathed into it so that, by My leave, it became a living bird; how, by My leave you healed the blind man and the leper, and by My leave restored the dead to life; and how I protected you from the Children of Israel when you brought them clear signs: thereupon the unbelievers among them said: "This is nothing but plain magic"; how when I enjoined the disciples to believe in Me and in My Apostle they replied: "We believe, bear witness that we submit,"' [5:110–111]

THE RESURRECTION

Similarly, Muhammad's understanding and acceptance of Christ's supernatural elevation to heaven with God, in an exalted position, and the force of God's final judgement is quite clear.

However whether this ‘elevation’ occurred after death and resurrection or otherwise by divine intervention is subject to debate.

They (the Jews) schemed, and Allah schemed. Allah is the supreme schemer. He said: “Isa, I am about to cause your term on earth to end and lift you up to Me. I shall take you away from those who disbelieve and exalt your followers above them till the Day of Resurrection. Then to Me you shall all return, and I shall judge your disputes. As for those who disbelieved, they shall be sternly punished in this world and in the world to come: there shall be none to help them. As for those that have faith and do good works, they shall be given their reward in full. Allah does not love the evil-doers. [3:55]

That verse, referring to disbelievers being sternly punished, gives heart to those Christians who have accepted that the church’s anti-Semitism was justified and then pursued it on the grounds that the Jews rejected Christ and “killed God.” It relates to the passage attributed to Jesus in which he commented on the fate of the Jews who “kill the prophets and stone those who are sent to you,” whose house would be left desolate and who “shall not see me anymore” until they say “Blessings on him who comes in the name of the Lord.” However it does not support such views. It is not a claim to divine status or to Trinitarian equality with God. It refers only to prophets and those sent in the name of the Lord. It also leaves open the question of Christ’s elevation and return or recognition, and the interpretation placed on it depends heavily on the interpretation of the words “see me any more.” In any case, as noted on other occasions, if the church or its adherents want to justify a particular position on the basis of a Qur’anic text they must recognize the validity of that text as a part of an equally valid total message revealed through a divinely inspired prophet. They have never been prepared to do that, so they therefore cannot hide behind texts selected in isolation. The passage from Matthew reads:

‘Jerusalem, Jerusalem, you that kill the prophets and stone those who are sent to you! How often have I longed to gather your children, as a hen gathers her chicks under her wings, and you refused! So be it! Your house will be left to you desolate, for, I promise, you shall not see me any more until you say: Blessings on him who comes in the name of the Lord.’ [Matthew 23:37–39 Jerusalem translation.]

That passage relates directly to the Qur’anic passage, sura 5:116–118, quoted above under Mary’s status. Sura 19, entitled ‘Mary’, concerns related matters of Jesus’ virgin birth, death and resurrection. It reads, in part:

... We bestowed on him wisdom while yet a child and (gave him) pity (for others) and purity; and he grew up a righteous man; honouring his father and mother, and neither arrogant nor rebellious. Peace on him on the day he was born and the day he dies; and may peace be on him when he is raised to life.

And you shall recount in the Book the story of Mariam: how she left her people and betook herself to a solitary place to the east.

TURN BACK THE CLOCK!

We sent to her Our spirit in the semblance of a full-grown man. And when she saw him she said: 'I take refuge in the Merciful from you! If you fear the Lord, (leave me and go your way).'

'I am the messenger of your Lord,' he replied, 'and have come to give you a holy son.'

'How shall I bear a child,' she answered, 'when I am not touched by man and not unchaste?'

'Thus it will be,' your Lord said: 'That is easy for Me. And We shall make him a sign to mankind and a mercy from Us. This is Our decree.'

Thereupon she conceived him, and retired to a far-off place. And when she felt the throes of childbirth she lay down by the trunk of a palm-tree, crying: 'Oh, would that I died before this and passed into oblivion!'

But (a voice) cried out to her: 'Do not despair. Your Lord has provided a brook that runs at your feet, and (if you) shake the trunk of this palm-tree it will drop fresh ripe dates upon you. Therefore eat and drink and rejoice, and should you meet any mortal say to him: "I have vowed a fast to the Merciful and will not speak with any man today."'

Carrying the child, she came to her people, who said to her: 'O Mariam, you have done an unusual thing. O sister of Harun, your father was never a man of evil, nor was your mother unchaste.'

She pointed to him. But they replied: 'How can we speak with a baby in the cradle?' (Whereupon) he said: 'I am the servant of Allah. He has given me the Book and made me a prophet. He made me blessed wherever I go, and He has commanded me to be steadfast in prayer and to give alms to the poor as long as I shall live. He has made me kind to my mother and not insolent, miserable. So peace be on me on the day I was born, and on the day I die; and may peace be upon me on the day when I shall be raised to life.'

Such was Isa, the son of Mariam. That is the (whole) truth, which they still doubt. Allah forbid that He Himself should beget a son! When He decrees a thing He only need say: 'Be,' and it is.

Allah is my Lord and your Lord: therefore serve Him. That is the right path.

Yet the sects are divided concerning Isa. But woe to the unbelievers when the grievous Day comes. How sharp will their sight and hearing be on the day when they appear before Us! Truly, the unbelievers are in the grossest error.

Forewarn them of that woeful day, when Our decrees shall be fulfilled whilst they heedlessly persist in unbelief. For We shall inherit the earth and all who dwell upon it. To Us, they shall return. [19:16–39]

The first thing which catches the attention of anyone familiar with the Bible is that this story bears no resemblance at all to the Gospel versions of Jesus' birth and that has been the basis of Christian claims that Muhammad had gained only a smattering of Christian teaching from local sources. However such claims are untenable, given that Muhammad had as much contact as he did with numerous Christian communities, that he must therefore have had a basic or elementary knowledge of the Gospel stories and would have known of the inconsistency of what he was dictating, and that he repeatedly exhorted everyone to study ‘The Book’, consisting of both the Old and the New Testament. One such reference is in Sura 5: “Say: ‘People of the Book, you shall not be guided until you observe the Torah and the Gospel and that which is revealed to you from your Lord.’” If local church communities were the only source of Muhammad’s understanding then it would be an even more damning indictment of the church of that era than the evidence which has already been noted. Similarly, if he were trying to promote an alternative version of the Gospel stories he would hardly tell people to go off and read them and act on them.

The importance of that passage lies in the fact that Muhammad was confirming – very clearly and very forcefully – one of the most fundamental and vital messages about the way in which God was communicating with humanity through the Jewish people. That message was, essentially, that Jesus was born by divine intervention; that Mary was a virgin at the time that she conceived; that she was a specially chosen and favoured servant of God; that Jesus was ordained by God as a sign and a blessing to mankind; that he lived a pure life free of vanity and sin; and that he died and was raised to life. Furthermore it carries the powerful message that anyone in the Jewish community who did not believe it – as a whole package – was in serious error. Some Muslim scholars and many Christian writers rely on later sources, other than the Qur’an, to suggest that Muhammad denied Jesus’ death and said that he was lifted, alive, to heaven, thus by-passing the question of the resurrection. Such a position cannot be supported on the basis of these sections of the Qur’an.

ON JUDGEMENT, SAINTS AND SINNERS

On the question of personal responsibility and judgement, Muhammad’s preaching left no room for purgatory, prayer to saints, or the worship of relics and idols. Together with priestly intercession these all brought a stern rebuke.

No mortal to whom Allah has given the Book and whom He has endowed with judgement and prophethood would say to men: ‘Worship me instead of Allah.’ But rather: ‘Be devoted servants of Allah, for you have taught the Book and you have studied.’ Nor would he enjoin you to serve the angels and the prophets as your gods; for would he enjoin you to be unbelievers after you have surrendered yourself to Allah? [3:79–80]

And warn with it those who dread to be brought before their Lord that they have no guardian or intercessor besides Allah, so that they may guard themselves against evil. Do not drive away those that call on their Lord morning and evening, seeking only to gain His favour. You are not by any means accountable for them, nor are they accountable for you. If you drive them away, you shall yourself become an evil-doer. [6:51]

TURN BACK THE CLOCK!

Avoid those who treat faith as a sport and a pastime and are seduced by the life of this world. Admonish them hereby lest a soul be damned by its own sins. It has no guardian or intercessor besides Allah: and though it offers every ransom, it shall not be accepted from it. Such are those that are damned by their deeds. They shall drink boiling water and be sternly punished for their unbelief. [6:70]

The places of worship are built for Allah's worship; invoke in them no other (god) besides Him. When His servant rose to pray to Him, they pressed round him in multitudes.

Say: 'I will pray to my Lord and associate none with Him.'

Say: 'I have no control over any good or evil that befalls you.'

Say: 'None can protect me from Allah, nor can I find any refuge besides Him. (My mission is) only to make known His messages; those that disobey Allah and His Apostle shall abide for ever in the fire of Hell.' [72:17-23]

The sharp contrast between Muhammad's message and the teachings of Augustine and Gregory, and the conduct of the church during the previous several centuries, was clear for everyone to see. In view of what we now know about the church's self-understanding and conduct we should not be surprised at the way it responded to the challenge of Muhammad's message, even if we are dismayed. But we should not lose sight of the fact that Muhammad left no room for the Jews to misinterpret their fate for having failed to accept Jesus as the foreshadowed Messiah, either.

THE PEOPLE OF THE BOOK AND MUHAMMAD'S SELF-UNDERSTANDING

O believers, be Allah's helpers. When Isa the son of Mariam said to the disciples: 'Who will come with me to the help of Allah?' they replied: 'We are Allah's helpers.'

Some of the Children of Israel believed in him while others did not. We aided the believers against their enemies and they triumphed over them. [61:14]

Say: 'People of the Book, why do you deny the revelations of Allah? He bears witness to all your actions.' [3:98]

[Unbelievers] have incurred the wrath of Allah and have been utterly humbled: because they disbelieved His revelations and slew His prophets unjustly; and because they were rebels and transgressors.

Yet they are not all alike. There are among the People of the Book some upright men who all night long recite the revelations of Allah and pray; who believe in Allah and the Last Day; who enjoin justice and forbid evil and vie with each other in good works. These are righteous men: whatever good they do, shall not be denied them. Allah knows the righteous.

TURN BACK THE CLOCK!

As for the unbelievers, neither their riches nor their children shall in the least protect them from Allah. They are the people of the Fire, and there they shall remain for ever. The wealth they spend in this world is like a freezing wind that smites the harvest of men who have wronged themselves, laying them waste. Allah has not wronged them; but they wrong themselves. [3:112–117]

Contrary to the belief promoted by the church and widely held among Christians, Muhammad did not see himself as on the same plane as Jesus. He understood himself to be an additional prophet, coming after Jesus to confirm Jesus' Messiahship and the word of Allah. He knew that he would be accused of being a false prophet and an impostor and the following passage shows that he also understood very clearly the personal consequences of false prophesy.

... The revelation of the Book is from Allah, the Mighty One, the Wise One. [46:1]

When Our clear revelations are recited to them, the unbelievers say of the truth: 'This is plain magic.' Do they say: 'He has invented it himself?'

Say: 'If I have indeed invented it, then there is nothing you can do to protect me from (the wrath) of Allah. He well knows what you say about it. He is an all-sufficient witness between me and you. He is the Benignant One, the Merciful.'

Say: 'I am no prodigy among the apostles; nor do I know what will be done with me or you. I follow only what is revealed to me, and my only duty is to give plain warning.' [46:7–9]

And again:

Muhammad is no more than an apostle: other apostles have passed away before him. If he die or is slain, will you recant? He that recants will do no harm to Allah. But Allah will reward the thankful. [3:143–144]

TOTAL SUBMISSION

The aspect of Muhammad's teaching which is best known among Christians is the apparent severity of his call for total submission to the will of God, from which the name of his religious renewal movement was taken. He is portrayed as preaching a God of harsh judgement, almost unforgiving. This is understandable in view of the fact that his task was to call the church back into line and to give plain warning to those responsible for the contamination of the Messianic message with Trinitarian theology, Mariology, and with a lot of priestly paraphernalia and other erroneous distractions. The most severe passages are directed not at those who had to carry millstones around their necks but at those who placed them there: the religious leaders and teachers. It is also understandable in terms of the situation in which he was preaching: the conflict, corruption and social disorder. After all, and it bears repeating, his role was not to deliver the Messianic message of God's love and the promise of Salvation for all mankind but to confirm that it had already been delivered through Jesus of Nazareth. It is no wonder the Church didn't take very kindly to his message. Similarly, it is not surprising that the Jews did not take kindly to it either. They were repeatedly rebuked for failing to accept Jesus as Messiah. The term ‘unbeliever’ is used in the Qur’an basically to describe two groups: the Jews who did not accept Jesus as Messiah, and the Christians who claimed that Jesus, the Messiah, was son of God, equal to God or coexistent with God.

However, to portray Muhammad’s message with such a heavy emphasis on judgement is to do both the prophet and his message an injustice. The message of love and forgiveness comes through loud and clear when one is prepared to listen. Almost every Sura begins with the expression “In the name of Allah, the Compassionate, the Merciful.” It is as if the Reformed Churches have paraphrased that Qur’anic expression in their widely used catch phrase “God is Love.” And quite apart from the often repeated Qur’anic command to read and live by the Gospel of Jesus, there are passages such as Sura 93 entitled “Daylight.”

By the light of day, and by the night when it falls, your Lord has not forsaken you, nor does He abhor you.

The life to come holds a richer prize for you than this present life. Surely your Lord will give you what will please you.

Did He not find you an orphan and give you shelter?

Did He not find you wandering and guide you?

Did He not find you poor and enrich you?

Therefore do not oppress the orphan, nor drive away the beggar. But proclaim the bounty of your Lord. [93:1–11]

As the circumstances of his ministry show quite clearly, Muhammad was working and preaching under enormous pressure. Try as he might to stick strictly to unembellished elements of faith and teaching, he found that if he was going to maintain the momentum of his response to God’s call it was impossible to avoid syncretism and the adoption of practices which gave his movement a regional identity. In his impatience to push on he went the way of the early Christian church.

He adopted the Nestorian Christian practice of praying on his knees with his head bowed to the ground. And who could criticize that? There are few more humble postures.

JERUSALEM AND MECCA

A key practice which Muhammad introduced was that of turning to face in the direction of Jerusalem during prayer. This was probably after his vision of Jerusalem and a heavenly encounter with Allah, Jesus, the prophets, Moses and Abraham, set at about 620, but this is uncertain. It may have simply been in recognition of the fact that Jerusalem is the holy city of the continuing Yahwist tradition of which he knew himself to be a part. However, politics subsequently had a great deal to do with his decision to adopt Mecca as the focal point of prayer and religious observance in place of Jerusalem.

Muhammad was responding to the growing Arab nationalism which was pressing in around him and the change, in effect, completed the Arabization of his movement. It certainly made the capture of Mecca a lot easier in 630 and drew many additional tribes into allegiance with him. In addition he may have been actively snubbing the Jews. He had, until then, been trying to imitate the basic forms of their services of worship, probably in recognition of the fact that it was their community which had become the basic vehicle for divine revelation. But many of them regarded him as an impostor with a very inferior knowledge of Judaism and their contempt for his claims and his services of worship was very thinly concealed. He soon realized that it was not only counterproductive to try to imitate them, but that to do so also locked him into a defensive position in which he had to justify or explain the incompleteness of his knowledge of their practices. He could not avoid establishing distinctive practices. He developed prayer, almsgiving, fasting and public devotion as Muslim practices. In doing that, he was, as much as he wanted to avoid it, establishing a new and competitive religious tradition.

Again, if he was to gain the confidence of the bulk of the pagan nomadic tribesmen and the merchant class he had to avoid changing their lifestyle and their religious habits more than necessary. The annual pilgrimages to their shrines gave him an excellent opportunity to gain their support. He declared the pilgrimage to be a Muslim practice and the Ka'ba at Mecca to be a holy shrine of Islam. In step with Christianity all the way to the Pantheon!

Expansion of his young movement at such a pace was bound to bring Muhammad into conflict with the powers and tribes who didn't care for his ideas. It did. That was one justification for him to build an army around himself. But expansion requires expansion to sustain itself like industrial expansion and inflation. There is no stopping any of them once they reach a certain pace, without pulling the supports out from under them.

JUSTIFICATION

On top of that, Muhammad preached justification by support of the faith, as well as a concept much like the Christian concept of justification by faith. This was all that was needed to attract tribes of vigorous warlike nomads to his faith and his banner and to provide the forces which would sweep both Islam and the Arab Empire, or vice versa, across the Persian and Byzantine empires within a few years of the prophet's death.

Believers, have fear of Allah and seek the means by which you get His favor. Fight valiantly for His cause, so that you may triumph. [5:35]

However Christians should not be too concerned about the tone of that message. Non-Christians have just as much reason to be concerned about the words of hymns such as 'Onward Christian soldiers marching as to war,' or 'Soldiers of Christ arise, and put your armour on,' or whatever else the Crusaders sung as they slaughtered their way through Jerusalem and a host of other places.

Permission (to take up arms) is hereby given to those who are attacked, because they have been wronged. Allah has power to grant them victory: those who have been unjustly driven from their homes, only because they said: 'Our Lord is Allah.' Had Allah not repelled some men by the might of others, the monasteries and churches, the synagogues and mosques in which Allah's name is frequently remembered, would have been utterly destroyed. But whoever helps Allah shall be helped by Him. Allah is truly Powerful and Mighty: (He will assuredly help) those who, once made masters in the lands, will attend to their prayers and pay the alms-tax, enjoin justice and forbid evil. Allah controls the destiny of all things. [22:39–41]

This passage, with references to the divine defence of places of worship of each of Christianity, Judaism and Islam makes it perfectly clear that Muhammad's mission and personal intention was not to supplant one or both of his partners in Abrahamic faith, but to complement them and clarify or clean up those aspects of their theology and practices in which they had been side-tracked – or had run right off the rails – and which were therefore subverting or reducing their capacity and their ability to act in accordance with divine will and to fulfill the purposes for which they were established. His supreme confidence in the absolute, unqualified and unqualifiable supremacy of God and God's ultimate control of all things is illustrated by the final sentence of that passage: "Allah controls the destiny of all things." That leads us directly into consideration of the Night Journey.

THE NIGHT JOURNEY

Here we have what may appear to be an anomaly in Islam and Muhammad's teaching. While he was systematically dismantling the non-Gospel based practices and teachings of Christianity such as Mariology, idolatry, priestly intercession, purgatory and, above all, the Doctrine of the Trinity, he introduced a doctrine of predestination which is very similar to the views of Augustine. Islam teaches complete submission to God's will, and that is usually taken by Christian observers to mean submission in terms of obedience to both the revealed scriptures, and God's will as it may be interpreted by believers from time to time. In view of Muhammad's emphasis on justice and mercy it therefore comes as surprise to read passages such as:

He whom Allah guides is rightly guided, but he whom Allah leaves in error shall surely be lost.

We have predestined for Hell many jinn and many men. They have hearts, yet they cannot understand; eyes, yet they do not see; and ears, yet they do not hear. They are like cattle – indeed, they are the more misguided. Such are the heedless. [7:178–180]

People in the West are generally comfortable with the idea that God 'guides,' but they are less comfortable with the idea that God might predestine them to eternal damnation in Hell, and they have come under the influence of translations such as that of Dawood in which the words

‘he who is led astray’ are used instead of ‘he whom Allah leaves in error’. The words “leaves in error,” indicate a deliberate decision on the part of God not to intervene to prevent an action which is contrary to the normal understanding of scripture. This clearly indicates uninhibited human freewill or choice in decisions to be made. It helps make sense of the concept of divine judgement, and it also indicates that salvation is not automatic for a believer who disregards the obligations implicit in being a believer. When that is related to the use of the term “rightly guided” in a positive sense, it suggests that the word “predestined,” when used in conjunction with a passage to Hell, indicates that a framework of judgement is in place and a person is predestined by the nature of a personal decision to err which falls within that framework. The idea that a divine decision has been taken in advance and that the life of a person has been decided in advance or ‘programmed’ so that he or she will take a definite action or adopt a particular position because God has prescribed it, is not consistent with the concept that God may leave a person in error.

However, the use of the words “led astray” in the Dawood translation in place of “leaves in error” indicates direct intervention by God to ensure a definite action contrary to the normal understanding of scripture. It places both terms (‘led astray’ and ‘predestined’) in the same context, denoting positive decisions by God in relation to human action and fate, and indicating that a definite action is to be taken, or a position is to be adopted, or a fate is to be fulfilled as prescribed by God. It therefore makes an understanding of the Night Journey much more difficult because of the implicit denial of human freewill.

In the circumstances, and given the subtleties of language, it is no wonder that scholars have struggled with such passages for years, and that they have had a profound impact on many communities of Muslims, tending to encourage acceptance of situations and actions by other people which might otherwise not have been tolerated. This sense of reluctance to challenge the authority of employers, others in superior positions, or governments is clearly not peculiar to Islam. It occurs among people of other religions as well, and in some circumstances employers and governments have been quick to exploit it. Notable among such situations was the readiness of employers in Britain and the colonies to take advantage of the religious ethics of Calvinism and early Methodism to exploit industrial workers, (especially but not only industrial workers), who saw it as a Christian’s responsibility to accept and tolerate the circumstances of whatever subordinate or menial positions they held, and whatever were the prevailing working conditions. There was an anomaly in the special appeal of Wesley’s ministry to that section of the population and the way in which it could, for a time, be exploited.

The most widely accepted understanding of that passage on predestination in the approved Zayid translation, as quoted, appears to be that although each individual action is not foreordained, the individual goes in the direction of that action and “acquires” it by identifying with it in earlier actions of self-will, and so becomes responsible for it.²² However, when it is related to passages from the Night Journey it begins to take on special significance. The key passage in the approved translation reads:

TURN BACK THE CLOCK!

The works of each man We have bound about his neck. On the Day of Resurrection, We shall confront him with a book spread wide open, (saying): ‘Read your book. Enough for you this day that your own soul should call you to account.’

He that seeks guidance shall be guided to his own advantage, but he that errs shall err at his own peril. No soul shall bear another’s burden. Nor do We punish until we have sent forth an apostle.

When We resolve to annihilate a town, We first command those that live in luxury (to obey Us). But they transgress therein. Thus the sentence is justly pronounced against it and We utterly destroy it.

How many generations have We destroyed since Nuh’s time! It is sufficient that your Lord knows and sees His servant’s sins. [17:13–17]

When the words “he that errs shall err at his own peril” are linked with the words “the works of each man We have bound about his neck” it indicates that one’s fate is influenced, or determined, by the record of one’s works. This is consistent with the idea in the passages quoted above of a person who has ‘erred’ being ‘predestined’ to Hell, but it does not preclude the idea of a ‘review’ by God, the Merciful and Compassionate. In fact that idea of a ‘review’ by God, the Merciful and Compassionate, is quite specifically referred to in a later verse in the same sura, the Night Journey.

Say: “Sufficient is Allah as a witness between me and you. He knows and observes His servants.”

Those whom Allah guides are rightly guided; but those who He leaves in error shall find no friend besides Him. We shall gather them all on the Day of Resurrection, prostrate upon their faces, deaf, dumb, and blind. Hell shall be their abode: whenever its flames die down, We will rekindle them into a greater fire. [17:96–97]

The words “those who He leaves in error shall find no friend besides Him” is as clear and definite a statement as one will find that compassion and judgement go hand in hand in God’s dealings with humanity – individually as well as on a whole-of-humanity basis. But it is equally clear and definite from the words which follow that the promise of God’s compassion is not to be taken as a ‘let out’ for a last minute pang of conscience, rites of indulgence, absolution or any other form of earthly penance. God alone will determine the status of human repentance, and the clap of thunder of divine judgement is firmly in place: “We shall gather them all on the Day of Resurrection ... Hell shall be their abode ...”

However, the Dawood translation uses the word “fate” instead of “works” and changes the whole complexion of that particular passage of the Night Journey. The use of the word “fate” corresponds with the use of the words “led astray” in relation to the concept of predestination in the previous passage quoted, and it makes an understanding of the Night Journey more difficult. A reader may well ask: “If one’s fate has been predetermined and is hung around one’s neck like a millstone, what room is there for freewill? What point is there in seeking guidance or responding to that guidance? What point is there in talking of repentance and acceptance by a loving and compassionate God?” So, as we consider the significance of the Night Journey it is the words of the approved translation, as quoted, which we should have in mind.

The Sura of the Qur'an titled The Night Journey, of which the passages now quoted are only a small portion, reflects the theme of a vision of a journey by the prophet in company with the angel Gabriel "from the Sacred Temple to the Farther Temple" and sets down revelation received by Muhammad during that vision. In relation to that vision the Qur'an deals strictly with Allah's commands and revelation to Muhammad. However extended versions were recorded by colleagues who discussed the vision with the prophet. These included a great deal of detail about preparation for the journey with the angel Gabriel, and meetings with Jesus, the prophets, Moses, Abraham and other figures of Jewish history. In turn these versions have been subject to embellishment and mythology so that in the versions available to us today it is impossible to be certain where the vision as dictated by Muhammad and later myths begin and end. In fact some Muslim commentators do not regard the incident as a vision but as literal history, and when one is concerned with understanding its meaning it matters little whether it was an inspired vision or an historical event. Actually, Christians who accept as facts the death, resurrection and return of the Messiah – or all those who accept other supernatural events such as the appearance of Moses and Elijah with Jesus in the Transfiguration (Mark 9:2–8), Jesus' appearances to the disciples in locked rooms in Jerusalem (John 20:19–29) or the events of Pentecost (Acts 2:1–36) – should be very careful in entering the debate at all, unless it is to support the proposition. They may find themselves contradicting their own beliefs in supernatural occurrences and denying the absolute and never ending power of God to exercise divine intervention.

A FOCUS FOR CONTROVERSY

What is important is that the Night Journey is central to the controversy between Jews and Muslims. It is the basis of the annual Muslim festival of the Night of the Prophet's Ascension. It provides a direct basis for Muslim attachment to the Holy City of Jerusalem and it was the most important reason for the erection of the magnificent Qubbat al-Sakhra Mosque, known as the Dome of the Rock, in 691, together with the adjacent much larger al-Aqsa Mosque. The Dome of the Rock sits directly on the site of the former King Solomon's Temple on Mount Moriah. It encompasses the rock regarded by the devout of both faiths as the centre of the world, and which carries a mark said to be the hoof mark of the beast which carried Muhammad to heaven with Gabriel on the Night Journey.

While the political and interfaith considerations which flow from this situation are enormous, the extended story of the Night Journey is very important on its own account even though it has not been included in the Qur'an.²³ It has much the same character as the final book in the New Testament, the Book of Revelation, which most Christians are content to leave in the too-hard basket. So! When we look at the Qur'an's pronouncements on predestination against that background we may see them in a different light.

The key passage in the Night Journey is a prophetic pronouncement on the fate of the Jewish community in the event that the community, as a whole, were to 'return to mischief' or again transgress against its neighbours. There have been times when Christians have sought to exploit it on the gross misunderstanding that it is a simple piece of anti-Jewish rhetoric and it became a very convenient addition to the church's anti-Semitic armoury. But now, in the twentieth century, we are concerned with the need to understand that prophecy in the contemporary context, taking into consideration events which occurred during the century just past.

The Night Journey is quite specifically directed to the Jews as a community. It is not a general statement warning humanity-at-large of divine retribution for breaking divine laws, nor does it provide an example to illustrate the concept that 'punishment should fit the crime.' It is therefore necessary to look at the word 'transgress' in the context of the Covenant of Sinai. But first, the key passage from the Night Journey.

We gave Musa [Moses] the Book and made it a guide for the Children of Israel (enjoining): 'Take no other guardian than Myself. (You are) the descendants of those whom We carried in the Ark with Nuh. [Noah] He was a truly thankful servant.'

And We declared to the Children of Israel in the Book: 'Twice you shall commit evil in the land. You shall become great transgressors.'

And when the first of the two declarations came to be fulfilled, We sent against you a mighty (group) of Our servants who ravaged your land. And it was an accomplished threat.

Then We granted you the other round against them and aided you with wealth and children, and made you increase in number. (We said): 'If you do good, it shall be to your own advantage; but if you do evil, you shall sin against yourselves.'

And when the second proclamation came to pass, (We raised another people) to afflict you and to enter the Mosque as they entered it the first time and utterly destroy whatever they conquered.

It may be that Allah will have mercy on you. But if you return (to mischief), We will return (with punishment). We have made Hell a prison-house for the unbelievers.

This Qur'an will guide to that which is most upright. It promises the believers who do good works a rich reward, and threatens those who deny the life to come with a grievous scourge. Yet man prays for evil as fervently as he prays for good. Truly, man is ever hasty.
[17:2-11] ^{24 25}

The first two armies which were sent to afflict the Jews are taken to be the Assyrians and the Romans.²⁶ Then, after the second dispersion of the Jews at the hands of the Romans in 135 there was no opportunity for such a transgression by the Jewish people as a nation or no circumstances in which such transgression could occur until the twentieth century.

The most significant fact about the Night Journey, however, is not that it was a prophesy that a third transgression would take place. Rather, the prophesy related to the consequences for the Jewish community if a third transgression occurred. It therefore follows that if a third transgression had not occurred, the consequences would not have been triggered and the prophecy would have remained an interesting topic for discussion among scholars of religion – much like the New Testament Book of Revelation – unfulfilled. The fact of a prophecy of the consequences of a third transgression indicate that, contrary to the church's long-held claim, the people of Judaism were not shut out of the divine plan that humanity should live in peace and harmony, and that, as a community, they were predestined to continue in their role as an instrument of God's will. This is consistent with Hebrew self-understanding that its people, as a community, are called to live according to divine guidelines and, in doing so, to lead humanity to an understanding of its relationship with God.

This is reinforced by the fact that the prophecy of the Night Journey was delivered in the context of the religious understanding of the Jewish community and its obligations. The terms 'transgress' and 'transgressor' must therefore be interpreted in the light of the unique role of the Jewish people and the covenants which bound them to God. Those covenants, and in particular the fourth, which is commonly known as the Covenant of Sinai, lost none of their significance by the fact of the birth and ministry of Jesus of Nazareth and the establishment of the Christian Church, nor by the subsequent fact of the ministry of the Prophet Muhammad and the establishment of Islam.

As the church progressively developed its own self-understanding and its links into the state structures of the day it claimed that the Covenant of Sinai was null and void as a consequence of the Jews' failure to recognize Jesus of Nazareth as Messiah, and that the New Covenant had superseded it. However Muhammad never made any such suggestion. In fact his utterance of the prophesy of the Night Journey is the most dynamic confirmation of its continuing relevance that there could possibly be. Similarly, there is no record that Jesus regarded the Covenant of Sinai as having been repudiated by God. He simply added another one, confirming at the same time that the Law and the Prophets remained valid for ever! (Matthew 5:17–19) He had no argument with Zechariah, the father of John the Baptist, who had said, in reference to the coming Messianic ministry: "Blessed be the Lord, the God of Israel ... (who) ... shows mercy to our ancestors, thus he remembers his holy covenant, the oath he swore to our father Abraham ..." (Luke 1:68–73) Certainly, Jesus was trenchantly critical of some Jewish authorities and their practices, as shown by the way in which he harangued the scribes and Pharisees, (Matthew 23) and he promised the people of Jerusalem: "...you shall not see me any more until you say: 'Blessings on him who comes in the name of the Lord!'" (Matthew 23:37–39. Emphasis added.) But he did not say: "Your covenant (or our covenant) has been repudiated." Neither did the Apostle Paul. Writing about the Abrahamic covenants he said that no law could make God's promise meaningless and added: "If you inherit something as a legal right, it does not come to you as the result of a promise, and it was precisely in the form of a promise that God made his gift to Abraham." (Galatians 3:10–18)

It is within this context that we must look at the implications of the Night Journey. We shall look at several points in sequence.

But, before that, there is another matter of prophesy – not generated within the Islamic or the Christian streams but within Judaism itself during the Christian Era – which relates directly to the Night Journey and must be seen in context with it. It is the understanding of the circumstances in which the state of Israel would be re-established, in due course, which was expressed by the Spanish Jewish scholar, Maimonides, about six hundred years after Muhammad. We shall come to the details of Maimonides' life and teaching soon enough, and in due course we shall examine in detail the way in which the two matters interlocked during the twentieth century. But, briefly, Maimonides foresaw that the Jewish community would be relieved of its enforced dispersion and that a state of Israel would be established in association with a war of Gog and Magog, after which humanity would move towards a better understanding of its relationship with God, and the Messianic Era of peace and harmony, or stability, would be ushered in.

Now: the several points concerning the predestination of the Jewish community that flow from the Night Journey.

A MATTER OF TRANSGRESSION ...

As noted, one important aspect of that act of predestination prophesied in the Qur'anic Night Journey, for which the Prophet Muhammad was the vehicle, is that the Jewish community might, in due course, transgress against its neighbours. If they did so, the most conspicuous aspect of the prophecy, the 'penal clause,' would come into effect.

Those aspects are straight forward enough, but a significant factor in the Jewish community's role as an instrument of divine intervention, is that its experience of transgression and suffering served a wider divine purpose. At critical times during Hebrew history divine intervention has been clearly recognizable. The Jewish people have been party to, or have been subject to, events in a manner which appeared to be beyond their control. This is illustrated in Jeremiah in which we are told that the Babylonians, having been an instrument for judgement against Israel, then rejected the opportunity to learn from and to recognize the understanding of God which was held by the people who were then under bondage to them. They abused their authority and suffered overthrow themselves at the hands of their neighbours. That mechanism of judgement is not restricted to nations or communities of believers. Jeremiah also made that clear in discussing relations between the twin pagan powers, Egypt and Babylon.

This brings us to a third aspect or implication of the prophecy. The Jewish community was predestined to act as the focus of divine intervention in the event that the dominant power or powers of the time – at some future point – would act in a manner which justified such divine intervention against them to protect the human rights of other peoples.

In other words, the Night Journey confirmed that the mechanism for divine judgement against powers was not changing from that which is illustrated in numerous situations in the Old Testament. Conduct which led to broken relationships because of the abuse of one people by another incurred judgement which involved eventual retaliation by the aggrieved people, or intervention by another power, with the role of Jewish community, as the People of God's Covenant, being to act as a focal point for such events. But this implies a further aspect of the prophecy, the fourth.

As a community of faith the Jewish community was to be – is still to be – a body or an instrument through which the continuity and the nature of Divine Law could be demonstrated for all humanity to see and to understand without there being rigid rules of conduct or restrictions imposed on humanity which would contradict the God-given human capacity and opportunity to make value judgements and decisions, and to act in total free will.

At the time that the prophecy of the Night Journey was delivered, and as time passed, it was easy for the church to ignore the entire prophecy, and especially the third and subsequent aspects. It certainly did not wish to recognize them because to do so implied recognizing the validity of the whole of Muhammad's ministry. That was totally unacceptable. When it chose to give it any validity at all, it chose to interpret only the first two aspects which supported or justified the church's claims that the Jews were rejected, lost, and gone for ever and it was therefore able to treat the prophecy as justification for the church's anti-Semitism. They could then go the next step and interpret the prophecy to mean that God was simply saying to the Jews: "You have forsaken me. Put your foot out of line and I, Yahweh, will jump on it." This gave the church the justification it wanted for 'jumping on it' anyway because, in its erroneous self-understanding, it was the exclusive and divinely appointed representative on earth of God and therefore entitled to act on that authority as it saw fit. If God wanted the Jews punished it was very happy to oblige!

... BY TWO OF THE PARTNERS

In due course the dominant Christian powers of the world community – the amorphous Christian gel – did fail, miserably, in their particular responsibility, with enormous transgressions against both the world at large, during the European Colonial Era, and the Jewish communities of Europe. This placed the Jewish community in the situation envisaged in the prophecy. Consequently it transgressed against the people living in the region of Palestine in which it chose to re-establish a national home, and a critical aspect of its predestination – the penal clause – came into play. It cannot be regarded as directly a penalty for failing to act on the Messianic message. That failure or, as the church puts it, rejection of the Messiah, is the reason which the church has always given to justify its anti-Semitism. It is important to recognize the difference between rejection, failure to recognize and disbelief. Few people would dispute that some of the Jewish authorities rejected Jesus outright. Others did not, and there was considerable confusion and politicking. It is noteworthy that the Qur'anic term which describes the people and their overall response translates as 'unbelievers' which implies scepticism and disbelief rather than rejection. But it is not a crime to fail to recognize something or somebody, or to fail to understand something, or to be unable to accept something as a belief. Those are only matters of human frailty or human response. The penalty is associated with the transgression against an obligation under the Divine Covenant

It is natural for Western Christians to think of 'transgression' in terms of the dominant Western philosophy and legal framework of the current or immediate past decades, and to think of offences under a criminal law code or some other rigid statute. But because of the way our laws have been framed, it has often been possible to abuse one's neighbour's civil rights or rights concerning the use of land, or to prevent them from enjoying the benefits of a normal relationship or a facility which should be generally available, and to do these things in such a way that they do not constitute an indictable offence. Similarly, it is very easy indeed for people to act in a belligerent manner, to withhold a welcome or to make life so difficult that neighbours feel so unwanted, so distressed, so fearful for their personal safety that they have no real option than to withdraw from the community, leave, sell their property and even migrate. Such conduct may not constitute an offence against a statute of parliament, but it certainly contravenes the spirit of compassion and brotherly love which is supposed to underpin our system.

In other words, personal or communal conduct may be quite oppressive and against the spirit of a law or the obligations of a covenant without being against the letter of the law. In addition there is another consideration. Like beauty, transgression is very much in the eye of the beholder, especially when conflicts of interest are involved. An action or a campaign by one community against another may be described by the one carrying it out, or by an outsider, as legitimate and defensive. But to the one against which it is carried out, or to a different outsider, it may not be at all legitimate. It may be offensive or oppressive. And if one of the outsiders has an interest in the effects or the outcome of the action, then its view will be greatly influenced by that interest. In view of these issues, if we think in contemporary legalistic terms we are distracted from the wider implications of broken community and interfaith relations.

SINAI: A COVENANT FOR ALL TIME!

Now, the Covenant of Sinai. Tradition tells us that the entire Jewish nation was released from bondage in Egypt some time during the thirteenth century BCE, or earlier, and that it trekked for several months through the wilderness of the Sinai Peninsula under the leadership of Moses before the people pitched camp at the foot of Mount Sinai. There is no certainty – in fact there is disagreement and confusion – about the number of people involved, the route they took, and when the release and the trek took place. Some scholars argue that only a few thousand people were involved in a series of such treks over a long period. Others maintain that one mass exodus occurred and that it involved up to 600,000 men in a total population of up to two million. That is a scenario which is extremely hard to support in the known circumstances of the time.²⁷ However the details are not important. We can accept that at some stage an encampment occurred at Mt. Sinai and that the Jewish emigrants must have been rather despondent and wandering what their future held, even though they had set out in an atmosphere of expectation. Within a few days, after a traumatic experience of direct divine intervention they realized that they had been set apart from the rest of the world – permanently. Moses had delivered to them a message from God.

“... if you obey my voice and hold fast to my covenant, you of all the nations shall be my very own for all the earth is mine. I will count you a kingdom of priests, a consecrated nation.”
(Exodus 19:5–6)

They were within the world community, certainly, and a vital part of it, but set apart – permanently. No time limits. No ‘contract variations.’ No repudiation. No release. Moses had also delivered the main ‘strings’ which went with that divine promise: the Decalogue, or the Ten Commandments. Subsequently those strings were fleshed out with more details, conditions and requirements which, together made up the Jewish Law, known as the Torah, which is contained in the books of the Pentateuch or the first section of the Hebrew Bible.

That Jewish community had been set apart in the sense that it was the first to recognize and to proclaim the uniqueness of God, the immutability of divine law and their irreversible obligation to respond to it – through having been confronted by the Divine Reality. God alone was to be worshipped. Not the founders of the faith or successive generations of prophets. They were simply instruments of the Divine Will. Not the Ark of the Covenant which they were instructed to build to contain the Testimony of the Covenant. That was to be the focal point of worship and a constant reminder of their obligations under the Covenant. It was not to be the object of worship. And certainly neither was the law. That was simply to be obeyed in response to the Covenant. As Meir Meiseles states when discussing the mission of Israel:

[They] handed down their traditions of moral excellency to their descendants. On this account the Jewish people were singled out as G-d’s people with a mission to themselves and the world. By their conduct they set an example to the nations, and through their Dispersion the knowledge of G-d’s word was willy nilly spread to the furthestmost corners of the earth.

The privilege of being Chosen, has carried with it a grave responsibility from the very moment our ancestors accepted the Torah on Sinai. This consciousness of our special role as guardian of the Divine law has been regarded as a sign of His love and affection. ... The uniqueness of G-d is paralleled by the uniqueness of Israel. It bespeaks a relationship of mutual uniqueness.²⁸

In that context we now turn again to the Night Journey. As noted, the first two armies which were sent to afflict the Jews are taken to be the Assyrians and the Romans.²⁹ Then, after the second dispersion of the Jews at the hands of the Romans in 135 there was no opportunity for such a transgression by the Jewish people as a nation or no circumstances in which such transgression could occur until the twentieth century. Circumstances then changed as a result of the oppression of Jews in Christian Europe. That oppression provided the stimulus and the justification for the establishment of the World Zionist Organization which became the organizational base to plan for, and to establish, a substantial new Jewish community, relieved of a ghetto environment, which ultimately became the State of Israel. That oppression of the Jewish community by a church which had lost its way, and the need for relief therefore also led to, or stimulated, the potential and the opportunity for communal or corporate transgression in the terms of the ongoing Covenant of Sinai and the Night Journey. That potential for transgression need not have been developed into a reality. The Jewish community was under a continuing obligation under the Covenant of Sinai to ensure that it did not become a reality, and its own teaching and history clearly indicated the consequences of a breach of the Covenant. The preamble to the statement of the Covenant reads:

Moses then went up to God, and Yahweh called to him from the mountain, saying: ‘Say this to the House of Jacob, declare this to the sons of Israel, “You yourselves have seen what I did to the Egyptians, how I carried you on eagle’s wings and brought you to myself. From this you will know that if you obey my voice and hold fast to my covenant, you of all the nations shall be my very own for all the earth is mine. I will count you a kingdom of priests, a consecrated nation.” (Exodus 19:3–6. Emphasis added.)

There is no ambiguity in those words. Recognition as “a kingdom of priests, a consecrated nation” is conditional upon obedience. But the permanence of the Covenant is not said to be conditional: only the status and recognition. And in the context of rebellion when the migrants rose against their own leaders because of the difficulty they were going to have in settling the area selected for them, Moses attributed to God the words:

“Yahweh is slow to anger and rich in graciousness, forgiving faults and transgression, and yet letting nothing go unchecked, punishing the father’s fault in the sons to the third and fourth generation.” (Numbers 14:18)

Similarly there is no ambiguity in those words. Punishment for breeches of the Covenant will certainly be imposed but, again, there is no suggestion that the permanence of the Covenant is affected. This leads us to the question of which obligations under the Covenant of Sinai and the Torah became critical in the context of the pressure which the Jewish community was under to convert the potential for transgression into reality, breeches of which, as a consequence, triggered a phase of punishment. They concern neighbours. The first two are from the Decalogue, Exodus 20:13 & 17. The third is from the Book of the Covenant, Exodus 22:20.

You shall not kill.

You shall not covet your neighbour’s house ... or anything that is his.

“You must not molest the stranger or oppress him, for you lived as strangers in the land of Egypt.”

And from the Prophets, an injunction from Ezekiel, often regarded as the most influential prophet of the period of the Babylonian Exile. Ezekiel laid down guidelines for the way in which the land of Judah should be apportioned between the tribes after their return from exile, he then said:

You are to share out this land among yourselves, between the tribes of Israel. You are to divide it into inheritances for yourselves and the aliens settled among you who have begotten children with you, since you are to treat them as citizens of Israel. They are to draw lots with you for their inheritance, with the tribes of Israel. You must give the alien his inheritance in the tribe in which he is living – it is the Lord Yahweh who speaks. (Ezekiel 47:21–23. Emphasis added)

As we shall see, the Jewish community's transgression against the people of Palestine was circumstantial. It lost its patience, or its confidence in God, and responded in self-defence, and out of self-interest, to the oppressive pressure of the dominant community and, in doing so, it transgressed against its neighbours.

But the fact that it acted under provocation does not negate the fact that its transgression was deliberate. Zionist leaders were acting in a manner which they perceived to be in the best interests of their people. It can be argued that they had no option: that they did not have the power or the capacity to influence or redirect world affairs in a way which would have made their action unnecessary. But if that is the case, then the lack of option means that they were predestined to take the action which they did. If they did have an option, then they were not predestined to act in the way they did. Our reading of history as it unfolds will confirm that they did have options and that they made a deliberate decision to act in the manner in which they did – a manner which was not in accord with the Covenant. Therefore they were not predestined to take the particular action which they took in imposing the establishment of a Jewish settlement on their neighbours in Palestine. Their predestination relates only to their role as the people through whom humanity is to be enabled to better understand its relationship with God. But our reading of history as it unfolds will also confirm that whichever decision, or action, they took would ultimately have had similar effects. The route would have been different, certainly slower, and probably more tortuous. But the ultimate result would have been essentially the same: a revision of the relationship between the oppressive powers of the amorphous Christian gel and the rest of the world; relief for the oppressed peoples outside that gel; and progressive movement towards a better understanding of humanity's relationship with God.

By transgressing, and triggering the Holocaust of Hitler's Mein Kampf as the enactment of the Night Journey, the Jewish community led the world along the track it took, of which decolonization was one aspect. If it had not transgressed, but had overcome its frustration at being subjected to oppression by the church and Christian Europe, pursued its obligations under the Covenant of Sinai, and taken an even more positive role in community leadership, education, science and the development of socio-economic policy it may have averted the catastrophe which befell it during the second quarter of the twentieth century. Its role in guiding humanity more smoothly towards new relationships between peoples, a new understanding of its relationship with God, and a socio-economic environment less subject to the critical contemporary impact of globalization may have been less of a challenge than it now is. Its role has not changed. Only the route. An alternative route is now open to it in quite a different way because of the circumstances which evolved out of the unrecognized parody of Mein Kampf.

However if it were to choose not to go down that route, we can anticipate an extension, or a repeat performance, of the circumstances of the twentieth century in an aggravation of the trouble in the triangle on a mind-boggling scale. The object of the entire plot is the Messianic Age as Maimonides understood it. Not the perpetuation of the position of privilege of those who currently sit atop the pinnacle of human endeavour as the embodiment of the amorphous Christian gel, or the Judeo-Christian ethic, but the future of humanity in the universal divine design. Further discussion of that point is best left until we have considered the trouble in the triangle in the context of the nineteenth and twentieth centuries in Europe (Volumes II and III).

A CATALYST

In fact, while the God-given role of the Jewish community has proven traumatic in the extreme, it is vital to the course of human communal evolution. The Jews have certainly not been rejected and cast out as the Christian church claimed, and that brings us to a further consideration – a fifth aspect – in the act of predestination which is an extension of the second aspect. The penal clause is not an end in itself and as the words which Moses attributed to God, already noted, indicate, divine punishment is a phase which does not affect the permanence of the Covenant of Sinai. The Jewish community is still bound in its special relationship with God in the terms of the Covenant. It has achieved the immediate aim of a Jewish State which its Zionist leaders saw as the logical route to take one hundred years ago, and the international Jewish community tends to regard the protection of the interests of that state, being as it is the focal point for much disputation, as its primary obligation. But in terms of the Covenant, it is not. The State of Israel is the focal point of disputation precisely because it is the focal point of the trouble in the triangle and the central fact of the Christian Era. In terms of the Covenant, the community's primary obligation is to recognize and foster the interests of its neighbours – in the broadest sense, everywhere – and, in doing so, to enable humanity to move towards a clearer understanding of its relationship with God. When it moves in that direction it is acting in accord with its divine covenant and it need be less concerned about its other aim. We can anticipate a continuing renaissance of Jewish faith and that, responding to divine inspiration, the Jewish community will act within the parameters of its Covenant as a catalyst to enable humanity to move towards a better understanding of its relationship with God and its responsibilities, and that in due course humanity will experience the Messianic Age in terms of Maimonides' understanding.

Israel's role as a catalyst may well be traumatic but in due course, as it responds once more to its Covenant responsibility, acting in consort with its partners in the triangle of faiths, its people will enjoy the fruits of their labour under that Covenant – but not on their own. All of humanity will share those fruits, and Israel and its neighbours will enjoy a totally new relationship. And when we think logically through the tangled web of history and the evolution of the trouble in the triangle we are inevitably drawn to the conclusion that, contrary to the fears of those who dreamed up and distributed the notorious Protocols of the Elders of Zion, the role of the Jewish community is not to act as controller of human affairs. That role, which the Christian church claimed was entrusted to it in succession to the Jews, which it sought to impose through links with the powers of Europe, and which it feared it would lose if a theocratic Jewish state was established, has been delegated to no person and to no particular group or community. It rests entirely with God and remains a matter of divine authority exercised through whatever instrument God may determine – to be recognized and experienced through human interaction and responses. The Jewish community's role was and is to act as a catalyst to bring the world to its senses; to act as a safety valve to prevent the absolute and catastrophic abuse of human capacity and ability; and to provide a focal point for the reassessment of the relationship between God and humanity, if and when circumstances require such a catalyst, safety valve or focal point. That point was reached during the European Colonial Era, and the Parody of Mein Kampf provided the opportunity and the stimulus for the parties involved to recognize it and to do something about it. But that opportunity was missed, for reasons which are considered in Volume III, (Suras 18 to 28), and the situation has continued to deteriorate so that at this time there is a greater need for the exercise of that role than ever before. It is only now, with the benefit of time and evolved circumstances, that we can really assess the folly of that period and the interlocking roles of the three Abrahamic messianic faiths.

BUT A CATALYST IN WHAT?

The outcome of the transgressions and the failures of the dominant white Christian Western World – the amorphous Christian gel – coupled with the Jewish community's transgression in the terms of the Qur'anic Night Journey, was the establishment of the State of Israel in circumstances of great bitterness and trauma for both its neighbours and Israel. Now: through the antagonism generated against them by their transgression against the people of Palestine – which they were forced to make in self defence – they have acted, and will continue to act, as a catalyst or a 'lightning conductor' in a number of responses which flow from the continuing three-way confrontation between communities linked to Judaism, Islam and Christianity. That situation will continue until and unless the three streams of faith act together on their joint and individual obligation to lead humanity towards the Messianic Age. For that to happen there is a major precondition. To enable the three faiths to move forward in that way, the Christian church must rethink its self-understanding and its relationship with its two partners because that is the fundamental cause of the trouble in the triangle and the massive transgressions by the powers of the amorphous Christian gel. That requires the development of a common messianic understanding by the three faiths. And that, in turn, requires the church to repudiate the Doctrine of the Trinity on which its self-understanding has been built and because of which Muhammad was called to his prophetic ministry. Clearly that process and that end can only be achieved by scholars of the three faiths working together.

While that precondition is being met there are three results, or effects, which we can anticipate from the situation which the world has blundered into. First: ultimately and inevitably the confrontation between the three faiths must bring benefit to those peoples who have been exploited, either currently or previously, by the amorphous Christian gel which has been acting on the basis of Christian self-understanding. Second: and with equal inevitability, the confrontation must result in substantial loss of privilege or detriment – judgement and discipline if you like – for the amorphous Christian gel. The extent of the detriment or discipline will be determined by the resistance of either Christians or Jews, or both, to the negotiation of proper settlements for the transgressions in which they have both been involved. Third: both of those aspects of the situation will inevitably contribute towards a clearer understanding of the Messianic message and humanity's relationship with God. The State of Israel and the City of Jerusalem will be seen in quite a different light – a unique light – and will assume a unique status in human understanding. The entire process is being triggered through the interaction of prophesy which has been generated within all three partner faiths in the triangle: Judaism, Christianity and Islam. More about that later. There is a lot of history to trace first.

These three points raise a host of questions. Why? Why? And why? We shall consider them after we have traced the history of the trouble in the triangle. But briefly, it is a matter of the consequences, or the effects, of continuing conflict within the triangle of Messianic faiths and the progressive loss of the capacity to exploit the rest of the world at its whim by the amorphous Christian gel. This can be either by the conscious decisions of Western leaders to relinquish the position of privilege which they have imposed and cling to by force, or, by the collapse of the system which they impose and dominate, brought about by concerted action with collaboration between those who have been exploited by the amorphous Christian gel in the process of achieving its privileged position.

The situation outlined implies, in simple terms, a divine “plot.” That plot implies that there was to be – is – a mechanism through which people will be drawn towards a clearer understanding of humanity's relationship to God. It also implies that the divine intention is that humanity will live in peace and harmony, understanding and responding to divine will and constantly searching to enhance that understanding and the human response to it. And the interlocking prophecies referred to already are the key to understanding the plot. The entire flow of human history and interaction must be reassessed on the basis of the failed relationships between the people of the three Abrahamic messianic faiths. The conclusions reached as we make that reassessment are at times shocking and at times deeply disturbing, but always challenging.

There can hardly be a practicing Jew who would deny the concept of communal predestination. It is the very basis of Jewish self-understanding that the people of Israel are those chosen to bring mankind to a closer understanding of God and to Salvation through the Messianic message. That role may not be unfolding in quite the way that most of them have anticipated. It may not carry the style of national authority for which many have longed and which the Vatican has greatly feared. But it certainly carries the responsibility. Now this raises the question which will arise from time to time of Jewish identity and whether this is linked to community or family origin – the so-called race question – or whether it relates to religious belief and identity, or cultural identity in the case of those who can trace a connection by one of the other routes but who do not adhere personally to Judaism as a religious faith. It is a question which still bedevils Jewish scholars and political leaders, as illustrated by the proceedings of the President's Conference on Jewish Culture and Identity in the Twenty First Century, which was held at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem in May, 2000. From the population dynamics of the Jewish community during the Christian Era, the ebb and flow of expulsions, migration, mass conversions and inter-marriage it is apparent that the twentieth century Jewish community was a product of volatile circumstances. This means that there is not necessarily continuity of tribal origin in the people whom we now know as Jews. There is therefore another vital connection to be made. This is the attachment to Jewish identity and the connection with the land of Judaea and the City of Jerusalem which is unbreakable. That attachment is Biblical and it is as divinely inspired as the decision by Abraham to migrate and to settle in the region. It will continue until time is no more. The people who hold that attachment are the primary, and very fluid, instrument of Divine Will in causing, or perhaps requiring, world attention to focus, eventually, on that Divine Will and to seek to act in accord with it.

And that brings us back to the use of the expression in the Night Journey that "the works of each man We have bound about his neck." The leaders of the early Zionist Movement achieved the immediate goal they set themselves and which they saw as their most important obligation. That was the establishment of a Jewish State in the homeland to which they had an inviolable attachment – and with which they had an affinity such that few people other than dispossessed indigenous people can fully comprehend. The people who they dispossessed in achieving their ambition comprehend it very well indeed. Their successors in the worldwide Jewish community are imbued with much the same determination, much the same affinity, and much the same sense of obligation to protect that state above all else. That is understandable. However, in the light of what we now understand about the trouble in the triangle and their eternal obligation under the Covenant which they cannot abrogate, it is now incumbent upon them to reflect long and hard on whether they are going about it in a manner consistent with that Covenant. They will be the first to acknowledge an obligation to their neighbours, in the very broadest sense, and an obligation to enable humanity to better understand its relationship with God. But that is jumping ahead too far. There is a lot of ground to cover yet as we explore the development and the consequences of the triangle. We are only at the point at which Muhammad issued a major challenge to the Christian church.

A WISP OF SMOKE ON THE HORIZON

Muhammad was, in his turn, the instrument through whom the imperative message of the Night Journey, of continuing Jewish predestination, was conveyed, but there was nothing in the message or on the horizon to indicate how or when the purpose behind the message would be disclosed and if it would ever be fulfilled. That would depend on populations yet unborn whose conduct would bring about a situation in which divine intervention would become necessary in the interests of the world at large. There was the possibility that the prophesy would never have to be realized. It could have remained in the "too hard basket" baffling scholars and never being fulfilled, if the world's conduct had been different: if the amorphous Christian gel had acted on its responsibility and not run off the rails.

However, long after Muhammad's personal ministry was complete, as conflict within the triangle became progressively worse and when the church had plumbed new depths in the abuse of its position and power, new insights into how the situation might unfold were provided through the Spanish Jew named Maimonides, already mentioned above. The time lapse between the ministries of Muhammad and Maimonides was about the same as that between the ministries of Jesus of Nazareth and Muhammad and there would be a further time lapse of the same order before events would occur to bring their critical prophesies to a point of conjunction. That conjunction would come with the parody of Adolf Hitler's Mein Kampf, the Holocaust – the fulfilment of the Night Journey – and the establishment of the State of Israel.

But this is not the point at which to consider Maimonides' expectations, either. That will come soon enough. It is sufficient to note, now, that the conjunction of the Night Journey and the first stage of Maimonides' prophecies set the scene and provided both the opportunity and the challenge for the world to move forward to the final phase: the realization of the Messianic Age. Unfortunately the self-understanding of the Christian Church, based on and securely tied to its erroneous doctrines and dogma prevented it from understanding either of those messages at the time they were delivered or the significance of the subsequent establishment of the State of Israel. At the time that Muhammad delivered his message the church refused to even recognize that there was a triangle of messianic faiths. It said it had all the answers. It had written them – or the basics of them – into its chest of doctrine and dogma. It did not want to hear what Muhammad was saying, in effect: "You have run off the rails. Turn back the clock! Rub out all your doctrines and dogma. Pick up the Gospel message of the Messiah, and start all over again!"

The Christian Church had been called through a man who had nothing to do with either the Roman Church or the Byzantine Empire to reassess not only its practices and actions, but also its basic statements of faith. It would be expecting too much to think that the Church would have immediately accepted the message of the prophet Muhammad, sat down in conference and began to rewrite its articles of faith and its constitution. It had convinced itself that it was the sole purveyor of God's truth. It had convinced itself that might was right and that the means justified the end in everything it did. With the deadweight of that self-understanding on its shoulders it had succeeded in crushing almost every spark of theological insight which might have led to enlightened evangelism, to conversion through love instead of the lash, through reason instead of ritual and, ultimately, to Salvation instead of sadism and subjection. In fact, in conjunction with the imperial powers, it had already put an enormous effort into suppressing moves by some very senior and respected members of the church for theological and liturgical changes which were virtually the same as those that Muhammad was demanding. Why should it now turn around and make those changes because a mere outsider said so?

It certainly would have been expecting too much to expect such an about face. It is very rare for a group or an organization to carry out such a review when things are running in its favour or when its position is reasonably stable. Such a review is only carried out under pressure from someone else, such as when competitors make the going tough or when one's peer group or superiors issue a "please explain" or take disciplinary action because of poor performance. When Muhammad issued his challenge from way out on the fringes of the church's world the church did not believe it had to bow to any superiors and it certainly did not recognize a peer group of religions. It need not worry about the imperial powers because they were at least as dependent on the church to help prop up their positions as the church was dependent on them. It had succeeded in suppressing Judaism to the point that the Jews were most unlikely to be able to mount any such pressure in the foreseeable future. The neighbouring nationalistic pagan religions were disappearing one by one and their remnant populations were being absorbed into the church by syncretism. Persia's emperor-god cult variation on Zoroastrianism was no longer a real threat and neither Buddhism nor any of the other Eastern mystical religions were at all aggressive. The Roman wing of the Christian Church virtually had the religion field on its own and that is how it believed it should be because, according to its self-understanding, it was the body appointed by Christ as his exclusive nominee on earth, endowed with his full authority, and he was one third of the Triune God. Well, the church did not have to wait very long, historically speaking, before the pressure began to build up.

THE BIRTH OF DAR AL-ISLAM

The establishment of the community of Islam and, in the view of many writers, the birth of the new religion is taken to be the Hijra or the flight to Medina in 622. However a community of probably between 200 and 300 based on 83 male members, many of whom were married with families, had migrated across the Red Sea to Abyssinia (Ethiopia) in 615. They went to escape persecution from the pagan merchant class of Mecca. They went to settle and to establish a new home based on their new found faith and a desire to found a God-fearing community. They did not go in anger or armed to impose their will.³⁰ Islam's first peer group contact therefore gave it the same experience of community conflict and persecution which the Jewish communities had known, say, in Constantinople which prompted them to migrate to the Crimea and the Caucasus; which the early Christians had known in Palestine and which was to prompt pockets of Protestant Christians to migrate to the Americas and Australia over a thousand years later. That migration to Abyssinia, actually provided the first substantial evidence of the new faith for both Rome and Byzantium. It took place before Byzantium had been pushed out of Egypt by Persia and while it still had active links with Abyssinia. Muhammad's opponents in Mecca, apparently fearful that he was up to some political tricks, sent a delegation to the Negus of Abyssinia demanding the repatriation of the emigrants. The Negus refused to oblige.³¹ It is highly unlikely – even if that approach had not been made to the Negus and rejected, virtually in the presence of imperial officials – that local imperial officials could be unaware of a religious group migration on that scale. It follows that the migration could hardly have been missed by the authorities in both capitals, Rome and Byzantium. That migration could therefore be taken as the birth of the faith and as a warning signal for Rome of that fact. It was but one of the incidents which both tested and developed the determination of Muhammad and his small community to push ahead in response to the call which they fervently believed had come from God. In this we can see another parallel with the two older faiths.

The call to Muhammad is quite similar in nature to the call to Samuel as a young man. It fell to him to clean up the Jewish worship of his day and to establish the Jewish monarchy. And the call to Muhammad's supporters, and the way they approached their task, can be compared with that of the young Christian community which gathered around the Apostles of Jesus after Pentecost, but the sense of urgency and the demands made on them might have been somewhat more acute. They had to secure both their safety and their credibility with a series of skirmishes, among the most important of which was the Battle of Bu'ath in 617. They also had to secure their economic independence which was, under the circumstances of tribal animosities, an important factor in establishing credibility. They did it by using methods a bit like those used by Augustine against the Donatists, but not nearly as brutal or devastating. They raided trading caravans. From their position of gradually increasing authority they were able to negotiate recognition, then treaties of allegiance, and gradually bind the warring and divided tribes of the peninsula into a cohesive body. Of course in Christian tradition, myth or call it what you will, there was no comparison. Augustine was said to be quite justified in putting down a dreadful heresy. Muhammad on the other hand, was a preacher who, being unable to succeed through moral influence, soon changed his methods and became a warrior leading his united and fierce Arabs to the conquest of unbelievers! ³²

NATIONALISM: A VEHICLE FOR RELIGIOUS DEVELOPMENT

Emerging nationalism always needs a focal point. Arabian nationalism in the Seventh century was no exception. It was largely triggered by the interference of the three major powers abutting the massive peninsula territory. That interference had several important effects. Firstly, it introduced tribal animosity through the competing vassal states or satrapies which were financed or imposed both along the northern land frontier or fringe territory and on the rugged southern coastline. Secondly, it introduced religious conflict. Thirdly, it fragmented the structures of tribal authority and trade because of the first two factors and then, as a result of those factors, it provided an environment ripe for the emergence of a spirit of nationalism. This was partly as a direct reaction to all the interference and partly because the tribal fragmentation left a series of smallish tribes. None of them were strong enough to become dominant on a purely military basis and all of them were prepared to throw in their lot with a leader who, having developed a strong personal and military position, was offering something quite different to old style tribal dominance.

The nature of the Arabian Peninsula also encouraged nationalism. Its 5,100 miles of frontier included only 900 miles of land frontier. This was divided more or less evenly between the warring empires but the vassal states along that frontier acted, to some extent, as a strategic buffer. The 4,200 miles of coastline, most of which is rugged and uninviting, was divided about equally with 1,400 miles along each of the Red Sea, the northern reaches of the Indian Ocean, (known as Arabian Sea and the Gulf of Aden), and the twin gulfs of Persia and Oman. Along these coastlines it was only at the strategically important and agriculturally more productive south west and south east corners of the Yemen and Oman, which commanded the trade approaches to the Red Sea and Persian Gulfs, that the big powers had sought to establish their states. The peninsular was militarily secure. The same factors which make it vulnerable to naval attack in the days of aircraft carriers, submarines, Polaris missiles and Omega made it militarily secure in the days of chariots, galleys and swords, although the relative difficulty of occupying it is still a factor today. Once the spirit of nationalism was well established and coupled with both military capacity and religious fervour the new nation was well placed to take on the great powers. Not only was it militarily secure, but it sat like a great wedge driven into the soft underbellies of the two great powers.

But the spirit of nationalism did not develop around Muhammad and his young movement spontaneously. After the Abyssinian emigration he continued to face a lot of opposition, especially from the influential traders of Mecca whose caravans the prophet raided regularly to obtain the goods his growing community needed for survival. A confrontation was only a matter of time. On one hand the Meccans wanted Muhammad out of the way: on the other hand, he had to either win them over or defeat them to gain a secure base without the need to constantly fight for survival. In March 624 the Meccans took the initiative and sought to crush Muhammad's small force of about 300 men by sending a force of about 950 men to protect an especially rich caravan and to make a frontal attack on the Muslims near the small market village of Badr, south west of Medina. In fact only between five and six hundred Meccans actually took part in the battle but the Muslims, still outnumbered two to one, fought with skill, discipline and fervour and gained an impressive victory. It proved to be the turning point in Muhammad's fortunes. The Muslims did not believe that they had won by their own effort but that they had been supported by troops of angels, giving the victory the same significance as historically important victories by the struggling young Jewish community.

Although the Battle of Badr did not achieve control of Mecca for Muhammad it gave him the standing and the capacity to gradually gain the allegiance of tribes all over the peninsular by either negotiation and alliance or conquest. At that stage the Jewish communities began to feel the consequences of snubbing Muhammad during the earlier years of his ministry. They probably thought for a while that Judaism was in for a rougher ride under Islam than under Christianity. There were three Jewish tribes in the Medina region. Only a month after the Battle of Badr Muhammad used some trivial incident as a pretext for expelling the first tribe. The second was expelled in August/September 625, and the third was annihilated, not just expelled, in 627. About 600 men were executed and the children and women were sold into slavery.³³ They were accused of ambiguous behaviour during the 'Battle of the Ditch', the defence of Medina against a force of between 7,500 and 10,000 tribesmen sympathetic to the old establishment at Mecca. The attack was cleverly broken up and repulsed and it was the last but one concerted attempt to stop Muhammad's expansion. It also marked a change in Muhammad's approach from the use of force to diplomatic negotiation in his efforts to woo other Arab tribes. Although he had gained access to Mecca in the meantime, it was not until a year or so after he sent his messages to Heraclius and Kavadh that Muhammad finally gained control of the city, in mid January 630.

Just two months later, Heraclius made his special – and very provocative – expedition to return the true cross to Jerusalem. Muhammad was well aware of the significance which Heraclius placed on that expedition. It was the diplomatic move par excellence aimed at boosting the morale of the Christianized Arab regions of Palestine and Syria and of strengthening their allegiance to Constantinople. Heraclius maintained only fairly small forces in that part of the empire. He didn't have any option. He still had to depend on the support of the vassal Arab states along the northern fringe of the peninsula territory for his authority. The stronger Muhammad became, and the more compelling his message sounded in the ears of Arab nationalists, the more tenuous became Constantinople's hold on the area.

Heraclius, in league with the church, was determined to show that the Christian faith was superior to Islam and that it would protect the Holy City of Jerusalem. He was well aware of the significance of Jerusalem in Muhammad's faith and that Mecca was to be an interim focal point until the time that people of all faiths caught the Messianic message and gave Jerusalem rightful recognition as the focal point of faith. It may not have occurred to Heraclius that in making that political gesture so that it would be more difficult for Muhammad to take Jerusalem he was inviting him to formally confront the Byzantine Empire and not only the church as an institution of religious faith. If the Muslim leader could mount a force strong enough to take Jerusalem he would, in fact, have mounted a force strong enough to take on the empire. History had already shown that. However, even if Heraclius didn't fully appreciate the significance of his gesture it appears that Muhammad did. Later that year he assembled an army of 30,000 men for a campaign which ran from October to December to take the Christianized fortress centre of Tabuk, near the head of the Gulf of Aqaba. It was his biggest campaign and the force was two and a half times bigger than any force previously assembled under his leadership. It was a trial run for a push towards Syria, Damascus, and then Jerusalem.³⁴

Muhammad did not live to lead Islam either beyond the Arabian Peninsula or into Jerusalem. He personally led the pilgrimage of the Hajj in 632 and died soon afterwards, on June 8, 632. In his later years, as he came into more and more direct contact with the Christian church his opposition to its theology and its practices became deeper. He would not tolerate any images, icons, Mariology or ideas of priestly authority which placed anyone or anything between man and God, such as those he came into contact with more and more as he went further north. His determination to clean up Christian worship became intense. To avoid a weakening of the faith and any tendency to acceptance of such practices he forbade a true believer to marry the idolaters who place other Gods on a par with Allah. His tolerance towards Christians gave way to a general instruction to "Fight against such of those to whom the Scriptures were given as believe neither in Allah nor the Last Day, who do not forbid what Allah and His Apostle have forbidden, and do not embrace the true faith, until they pay tribute out of hand and are utterly subdued.” (Qur’an Sura 9: 28,29). Of course at that time Muhammad was well and truly into deeply entrenched Monophysite territory controlled by the Patriarch of Jerusalem. There was none of the Nestorian influence which led him, in 628, to permit the Christians of Najran to keep their faith and to be exempt from both military service and levies which were required from other non-Muslim communities. An ordinary tax was the only contribution they were required to make towards Medina’s coffers.³⁵

SUCCESSION CRISIS AND FRAGMENTATION

Muhammad did not make detailed arrangements for a leadership structure which would perpetuate the movement which had grown around him.³⁶ This led to a period of uncertainty as his followers struggled to fill the void and it looked for a while as if the new-found Arab nationalism, sense of destiny and tribal cohesion would all disintegrate. Western writers have often been critical of Muhammad for what they read as a bad failure of leadership. Such criticism suggests only a partial understanding of Muhammad’s role and self-understanding. It also suggests that Muhammad should have done more in this respect than Jesus of Nazareth. Muhammad’s decision to simply appoint Abu Bakr to lead prayers at Medina was quite consistent with his belief that his task was not to set up a dynasty or establish an empire but to call mankind to submit to the will of God. If he had nominated a line of succession or forms of ministry or government they would have become enshrined, established tribal favourites and animosities, and provided a basis for ready made politicking such as that within the Christian church over Rome’s claims to apostolic succession through Peter. In fact Muhammad left very definite warnings and instructions against Muslims splitting into sects and he believed that every community or state had to work out the form of government best for it within the framework of total submission to the will of God. He also recognized that Arabia was still far from unified.³⁷

Turn to Allah and fear Him. Be steadfast in prayer and be not of those who associate others with Allah, those who split up their religion into sects, each exulting in its own beliefs.
[30:31–32]

Even so, he wasn’t able to avoid it and, as we shall see, some aspects of the current world situation bear the mark of a regional split in the ranks of Islam over the very issue of succession to the prophet. After the brief period of intense grief at the prophet’s death from a fever had passed, the community of Medina appointed Abu Bakr as successor to the prophet, or caliph. He first had to put down a series of revolts against Medina by those tribes which had seen themselves as being in allegiance with Muhammad and not subject to the town in which he lived. He then pressed on with the northern campaign which the prophet had started, but the political situation had changed so much that after only a couple of months he allowed the campaign to lapse without a significant result. But very soon the tribes began to realize that Arab nationalism was a reality as well as Islam. The tribes around Hira sensed the weakened position of Persia, embraced Islam and had no difficulty in taking the predominantly Arab city. Even though they had not received support for the battle from Medina, the alliance had been forged strongly and permanently. The push against Persia began in earnest and simultaneously the Medina linked forces regrouped and took up the push towards Byzantine Syria where it had faltered only the year before. The vigour and quick success of the twin thrusts took both the Persians and the Byzantines by surprise. Southern Palestine fell immediately after Hira in 633. Damascus fell in September 634 after a siege of six months. Jerusalem held out for two years. It fell in 636, the same year as the Persian capital, Ctesiphon. Constantinople deployed as many reinforcements as the other fronts would permit but they could not slow the fanatical messengers of God. They should not have been surprised.

In Mesopotamia and the western flank the Arab followers of Muhammad had a big advantage over the great powers. They were, in a much more real sense than that in which we often hear the term used today, liberating their own people from an imposed foreign rule. Quite often they received either open or undercover cooperation from local Christians. None of the Arab vassal states or subject countries of the Empire really wanted to stay subject to Byzantium or Persia for the limited benefits their overlords from a decaying empire were able to provide. They had been exploited and persecuted by either Romans or Greek or Persians for a long period.³⁸ The main thing which spurred the troops of the vassal states into a reasonably solid defence was the anti-Muslim propaganda of the church. Then there was fear of what might happen if they didn't defend the faith, and belief that the "true Cross" would protect them or, if it did not, that Mary or their patron saints would intercede with God to save them. Against that, the Muslims had Muhammad's words ringing in their ears:

When the sacred months are over, slay the idolaters wherever you find them. Arrest them, besiege them, and lie in ambush everywhere for them. If they repent and take to prayer and pay the alms-tax, let them go their way. Allah is Forgiving and Merciful.

If an idolater seeks asylum with you, give him protection so that he may hear the word of Allah, and then convey him to safety. For they are ignorant men. [9:5–6]

Those that have embraced the faith and migrated from their homes and fought for Allah's cause with their wealth and their person are held in higher regard by Allah. It is they who shall triumph. Their Lord has promised them joy and mercy, and gardens of eternal bliss where they shall dwell forever. Allah's reward is great indeed. [9:21–22]

Within two years of the fall of Jerusalem the whole of Syria had gone. Another four years and all of Egypt, Cyrenaica and Tripolitania (modern day Libya), had become part of the expanding Arab Islamic Empire and the thrust westward across North Africa was only stopped by the Berbers of Tunisia, formerly Numidia.

The difference from that point on was that the Arabs were not liberating other people of Arab stock. They now faced an ethnically quite different people for the first time. For the Berbers, accepting the Arabs would have simply meant swapping one imperial overlord for another. It was a case of "better the devil you know." Going the other way, the whole of Mesopotamia had followed within ten years of the fall of Jerusalem. The entire Arab community was then welded together by a common faith that God is the only God and we must submit to His will. The surprising success was the conquest of the entire Persian empire within twelve years of the fall of the capital, Ctesiphon, because there was an ethnically different people putting up only little resistance to the invaders. The speed of that thrust compares with the speed with which the Goths and the Huns had swept from Asia across western and central Europe. But that is where the comparison ends, even though it gave the church fuel to pile on the fire of bigotry for many centuries with either false or grossly exaggerated stories of conversion by the sword.

The Persian empire had been held together with great difficulty and with real force being used to suppress separatist movements from time to time. It was the separatist areas which provided the economic strength for the empire, not the so-called heartland. We have already noted one such separatist effort, that of the Jewish kingdom of Mahoza about five generations earlier. When the Muslim armies converged on Nihavand in the Persian heartland in 642 and gained a fairly quick victory, a rash of separatist movements was triggered across the empire.³⁹ It was these internal separatist movements which forced the last of the Sasanid emperors, Yazdgard III, to retreat north east. He was murdered in 651. His son followed in the steps of his great-grandfather Chosroes II, and went running to his enemies for help to recapture his empire. In this case it was the Turks and the Chinese to his north and east, and they didn't respond immediately, although the stage had been set for subsequent invasions of a fragmented empire. The Sasanid nobility was left with only the mountainous fringe of the Elburz region between the Caspian Sea and the modern Iranian capital of Teheran. The task of the Muslim armies was certainly made much easier by these manoeuvres, but now we come to the vital factor.

The Goths and the Huns had come with migrating populations to occupy and settle land and the empires of Ebla and Rome had come to dominate and exploit resources for the economic benefit of their home base populations, (and their ruling classes in particular). In contrast, the Arab Muslims came simply to impose a new religious message. They had not come with territorial or resource demands in the usual sense. Yes, it is correct that, put very simply, they said "adopt the faith of Islam or pay taxes or lose your life", but very few chose the third alternative. Generally the Jews held to their faith and chose to pay taxes; the Christians vacillated with some opting to pay taxes and some adopting Islam; and all the people of non-messianic religions, state paganism and the like, readily adopted Islam. There had to be a new system of government to coordinate everything and a system of taxes to finance it but stability and cooperation were to be the key words, not force and exploitation.

The man with the task of organizing the new empire was Caliph 'Umar ibn al-Khattab, who was appointed by Abu Bakr on his deathbed. The Arab Muslim administration which he set up was closer to a theocratic state than anything else at that time or since. The Caliph nominated a governor for each region. He was responsible for internal order, command of the army, financial affairs and religious affairs. He often had a financial officer to help him whose job was to see that taxes were raised to cover local administration costs and that any surplus was despatched to Medina. Within a generation or two most governors also had a judge to relieve them of the burden of jurisdiction. Within that general framework the local populations were left to run their own affairs and to trade as they wished. Communities which accepted Islam peaceably or, in effect, surrendered voluntarily received some extra considerations not allowed for those which resisted and had to be taken by force. They were allowed to retain their land with only a collective levy made under an Islamic agreement so that the local government could not arbitrarily increase it. The resisters forfeited their existing property rights but were allowed to retain their land against payment of a tax assessed by the government.

While the Muslim troops kept the minor trophies of war, like those of most eras, mass expropriation of land was strictly forbidden. Tribes which had taken part in the wars were encouraged to emigrate into the new Islamic provinces, taking their goods and chattels with them from Arabia, but they were generally brought together into military centres and were not allowed to assume the role of landlords to the village populations. They were there to propagate the word of God and to conduct themselves contrary to that word would incur the wrath of Allah.⁴⁰

They ask you about the spoils. Say: 'The spoils belong to Allah and the Apostle. Therefore, have fear of Allah and end your disputes. Obey Allah and His Apostle, if you are true believers. [8:1]

O believers, when you encounter the infidels gathered (for battle) do not turn your backs to them in flight. If anyone on that day turns his back to them in flight, except it be for tactical reasons, or to join another band, he shall incur the wrath of Allah and Hell shall be his home: an evil fate.

It was not you, but Allah, who slew them. It was not you who threw at them: Allah threw at them so the He might richly reward the faithful. He is Hearing, Knowing. And he will surely weaken the designs of the unbelievers. [8:15–17]

O believers, do not betray Allah and the Apostle, nor knowingly betray your trust. Know that your children and your worldly goods are but a temptation, and that Allah's reward is great.

Believers, if you fear Allah, He will give you discrimination and cleanse you of your sins and forgive you. The bounty of Allah is great. [8:27–29]

The double standards of the church of Rome are clearly exposed when we compare what it said about the Muslim conquest of Palestine and Persia with the sham which passed for the Catholicizing of the rebellious Donatist community of Numidia in the time of Augustine. (Sura 7). The Ghost of Ambrose protecting the troops of Rome; mass confiscation or destruction of property; oppression of the non-conformists; sympathetic heretics being burned at the stake, factional murders and the full force of the empire being applied to impose conformity, all by the body which claimed to be the sole representative of God on earth! The best it could do was claim the Arabs were converting by the sword and spread stories that they burned libraries in Alexandria. That is another myth which cannot be substantiated. The story gained currency during the Crusades but its source is uncertain. What we do know is that the Muslims crossed the Egyptian border in 639 and the Byzantine army was decisively beaten near Babylon (or Old Cairo) in July 640, although the fortress itself was not occupied until some time in 641. The Patriarch Cyrus then made an agreement that Alexandria, the naval key to Byzantine control of Egypt, would be evacuated in September 642. However, a few months later, the City was re-occupied by the Byzantines following a coup. Force was required to dislodge them the second time, but when the navy left all Byzantine influence went with it.⁴¹ The naval war was then taken right into Byzantine home waters for the first time and Cyprus was occupied in 649. It was only twenty years since Muhammad's message had been rejected and the "true cross" had been so defiantly returned to Jerusalem. But the challenge to rethink their theology which Rome and Constantinople had denigrated had grown from a tribal challenge into a greater military threat than they had ever faced before.

Wait for the day when the sky will pour down visible smoke, enveloping all men: this will be a dreadful scourge. Then they will say: 'Lord, lift up this scourge from us. We are now believers.' But how will they avail themselves of the Message when an undoubted prophet had come to them and they turned away from him, saying: 'A madman, taught (by others)!'

There was a wisp of smoke on the horizon. Furthermore, the triangle of faiths was complete. The three faiths which formed it were still identifiable as three streams arising from one source because of their fundamental common ground. However their divergent secondary beliefs ensured that tension and conflict – not cooperation – would dominate their relationship as they either competed for the hearts and minds of people or sought security for a very long time. The sides of the triangle were certainly not equal, and over many centuries they would be battered and distorted as great forces were brought to bear on them. But the triangle was formed and ready to be used as an instrument of God's will to draw all humanity towards a clearer understanding of its responsibilities and relationship with God when the world's affairs reached a critical point.

Volume I

Part 2

THE YEARS OF CHALLENGE: SCIENTISTS, REFORMERS, PHILOSOPHERS

CHAPTER 7

ON THE ROMAN ROAD

There was a wisp of smoke on the horizon but no one in Rome or Constantinople seemed very concerned to investigate the cause of the fire. A lot had happened since Heraclius spurned Muhammad's message way out on the fringe of the empire in the Syrian desert during the Persian campaign. Now the old man was gone. He died in 642, about the time that his army and the Berbers were combining to bank back the Arab Muslim flood at Tunisia. He had probably realized then that it was only a question of time before the banks would break and the flood would rush on. He had close personal knowledge of the sincerity and fervour of the Muslim forces and the directness and appeal of their message. One of his saddest moments as emperor had been the debacle at the River Yarmuk, mid way between Jerusalem and Damascus, in 636. It was to have been the decisive battle with Khalid and his Muslim forces. It was. What Heraclius needed and expected was determination in his infantry and the backing of a strong cavalry force. What he got was a great parade of priests with their holy relics, pictures of Mary, sacred banners and the backing of a gaggle of chanting monks.

The Christian Arab cavalry from the vassal states deserted and joined Khalid's Muslims as soon as the armies joined battle. ¹ Heraclius' infantry was forced to retreat. Retreat gave way to rout and then massacre with the Byzantines trapped, unable to escape across the river which cascaded over the corpses of the troops where they fell. What else could he expect? Perhaps, he may have thought, it would have been different if he hadn't listened to the church. He might have been able to salvage part of the eastern provinces or, at least, he might have retained some sort of imperial relationship if he had been able to negotiate with Medina. But no, the church hierarchy had insisted on that relic of all relics being carted back in ceremony in open confrontation with Muhammad and his scandalous views. Nothing could have been planned more carefully to strengthen the prophet's determination if they had tried. What could he have done about it? As emperor his hands were tied. If he had refused he would have been attacked for rejecting the teaching of the church and undermining its position. He had the choice of a fifth column in his ranks, out to get rid of him, or a battle with Muhammad. Perhaps he had made the wrong choice. The immediate result was that he had been forced to surrender to the Arabs part of the territory which he had just recovered from the Persians.

In fact the consequences were a lot more serious than that. The Arab front had proved to be a drain on resources which he couldn't afford and their victory had encouraged the troubles brewing on his other fronts. He may have thought: "Surely God doesn't intend man to fight over his religion all the time.” But then he might have reflected that they don’t as he pondered the incident which seemed so incongruous at the time: the Patriarch walking Jerusalem with Caliph ‘Umar to show him the holy places personally. The Byzantine governor had left the patriarch in charge of the city to supervise the surrender and the Patriarch had insisted that he would only formally surrender to the caliph in person. He had to wait until 638, almost two years, for the Caliph to make his visit, by camel, with only one attendant for his 600 mile desert journey from Medina. The Caliph had even agreed that the Christians could retain all of their churches and their much despised relics. Fat lot of good they would do them. ² The Muslims had promptly built their own places of worship in the city in line with their policy of not taking over other people’s property, but now, 21 years after that stupid confrontation over the ‘True Cross’ and fifteen years since they captured the city, they were building their first mosque up on Mount Moriah where the Jewish temples and pagan shrines had stood. Jewish temples. The very thought of them probably sent cold shivers down his spine. The church had insisted that he tighten up the controls which Justinian had imposed because people were not taking any notice of them anymore. He had obliged by putting a total ban on the public exercise of Judaism in Byzantium and had thrown his weight behind a call for all European rulers to do the same. In Gaul in 626 King Dagobert had ordered a general expulsion of all Jews except those who consented to adopt the dominant religion.³

But at last the Muslim armies were beginning to get bogged down on all of their fronts. Not only were they stopped at Tunisia but they had run into trouble in Armenia also. The Khazars, inspired by the troubles of the Byzantines, had begun to move south. The Byzantines were determined not to be pushed back any further and the Armenians found themselves in a no-man’s land being savaged from three directions. The Arab Muslims finally triumphed in 717, just as they made the third of four unsuccessful attempts spread over 60 years to capture Constantinople itself and were thwarted by the Bulgars with whom Byzantium had made a deal. They had come closest in 667 when they occupied Chalcedon and invaded Sicily, without being able to gain control of the island.

On the eastern front the going got tougher when they reached the limits of Persian territory so that it was 664 before the Muslim armies reached Kabul in modern day Afghanistan. It was another ten years before they crossed the Oxus River to Bakhara, much fabled Samarkand in southern Russia and Khiwa, all in the area of Turkish-controlled small city states. They were now well into the zone of influence of the Chinese Tang Dynasty and were very likely to invite trouble, especially as there was already a hotch potch of heathen Shamanism, Nestorian Christianity, Buddhism, Zarathustrianism and Manichaeism present. ⁴ However they seem to have trodden as diplomatically as they had in Jerusalem and to have recognized that the perpetual tribal skirmishes of the area were based on divisions between Turks and Iranians, and between the peasantry and steppe-dwellers rather than on religious conflict. The local powers were not replaced by Arab garrisons and Islamic local government for another twenty or thirty years and during that period the local petty princes usually remained as either indirect rulers or allies. It was, after all, only 40 years since the first Europeans had formally approached the Chinese ruling house.

An embassy from Byzantium arrived in 635, about the same time as a party of Nestorian missionaries from Persia. Emperor Tai-tsung, the second of his dynastic line, had taken the throne in 627. The emperor welcomed the Nestorians with great respect, listened to their claims and creeds, and ordered the Christian scriptures translated into Chinese so that he could study them further. Three years later he declared the religion satisfactory and gave approval for a church to be built and for a monastery to be established. But another religious party had already been to his court seven years earlier, in his second year as emperor. It was a party of Arabs from Medina who had arrived at Canton in the trading vessel Yanbu with a message from Muhammad which was probably along the same lines as those to Heraclius and Kavadh. The response which the party received was quite different to that which Muhammad's messengers had received from the Byzantine and Persian rulers. Tai-tsung is said to have listened to their views with interest and to have given them assistance to build the mosque at Canton which stands as one of Islam's earliest buildings.⁵ Whether Tai-tsung related these two visits, seven years apart, is uncertain but apparently he saw no conflict in them or he would probably have rejected the Nestorian approach. He certainly had no need to kowtow to either Byzantium or Arabia. The unity, culture, power and effective urban development of China were in sharp contrast to the decay, disorder and disunity of the Western world.⁶

The Arab march south east into the Indus Valley went step by step with the march north east into the Oxus Valley region and by 712 Daibul (Karachi) and Nirum (Hyderabad) in Pakistan were both in Muslim hands. However dissension within the camp had already begun to take its toll on the fervour and capacity of Islam to carry out the prophet's commission. Whereas in the Christian church the wrecker had been theological disagreement which then took on a regional dimension, in Islam it was tribal jealousy and discord which then took on a regional dimension. The development of a complex of mythology and mysticism intertwined with fragments of Jewish history and the prophet's revelation, then fell like a veil over the whole religion. It paralleled the development of pagan-Christian mythology in earlier centuries. But the church was not prepared to recognize that. It further complicated relations with the other two faiths in the triangle and provided ammunition which the church could use to justify its continued denigration of Islam and its reluctance to re-examine its own doctrines and theology. The church also took advantage of the opportunity to compound and confuse the mythology as well.

ISLAM DIVIDES

The tribal intrigue which led to Islam splitting into two major divisions over the issue of succession to the prophet Muhammad was too complex to deal with in any detail here. However it appeared right from the appointment of Abu Bakr as Caliph and successor to the prophet. The Medinans believed that one of their number should be elected but they were persuaded, possibly by Abu Bakr himself, that it was Muhammad's wish for a member of the Quraish to succeed him.⁷ He survived for only two years. On his deathbed he nominated 'Umar whose ten year rule saw some of the greatest Muslim Arab conquests before he was stabbed to death for private vengeance by a Persian slave in 644. 'Umar was succeeded by another Quraish, 'Uthman ibn 'Affan, an elderly son-in-law of the prophet, possibly the weakest of the candidates for the office, and the third caliph related to Muhammad by marriage. But he was a member of the Umayyad family which had remained opposed to Muhammad's movement until he came to power and as a result his appointment stirred the debate on how, and on what basis, the caliph should be appointed. During his 12-year period in office the latent tensions and tribal antagonisms came into the open and have never been finally resolved,⁸ but his decision in 653 to declare an exclusive canon of the Prophet's revelations, or an authorised version of the Qur'an, deepened the divisions. Critics said that the state was hindering the implementation of the Word and that the power of the state was opposing Allah (God). If the moral values of the religion were absolute and could not be challenged, then it meant that the sovereignty of the state could not be reconciled with the principle of tribal autonomy. Rebellion broke out, with tribal overtones as was to be expected, and 'Uthman was murdered in Medina while at worship in June 656.

There were two contenders for the appointment to succeed 'Uthman. One was Ali ibn abi Talib, a cousin from the Hashimite clan of Mecca who Muhammad adopted into his family and who subsequently became a close confidant and his son-in-law through marriage to the Prophet's eldest daughter, Fatima. Claims have been made that he had been nominated by Muhammad as his successor three months before the Prophet died⁹ but these are not consistent with other statements that Muhammad had made no provision for a successor.¹⁰ The other contender was 'Uthman's appointee as governor of Damascus, Mu'awiya ibn abi Sufyan. When Ali assumed the office of caliph on the day of 'Uthman's death he was not recognized by Mu'awiya who continued to rule Syria while Ali ruled the balance of the caliphate from a new capital at Kufa on the River Euphrates. The bitter and divisive power struggle which followed developed into full scale war between them, but 'Ali clung to power for four years until he was murdered by the Kharijites, a sect which had been among his strongest supporters in his bid for power. Mu'awiya forced Ali's elder son, Hasan, a grandson of the Prophet, to resign his claim to the caliphate and Mu'awiya was proclaimed caliph later that year, 661, in Jerusalem.

Mu'awiya's appointment marked the beginning of the Umayyad Caliphate which continued for ninety years, and a period of remarkable expansion in Dar al-Islam. The civil war came to an end, but the internal debate over who was the legitimate caliph continued and the power struggle ignited again when Hasan died a few years later. The Shi'at 'Ali, (the Party of 'Ali), claimed that Hasan had been poisoned on the caliph's instructions and asserted that he was therefore a martyr. When Mu'awiya was succeeded by his son Yazid I in 680, Hasan's younger brother, Husain ibn 'Ali, rebelled, supported the notion of a counter government set up in Mecca, and set out for Kufa at the invitation of the Shi'a in Iraq to claim the Caliphate. His small force was surrounded by Yazid's vastly superior forces at Karbala and when they refused to surrender they were cut to pieces. Husain, the second of the Prophet's grandsons to die, was beheaded on the victor's orders and his head was sent to Damascus. The site of his eventual burial at Karbala became a major sanctuary of the Shi'a, and he was declared a Martyr.

The political opportunities for the Shi'a through Ali's family seemed to have been played out and the party began to take a more religious turn and to formulate its own principles and doctrines. However a few years later, in 685, Al Mukhtar, a distinguished member of the Thaqif tribe which had been in competition with the Quraish near Mecca, began an uprising in the name of the only remaining son of Ali, Muhammad ibn al-Hanafiyya, who was born to a second wife and was therefore not a grandson of the Prophet. Al Mukhtar rebelled using the slogan "Vengeance for Husain" and proclaimed the message of the Hidden Imam who would reveal himself at the end of time as Mahdi to set up the kingdom of righteousness. The rebellion proved short and abortive but it gave the Shi'a a new lease of life and helped to weaken the Umayyad grip on the caliphate. Subsequently the Shi'a supported the Abbasids in their successful bid to claim the caliphate, on the assumption that the Abbasids would adopt Shi'a Islam and revert to Ali's line of succession. However such was not to be. The Abbasids did not like the mythology and the religion which they had seen and, having gained the office, they saw no reason to relinquish it to anyone else on any historical ground. They retained Sunni Islam as the orthodox belief, destroyed Husain's tomb, killed the leaders of the Party of Ali, set about eliminating everyone who stood in direct line of descent from Ali and, in doing so provided the basis for a number of additional Shi'a myths and annual laments or celebrations.¹¹

The division between the orthodox or Sunni Muslims and the Shi'a was permanent. Islam had two streams each claiming legitimate succession from the Prophet and to be endowed with his authority.

Other sects have formed, deep divisions have occurred within Islam from time to time, and the history of the struggles to maintain the caliphate in spite of the crumbling of the Arab empire is very involved. But our main concern is not the history of the development of Islam or the decay of the Arab empire. We are concerned with the evolving relationships between Christianity, Judaism and Islam. It is therefore sufficient to note at this point that there are only two main streams of Islam. The majority of the world's Muslims adhere to orthodox or Sunni Islam and are generally known as Sunnis. They recognize a leadership system in which the caliph is the head of the community and is responsible for the welfare and defence of Dar al-Islam and for ensuring justice through the shari'a. Each successive caliph attains office either as the nominee of the previous caliph or by being chosen by the current leaders of the Muslim community.

However, within the early Muslim community there were those who believed that the head of the community, or Imam, is divinely appointed to assume the rights, privileges and responsibilities of the Prophet and to be the ruler and teacher of the faithful. As such he is endowed with super-human qualities which descend to him supernaturally from Adam, through Muhammad, a light which is a divine gift to the chosen of each generation. This does not necessarily imply perfection or freedom from sin in personal conduct, nor infallibility in decision making, nor hereditary succession. However it is very easily interpreted to mean hereditary succession and that is the way in which those who wanted the caliphate to remain at Medina and within the Quraish interpreted and taught the matter. It was basic to the Party of 'Ali's demands that he be recognized as caliph without any consideration of alternative appointees, as it was to the case for his sons to succeed him. But it was also basic to the perceived need for the elimination of all those who may have been able to trace their descent from Ali once the Abbasids were in power and wanted to circumvent that understanding of succession.

Considering the circumstances of the formation of their stream, the Shi'a, (Shi'ites), showed relatively little variation from basic Sunni theology for some time (apart from putting greater emphasis on their demands for a hereditary line of succession) until after the killing of the second of Ali's sons. They adopted a number of distinctive doctrines and beliefs, they rejected the principle that community consensus determined Muslim law and justice, and they adopted the doctrine that in every age God entrusted the guidance of his servants to an infallible Imam. This was a modification or a refinement of the alternative view of succession mentioned above.

PARALLEL CONFLICTS OVER DOGMA

It is noteworthy that the Shi'ites were adopting such a position at the same time that the church in Rome was having great difficulty trying to rationalize conflicting statements and dogma which had been supported by successive equally infallible pontiffs. It was not the first such incident and it certainly was not the last, but its importance lies in the fact that it involved Patriarch Sergius who held office in Constantinople from 610 to 638. His period in office directly coincided with the period of Muhammad's ministry from 610 to 632, the early growth of Islam, and some of the greatest conquests by Caliphs Abu Bakr and 'Umar, including the victory over the Byzantine forces at al-Ajnadin in July 634, the surrender of Damascus in September 635 and the battle of the Yarmuk in 636. Sergius got into trouble with the church because of his efforts to reduce the controversy over Monophysite theology. There is little doubt that he was influenced by the vigour of Muhammad's teaching that there is one God and that Christ, the Messiah, was a human instrument of God's will, and it is reasonable to assume that he was trying to reduce the points of friction with the Muslims.

Sergius redefined the two natures of Christ in terms of an intimate union of divine and human wills so that Christ had only one natural-divine human energy. He persuaded Pope Honorius I to approve this line of teaching and in 638 Emperor Heraclius issued a statement of faith, the Ecthesis, drafted by Sergius, forbidding the use of the term 'energies', whether one or two, in defining the person of Christ, and asserting that the two natures were united in one will, ("monothelism"). These actions did not resolve the crisis of defining Christ for the church but deepened it and in 655 at a Lateran Synod Pope Martin I rejected the statement as heresy. He was "maltreated" – presumably that means tortured – and "banished to the Crimea where he soon died as a result of this treatment." However a General Council, summoned by the emperor, meeting in Constantinople from November 680 to September 681 and chaired by the Papal Legates put the record straight by condemning monothelism, Sergius, Pope Honorius and others. Such was the church's distorted self-understanding and so great was its arrogance that even in the circumstances of the time anyone who wanted to accommodate Muhammad's thinking in even the slightest way just had to be put down. The council confirmed the previous decision of the Council of Chalcedon that: "Corresponding to the two natures which are united without confusion and separation in the God-man Christ, there are also two wills and two energies, divine and human, which without confusion and separation act together for the redemption of mankind." Pope Leo II was not present at the council but he must have realized that the council had undermined the concept of papal infallibility and, shortly after he had approved the decisions of the council and the condemnation of Pope Honorius, he issued a defence of his predecessor. He said he did not accuse Honorius of direct participation in the heresy but simply reproached him because "he had not smothered the fire of the heretical doctrine in the beginning, as became his apostolic authority, but had promoted it through his negligence."^{12 13} An interesting concept: infallibility and negligence in making decisions and determining doctrine are apparently compatible, together with sleazy politics, as confirmed by Bettenson.

Chalcedon left the Eastern Monophysites in schism, and the Monophysite tendency of the Second Council of Constantinople had not repealed the Chalcedonian definition. Meanwhile the threat to the Eastern Empire from the Persians and the Arabs made the schism politically dangerous. Cyrus, Patriarch of Alexandria, encouraged by the Emperor Heraclius, suggested to Pope Honorius that the schismatics might be reconciled by a formula (which had been put forward by Sergius of Constantinople) which admitted the two natures but only one 'divine-human operation or will'.

Bettenson then explains why Honorius accepted this formula which was published by Heraclius in 638 and continues:

But the successors of Honorius saw in it the thin edge of the a Monophysite wedge, and Martin in 649 condemned the Ecthesis. There followed a schism which lasted until 681, when the Arab conquest of Egypt and Syria left no reason for conciliating the Monophysites at the expense of antagonizing the West. The Emperor deposed the patriarch, asked Pope Agatho for guidance, and a council reckoned as the Sixth Ecumenical met in the Trullus (domed chamber) of the palace. The Monothelites, including Honorius, were condemned, and the schism was ended.¹⁴

It is interesting to ponder whether the Shi'a were aware of that incident and the implications and the trauma behind it when they prepared their own doctrine of infallibility. Husain was martyred on October 10th 681, just three weeks after the council in Constantinople issued its final statement and the trauma of that incident would have surely encouraged early discussion on their own doctrines. In any case the circumstances of Husain's death encouraged them to adopt a more rigid approach to the question of succession to the caliphate. They also encouraged the development of myths which quickly assumed historical credibility for most adherents. These myths raised expectations for the return of the Imam and are held with the same intensity as their overall faith for those who hold them.

Having adopted the doctrinal position that God will always provide an infallible imam, the Shi'a leadership had to teach that the faithful must, as a principle of Islam, or a pillar of faith, believe in all Imams and in particular in the Imam of their own time. This had the effect of raising the status of the caliphs and led to a web of mythology growing around them as well, especially when the Abbasids seized power with the support of the Shi'a. This was aggravated by the fact that when 'Uthman appointed a commission in 653 to collect and put in order an authorised version of the prophet's revelations, he also ordered that all others were to be suppressed or destroyed. He thought he was simplifying religion and avoiding contentious debate. He fell into the same trap as the church three or four centuries before him. He and his advisers took on themselves the personal responsibility of deciding what was the correct and final word of God. He then set that selection on a pedestal at arm's length from the Bible on one hand and the Talmud on the other. The Qur'an became to the Muslim what the Bible was to the Christian. Muhammad's call for Muslims to read the books of the other two partners was gradually downgraded. The world had gone from one to two and then to three competitively pushed versions of God's final word. Not only that. It is a matter of great concern that personal judgement and bias played an important part in the selection and rejection of writings and records for both the Bible and the Qur'an. It is of considerable importance that while the church included the Book of Revelation in its Bible, without even knowing who wrote it, Uthman's commission did not include the full description of Muhammad's Night Journey. The differing status of these two important works has consequently provided fuel for bitter disputes. Similarly, the inclusion of material from different periods of Muhammad's ministry, without any indication of sequence, means that some material which was little more than battle orders issued during his later years when he was in conflict with units of the church which were more extravagant in their priestly practices have the same status as his earlier fundamental revelations. This has had several serious consequences. Firstly, it makes the Qur'an subject to the same kind of disputes as the Bible over the question of inerrancy. Secondly, it has given Christians who want to be mischievous ample opportunity to denigrate the prophet. Thirdly, it has enabled radical Muslims who want to take a hard line against unbelievers to do so in the name of the prophet with impunity. The overall effect has naturally been to widen the gulf between Muslims and Christians and Jews, especially since the re-invigoration of Islam in the 1970s, to heighten the dangers and to increase the urgency of a joint re-assessment of their self-understandings. Of course it is obvious that if the church had responded differently to Muhammad's challenge in the first place the pattern of subsequent events would have been completely different.

As already noted, dissatisfaction with 'Uthman's succession and his reign led to rebellion in several areas, a small Holy War was launched against Medina in 656, the local population did not come to his aid and he was murdered. When 'Ali assumed the Caliphate it was his turn to be the centre of battles legal and military to determine his right to the office and it is hardly surprising that he, too, was murdered five years later. He had based his Caliphate not at Medina but at Kufa in Iraq and on his demise the placing of the capital provided a spring board for the mixed populations of Persia and Iraq to try to shake off Arab domination. They supported the Party of Ali in a struggle with the rest, including most of the tribes of Syria, Palestine, the Arabian Peninsula and Egypt, who supported a Caliphate of the Umayyads. This was when the competing parties each developed doctrines and historical material – some of it no better than propaganda – to support its case, often clutching at straws in the wind and introducing themes foreign to Islam,. These helped to perpetuate the division and introduced twists which Muhammad would never have approved. They ignored the prophet's advice about not splitting into sects and failed to learn from the troubles of the Christian church.

Just as Rome had latched on to apostolic succession through Peter, the Shiites developed their claims of transmission by inheritance of a divine element from Adam to Muhammad, Ali and his successors.¹⁵ They claim that 'Ali is second only to Muhammad. Mainstream Shi'ites do not elevate him any higher than that, but some sects within the Shi'a believe that 'Ali is the only true ruler of Islam's destinies and have developed beliefs that he has Messianic authority which will somehow be restored in due time. That belief is linked to the recognition by the Imamites, or Twelvers, of twelve Imams in the 'Ali-Fatima line of succession, despite the fact that the Abbasids systematically eliminated all known descendants of 'Ali or, perhaps, because of the fact that they were eliminated. The last of them, Muhammad al-Mahdi, is reputed to have disappeared in 880 and the sect believes that he will come again as the Guided One to restore justice and righteousness to the world. A similar belief, not unlike Christian belief in the second coming of Christ, has become widely accepted in other Shi'a communities as well.

As already noted, the Caliphate stayed with the orthodox Umayyad and followed a dynastic line until 750 when the Abbasids seized power with the support of the Shi'a and troubles (which will be discussed in chapter eleven) burst again. But in the meantime much was happening further west. Although their rulers had adopted Roman Catholicism in place of Arianism for the sake of peace, the Visigoths still wanted independence from the Byzantine Empire and they succeeded in pitching the last of the Greeks out of Spain in 631. Similarly, the Lombards took Genoa in 640 and were well on the way to pushing Byzantium right out of Italy. To the north of the Black Sea the Khazars were expanding rapidly and by 650 they controlled the Volga about as far as Moscow, and the Bulgars, forced out by the Khazars, were encroaching on more Byzantine territory along the Danube. However they had not reached their eventual home in modern Bulgaria. They were quick to take full advantage of the defeat of the Byzantine navy by the Arabs in 655 to wring further territorial concessions out of Constantinople.

THE CHURCH GAINS INFLUENCE IN BRITAIN

While Constantinople was fighting for its life, the church and politics were getting well and truly entangled across the Channel in the British Isles. They have never really been disentangled since. The church was already well established in the Roman controlled part of Britain when Constantine was there, and as there had been no deliberate program of evangelism from Rome it is most probable that Christianity had been introduced by travelers who simply recognized Jesus' command to take the Gospel with them wherever they went. Like the Ethiopians, they must have asked for priests to be provided and the church grew as a consequence of that. The first clerics may have come from the community of Martin of Tours.¹⁶ Although British bishops attended councils of the church from time to time, with York, London and one other centre being represented at Arles in 314, (mentioned in chapter 2 page 18), it appears that the doctrinal conflicts debated at those councils were not carried into Britain. It also appears that the church in Britain held to a fairly orthodox line and remained reasonably well integrated until Pelagius clashed with Augustine over grace and sin.

Pelagius, an Irish-born monk who received his training in Britain, went to Rome to teach sometime within a few years either side of 400. At the time that he was embroiled in bitter controversy with Augustine, a Welsh teenager named Patrick was either toiling as a slave-herdsman in Ireland or studying for the ministry after his escape. Historical detail about the two men is very thin (in contrast to the mythology which has flourished around them) but we can piece together a brief outline of what happened. Patrick was probably born in 385 because he was about 16 when he was captured by Irish pirates and put to work at Mayo in Western Ireland about 401.^{17 18} If he was at Mayo for six years before receiving a divine message, escaping and persuading some sailors to give him free passage to Britain, it means he was at Mayo from about 401 to 407. By the later date, 407, Pelagius was most certainly teaching theology in Rome. He left for Africa in 409 or 410, when the Goths were menacing the city, and moved to Palestine shortly afterwards. It was 411 when the Council of Carthage condemned his teaching, and Augustine attacked him with vigor during the following few years.

Pelagius' crime was that he tried to vindicate ascetic monasticism against the criticism of Manichaeists by emphasizing man's freedom to choose good by virtue of His God-given nature. The denial of the transmission of original sin from Adam which was probably implied by his teaching was then taken up by his colleagues. Thus, in order to protect one of his pet hobby horses, his teaching on original sin, Augustine had to attack not only those who had criticized him but also Pelagius who had given them a base from which to do it. Pelagius was accused of heresy by Orosius who had been sent by Augustine as one of his hatchet men to enlist the support of Jerome in Palestine. Pelagius cleared himself at a synod in Jerusalem only to be condemned and excommunicated by two successive Popes, Innocent 1 and Zozimus, in 416 and 418. His fate is uncertain but the circumstances suggest he lost his head as well as his church membership at that point. Other theologians took up the case, either as it was, or in the modified form of semi-Pelagianism in the hope of seeing reason prevail, but the council of Ephesus in 431 finally closed the chapter with another dastardly decision in favour of the memory of Augustine. (Chapter 6, page 10.) Or at least they thought they had closed it.

The views of Pelagius had taken anchor in Britain and in parts of Gaul and they continued to influence the course of religious thinking for a long time until they were simply swamped by the tide of events. In the same year as the council in Ephesus, Pope Celestine I showed Rome's first streak of interest in Ireland by sending a mere deacon named Palladius as the first bishop to the Christians among the Irish.¹⁹ Whether the need to suppress those ideas of Pelagius in his home country had anything to do with the decision or not is uncertain. Palladius was followed the very next year by that former slave-herdsman, Patrick, then about 47 years of age, who may have been a student for the ministry 24 years earlier while Pelagius was teaching in Rome. But Patrick had been sent back to Ireland not by Rome but by the church authorities in Britain with the role which he described himself as 'Bishop in Ireland'.²⁰ Whether Patrick had been trained solely in Britain or also in Gaul is disputed, but it probably doesn't matter either way. Similarly it is uncertain whether, as a teenager, he ever met Pelagius or heard of him as a theologian, or whether he was sent to counter the influence of Rome's nominee, Palladius. However, as he set up monasteries, ordained clergy, monks and nuns, preached, evangelized, arbitrated inter-tribal disputes and generally organized the church in Ireland, he did so with a distinctly Pelagian outlook. Ireland and Scotland north of the Firth were never brought within the Roman Empire and so even prior to the expulsion of Roman Rule about 407 any Christianity in those regions had still been organized from England. After that expulsion the position had gradually changed. Successive waves of new settlers began arriving by cross-channel invasions to dominate particular regions and although the church began to fragment it was basically the same religious presence across all of southern Britain.

SYNCRETISM AND MORE BATTLE CONVERSIONS

The Jutes and the Frisians in the first waves assimilated fairly readily, but the Angles and the Saxons who followed brought their own particularly vigorous forms of paganism, very manly, priestly and somewhat like the religion of the early Greeks.²¹ They didn't assimilate, they dominated, and for a period the church was virtually pushed out of East Anglia and the south east which reverted to pagan control under the Anglo-Saxons.²² Because of the established links between Ireland and Scotland, and the disruptive influence of the Anglo-Saxons in the south of Britain, efforts to evangelize Scotland from Ireland instead of from England were stepped up. Patrick's influence went with them. Several factors then combined to introduce a degree of competition between the Celtic churches, led and serviced from Ireland, and the churches in the south of Britain. There was the geographical separation of Ireland from Britain. There was the very important fact that the Irish and the Picts north of the Firth had retained control of their territories while invaders from Europe were continually changing the whole character of the south of Britain, and this was now coupled with the gradual colonization of the north west coast of Britain by Irish settlers who took the new name 'Scots'. Then there was the strong organizational flair which Patrick had introduced, with monasteries and the growth of teaching orders on an unprecedented scale, and the continuing influence of the former local boy, Pelagius.

On top of all that the population instability in the south of Britain and competition between a number of petty Anglo-Saxon kingdoms made it easier for Rome to re-exert its influence and to counter the Pelagian heresy. Two distinct streams developed within the church as if to illustrate the regionalizing influence of theological dispute. Armagh, in northern Ireland, controlled Ireland and north Britain, and Rome controlled south Britain. Then enter the politics. In 596 Pope Gregory sent a prior and forty monks to reinforce the church in Britain. They set up a base at Canterbury near the channel coast of Kent and, by some means, persuaded Ethelbert, one of the Anglo-Saxon kings, to accept baptism at Christmas the next year. Ten thousand of his people went through the ritual with him. No wonder, if the pope's letter of 601 is any guide to the understanding expected of them. He sent instructions that the people were to be allowed their harmless external pleasures and that as many as possible of the pre-Christian religious customs should be used so that they would be more easily filled with Christian spirit and contentment!²³ Deliberate syncretism. Nothing circumstantial about that. Kent officially adopted Christianity on that basis about the time that Muhammad was establishing his infant Islamic community at Medina. It was followed about 624, (the year of the Battle of Badr), by Wessex and about 633, (while 'Umar was sweeping from one conquest to another), by Northumbria.

The Northumbrian conversion was another of the church's 'inspirations'. Some say that it was a sick-bed job and others that it was a battle-banner job like Constantine's. King Edwin had come to the throne in 617. He married a Christian in 625, personally accepted baptism in 627 and was killed in battle in 633. When he died there was a reversion to the pre-Christian religions. King Oswald, his successor, had been forced into exile among the Scots on his father's death in 616 when he was a lad of eleven. He became a convert to Christianity due to the influence of Irish monks from the Island of Iona in the Hebrides. On returning to claim his Northumbrian crown he stuck a wooden cross in the ground on the battlefield of Heavenfield and proceeded to do battle with his rival, Caedwallon.²⁴ He won. He thereupon sent for some of the Irish monks at Iona to help put down some of the anti-Christian reaction. He triggered tension between the Roman and the Irish missionaries. Poor fellow. He wasn't to know that Christianity is not one simple set of beliefs! He didn't understand the niceties of clerical and theological debate. He was only interested in community and social development and allowed large scale evangelization by the Irish-based Celtic church. Monasteries sprung up everywhere to become centres of education and a strong civilizing influence. On the other hand Mercia was holding to its brand of Catholicized paganism which carried not only Gregory's approval but his encouragement.

It is interesting to ponder the state of communications at that time between Britain and the rest of the world, outside the tight-reined system of the church, that is. We can only wonder whether Oswald would have known that while he was using the teachings of the Celtic wing of the church in his military battle at Heavenfield and being locked into his political battle over the teachings of the Roman and Celtic wings that some of their teachings and practices were being banned in the Muslim world under the Pact of 'Umar dated 637. It may be that the Christians were abusing the religious freedoms which 'Umar had allowed them when he visited Jerusalem nine years earlier, or it may be that authorised public displays of Christian ritual were continuing to distract waverers from the recognition and worship of God as the compassionate, merciful sole creator and absolute judge. Again it probably doesn't really matter, because the consequences would have been the same anyway.

Whatever made it necessary, Christians in Syria and Palestine were subjected to restrictions which did not apply to Jews or to people of other religions. They were barred from carrying religious images in public, displaying crosses on churches or in the street, chanting loudly at funeral processions, shaving the front of their heads or wearing distinctive clothing. In addition, Christians were not to harbour spies in their churches, prevent a Christian from converting to Islam, convert Muslims to Christianity, imitate Muslims, strike them, or remain seated when they entered a meeting.²⁵ The Pact of 'Umar was one of the very few pieces of legislation which actively discriminated between people on religious grounds during the long period of the Islamic Empire. Even if Oswald did know about the conflict between Islam and Christianity and even if he understood the implications behind that pact it is doubtful whether he enjoyed the political strength or security to be able to force his churches to take it into account. His kingdom of Northumbria and the neighbouring kingdom of Mercia, being the major Anglo-Saxon kingdoms, became locked in a long term struggle for the control of Britain in which the support and agitation of their respective sponsor churches was a significant factor.

In 642 Mercia gained control of most of Britain south of the Humber except for Wales and the south west which, by then, were the only areas still controlled by the pre-invasion British. Even Northumbria owed it some subject allegiance. But, only twelve years later, Northumbria turned the tables. It regained the dominant position and even made the Welsh, Picts and Scots mere vassal states. The tension between the two churches ran high. A synod was held at Streaneshalch, near Whitby, in 664, but it seems that the differences in theology and practices were only patched over and not resolved. The tension continued to run high with a rash of struggles between Mercia and Northumbria and the next Northumbrian king tried his own solution. He officially adopted the Roman position and severed formal links with the Ireland-based Celtic church in an effort to gain the support of the church in the south. Even so, the Northumbrians were unable to hold their grip on Britain.

Within a generation of the beginning of the power struggle the smaller Anglo-Saxon kingdoms in the south changed their allegiance back to Mercia with its 'natural' Roman connections. Following the Synod of Whitby the fanatical and unscrupulous Wilfrid of York who had trained with the Celts in Lindisfarne, and Theodore, Archbishop of Canterbury from 668 to 690, had tried to eliminate all Irish influence and even refused to recognize orders conferred either on or by Irish missionaries.²⁶ Sussex, previously not involved in the alliances and disputes, also adopted the pro-Roman position some time in the 680s (just after Sergius had been anathematized by the council in Constantinople). By 695 the Picts and the Scots on the other hand had thrown off the Northumbrian political yoke and strengthened their connections with their Celtic co-religionists. In spite of the pressure from Rome to suppress the independence of the Irish church it began to have a very big impact on the life of the church overall through an intense missionary zeal and the development of the practices of Confession and Penance. These things in turn brought Ireland and Rome closer together and by about 740 the church in Ireland was back in the fold and the hatchet had been buried

Unfortunately it was dug up again later to be used not against Rome but against England during the bitter power struggle of the Reformation period. Ireland had not lost its independence of spirit. It had simply reached an accommodation with Rome. Perhaps it might be more accurate to say that Rome reached both an accommodation with Ireland and a relationship with it which it built on and exploited as the years passed. From the days of Patrick, Ireland had developed a fervour for Christianity which had not been seen anywhere in Europe. Being an almost totally rural country with no towns of any significance its circumstances encouraged the establishment of monasteries on a clan basis. The life and organization of every community was very soon closely linked to its monastery which was the focal point for education, nursing, trading and local political decision making as well as worship. The abbot tended to become the most powerful man in the district as well as the spiritual leader. It was a natural development. It was also a natural development that young men should be attracted to the monastic life in large numbers, especially when a surplus of rural manpower was another regular feature of the environment.

Security was important. Life in the monasteries gradually became more and more rigorous. Celibacy, regarded as the norm in European monasteries, became obligatory in Ireland. Worship and celebration of the ritual of the Mass became more and more regular until the monks in many monasteries were required to practice hourly prayer. Penitential discipline, austerity and hardship became such hallmarks of personal virtue and achievement among young monks that they were often imitated by clan members outside the monasteries. The number of members of a family who entered monasteries became a matter of pride and competition and was flaunted as an indicator of a family's piety and moral worth. Very quickly the practice of confessing to a monk-priest and private penance became general.

Public penance for major offences had been imposed by the church in Europe for a long time, but in Ireland the practice began to take on a new dimension.²⁷ In Europe penance had generally been imposed on a confessing sinner only once in his lifetime, on completion of which he was declared reconciled and final remission of his sins was granted by a bishop acting, in the church's view anyway, as God's authorised agent. In Ireland the priests began to declare immediate absolution on hearing confession, whether it was weekly, daily or at the drop of the latest thought of criminal intent – or sex. While some abuses of priestly power were reduced, such as the extraction of a confessor's wealth from him for penance on his death bed, there was room for much more abuse in other ways and the manipulative power of a priest over his flock reached new heights – or depths. He was provided with a catalogue of sins and corresponding penance and he was expected to have a working knowledge of it so that he could handle penitential discipline correctly. Confession before communion became the regular thing.

Before many of these practices had been finely tuned by the church, Irish missionaries were seen in many parts of Europe including Gaul, Italy and Germany. Among the best known was Columban-the-Younger who established several European missions and the abbey of Bobbio in Italy between 590 and 615. To say that he introduced a higher religio-ethical standard than the Frankish kingdoms were accustomed to is to damn him with faint praise, but it is a fact. By the time that Muhammad moved home to Medina there were hundreds of Irish priests in Europe, often identified by a leather shoulder bag containing their books and a neck-capsule for consecrated bread for the mass – and their sacred relics. If those things were not enough to identify them, their tall travelling staffs, beards and long flowing hair around shaven foreheads certainly were.²⁸ Possibly Oswald knew something about the Pact of ‘Umar after all. However, when the political instability in Britain in the 680s and 690s highlighted the need for Rome to be reconciled with Ireland the availability of these missionaries, whom Theodore had previously refused to recognize, became one means towards reconciliation. They were given recognition and packed off with a new wave of missionaries from the Anglo-Saxon monasteries, some of which the Irish had built and staffed anyway, and most of which showed strong Irish influence. They took with them their penitentials and by the early 700s the Irish version of the confessional and penance had been adopted throughout the Western Church.

TOWARDS A HOLY ROMAN EMPIRE

At this point Anglo-Saxon cum Irish influence reached its first peak within the church and across Europe. The second peak would come after the Reformation, but at the moment we are only approaching the establishment of the Holy Roman Empire. One Anglo-Saxon name, Wynfrith Boniface, is inseparably linked with that little exercise. But our starting point is Wilfrid of York. It was Wilfrid who had introduced the Benedictine monastic system in 650 at Ripon, possibly because of dissatisfaction with the Celtic system, but possibly because of his views on papal primacy. He had been largely responsible for engineering the result of the Synod of Whitby to strengthen the papal position in Britain. For that reason he was not wanted at York, to which Rome had appointed him as bishop, and when he arrived to take up his post he found it occupied by a Northumbrian appointee named Chad. Wilfrid had to rely on Theodore to rearrange things in his favour in 669 but nine years later Theodore cut the see of York into two and Wilfrid ran off to appeal to the pope. He was sent off to preach among the Frisians in Holland until about 686 when he regained his post in York, only to be forced to flee back to Frisia a few years later with several of his Ripon students. One of them, Willibrord, became associated with the Frankish mayor, Pepin, gained papal support and started a monastery for the Franks at Echternach, in modern day Luxembourg, in 697.

The following year, 698, news came that Carthage had fallen to the Muslims. The Byzantines had been losing their grip on North Africa for a generation or so. It wasn't only a question of military power which had become very difficult to maintain but, rather, one of allegiance. The Muslims had been gaining converts to their faith and their system of provincial government also looked very attractive to the Berbers. Now they had gone over to the Muslims in large numbers and the Byzantine garrison had been unable to hold out any longer. The Muslims were moving across North Africa with the same ease that Vandals had 260 years before. Orthodox Roman Christianity was being evicted from North Africa for the second time. The Muslims would soon be at Gibraltar and then the church would be under pressure from a pincer movement. Well, at least it had been able to rescue Augustine's remains and enshrine them at Padua in northern Italy. Then: enter Boniface.

BONIFACE

In church tradition Boniface is credited with converting the Germans to Christianity by felling the pagan Oak of Thor, but while he helped to establish a dominant position for the church in Germany, his exploits are smothered in myths which have elevated him in public esteem. He was born at Crediton in Devon of proud pre-invasion British stock. His forebears had managed to avoid becoming involved in the church's politics in Britain until 26 years before he was born when Northumbria, with its Celtic church sympathies overlaying pagan religions, gained control of the South West country and Wales. Then came the forty year period of politicking with Wilfrid and Theodore and the Romanization of the southern kingdoms one by one, and Boniface was born right in the middle of it. The date is uncertain. It could have been as early as 672 or as late as 680.^{29 30} He was reared in monasteries at Exeter and Nursling to become a monk whether he liked it or not. His early work was teaching at Nhutscelle where he had received his own higher education. Then in 716 when he was about 40 he was sent to join Willibrord in the Frisian dukedom of the Frankish Kingdom. Mayor Pepin may have had five years to run in his pivotal position of power or he may have already been dead for two years, again depending on whose dates you work on.^{31 32} It was there that Wilfrid had been posted by the pope in lieu of York in 678. Boniface was imbued with the Augustinian view of the church and world power and he continued in the role of papal political manipulator in the Frankish Kingdom which Wilfrid and Willibrord had set up very well.

To describe him as a missionary is to use that term in a way in which it is not understood today. He knew that if provincial rulers were coerced into adopting a particular religious position the whole population had to follow suit. Whereas the earlier generation of Irish/British missionary monks had concentrated on man-to-man evangelism among the ordinary people of the Frankish Kingdom, he quickly became involved in upper level politics to coerce provincial nobility away from the Frankish church camp and into the papal church camp. Naturally enough, when the new mayor of the Frankish palace, Charles Martel, (a son of Pepin and by then the effective power in the kingdom), did battle with the Duke of Frisia to put a stop to that silly nonsense Boniface had to do a disappearing act. He had blotted his copy book. He returned to England.

A MUSLIM PUSH TO CRUSH IDOLATRY

It was while he was there that the Arab Muslims mounted their biggest offensive against the Byzantine Empire. They were determined to bring it down and thereby crush the idolatry and polytheism out of its Christianity once and for all by capturing Constantinople. Then there would only be Rome left to deal with and it didn't have the military backing of an empire – yet. The pincer movement was already beginning to take effect, although the Arabs do not seem to have been working to a master plan and some historians maintain that if they had ignored the western approach and thrown all of their available resources into the eastern approach they would have quickly overwhelmed Rome. If that had been the case, history would have taken a markedly different course and we would now be looking at relationships between the religions in the troubled triangle from a totally uncharted perspective. On the western flank, the first Berber crossing into Spain in 711 had developed into a broad frontal movement which, with the support of the strong Jewish minority, had soaked up Spain like a sponge. Within two years the Muslims had reached the Pyrenees Mountains. After another two years, 715, they had firm control over all of Spain except for the northern regions of the Asturias and the Basques.³³ On the eastern flank Armenia had finally fallen in 717 and this freed Arab forces to support the drawn out naval push on Constantinople which, on that occasion, failed.

The church knew it would have to change its tack. It no longer had the means of coercing the nobility. What was more important, the Muslims would soon come sweeping across the plains of southern France. They didn't have to defeat the Basques. They could bypass them. It was really no wonder at all that the Jews were happy to see the Berbers and the Arabs arrive. Armed with Justinian's inglorious Corpus Juris Civilis the church had made life distinctly uncomfortable, especially after the Visigoth King Recared had adopted Catholicism for the sake of peace. On the other hand the Visigothic people, having reluctantly accepted Catholicism in place of Arianism, had no love for either Byzantium or Rome and showed very little fight. Of course the church blamed the Jews. It could never admit to being its own worst enemy. It could never admit to the sheer inhumanity of the minutely detailed regulations which it drew up in councils at Toledo, with the king presiding, such as that prescribing how Jewish children were to be seized, taken from their families and brought up in orthodox Catholic households.

THE NEED FOR AN ARMY

Rome desperately needed the support of an army. With the Lombards mounting their final push to expel the last of the Byzantine forces from Italy, the fledgling Papal States could do little more than defend the Vatican, if that. Byzantium was crumbling and it would never again be able to defend the authority of the church in the west. It was having to cede more territory to the Bulgars as the price for support in the desperate defence of Constantinople. The pope knew it. Willibrord and Boniface knew it. Charles Martel knew it. In any case the pope didn't want Byzantium interfering any more. As Boniface left England in 718 for an audience with the pope it was little consolation that because of the support of the Bulgars and the brilliance of the new emperor and his Greek engineers in preparing new defences, the Muslim Sulaiman was being repulsed in his bid to capture Constantinople. Boniface was deeply concerned about the church's daunting responsibility to carry the Good News of the Gospel throughout the world.

How could it possibly be achieved without large scale forces? Of course Boniface was not alone in the church in being unable to grasp the concept of evangelism by example and teaching. If it was able to understand the concept, the church leadership generally was either too impatient or lacked the confidence and the ability to put it into practice. Perhaps both. Once the decision had been taken to simply expand the church's sphere of influence by absorbing whole populations through leadership change-of-religion the die was cast. Coercion and force were needed because conflict was inevitable. The pope knew that. Boniface and Charles Martel knew it, too. And the very fact that the decision was taken demonstrates not only that the church's understanding of salvation was quite inadequate but also that its self-understanding was spurious.

Yes, the church could point to Islam and say "the Muslims are doing it," but what did that prove? Only that the church had still not understood the role of Islam. It wanted to plant another forest and not look for the cause of the fire in the present one. It couldn't even emulate the religious tolerance shown by the Muslims after they occupied each new area. At least that was the general stance of the church. There were a few exceptions. Among them was Emperor Leo III in Constantinople. But what did he know about such matters? He was only a layman. The clergy's view was that he should shut his mouth and let them get on with their job! They had decided in 692 at the Council of Trullanum II in Constantinople, (eleven years after the previous council there had condemned Sergius), that Islam was simply Arab militarism veiled in religious propaganda and that the use of images and relics in Christian worship was quite proper. And yet there he was, he had only seized the throne the previous year, just in time to tighten up the capital's defences to defeat the Saracens, and he was trying to order the church around. Leo was adamant that Islam was an instrument of God's will, sent to discipline the church. He was campaigning to end the extravagant use of art treasures, raving against the idolatrous use of icons and attacking the worship of Mary. The dominant view among the church's power brokers was: "He doesn't know what he's talking about! What a pity he's got the support of a handful of ratbag bishops, otherwise we, the clergy, might be able to do something about him!"

As a result of Leo's attitude, relations between Rome and Constantinople had become very strained and such thoughts were no doubt in the pope's mind when he instructed Boniface to return to Frisia with Willibrord. Again the English monk found that it wasn't all beer and skittles politicking out there in the Frankish provinces. After four years divided between Frisia and the German provinces Boniface found that he was unable to work with the Irish, Scottish and Frankish missionaries already there and that he was not gaining sufficient response from the dominant, wealthy nobility. He headed for Rome again to seek reinforced authority and swore an oath of specially close allegiance to Rome. He was consecrated a bishop and given letters from the pope to Charles Martel.³⁴ That was the turning point in Rome's relations with the Franks. Whatever those letters said, they brought special guarantees of protection for Boniface from Charles Martel. Thereafter the Anglo-Saxon bishop worked with an eye towards benefits for both camps. Whatever his suburbicarian oath to the pope meant in terms of his relations with the churches of the Franks and the British Isles, he undoubtedly had obligations to both the pope and the mayor of the Frankish palace. He was in a very delicate situation.

In 722 the pope and Charles Martel shared a common concern that the Muslims had broken out of Spain. They had succeeded in getting control of the narrow coastal pass between the Mediterranean and the eastern ridge of the Pyrenees. After that the Visigoths in southern France offered little more resistance than their colleagues had in Spain. As a result the Muslims held all the Mediterranean coast as far as the River Rhone and they were half way to Lyon. They only had to break through the westward pass from Carcassonne to Villefranche and they were on their way to Toulouse, Bordeaux and the heartland of the Frankish Kingdom. No formal alliance was entered into at that stage, but it is clear that the messages which Boniface relayed back and forth between the pope and Charles Martel involved an understanding that if the Frankish palace supported the church of Rome instead of its own independent church, then the church of Rome would support the Frankish palace. Boniface had the job of ensuring that the understanding was acted upon. There had to be quite a change of heart from Rome's earlier efforts to tear away the Frankish allegiances province by province, but Boniface was obviously a very competent politician.

Parties of monks and nuns, and financial aid, were sent from the British Isles to relieve Boniface of much of his work in Germany – and to strengthen his position in Frisia. It was about that time that the tax known as 'Peter's Pence' was devised in England. In modern understanding it is applied for the maintenance of the pope and his works of charity, and it is collected generally throughout Roman Catholic communities.³⁵ But at that stage it probably helped support Boniface and the British-staffed conversion programs in Europe. Originally levied on St. Peter's Day each year at the rate of one penny per Catholic household, it was at the centre of some of the church's troubles during a later period.

The situation for the church continued to worsen. By 725 it was getting desperate. The Muslims were through the pass and heading for the centre of France. Boniface concentrated on tightening the church's organization and on fortifying his positions. It was likely that the monasteries would have to be defended. Pope Gregory II died in February 731 but work went on without interruption. In fact Boniface was in the thick of the politics which gave Charles Martel direct control over the German provinces as well as France. When Muslim armies reached Tours the next year, 732, they were more than half way across France. The new pope, Gregory III, appointed Boniface Archbishop-at-large with even greater organizational authority. He had wide powers to set up new monasteries and to establish new bishoprics, and the links with the Frankish palace had to be tightened even further. Then came Poitiers. Charles Martel called on the support of the Lombards, mounted a massive counter attack against the Muslims and won decisively. Muslim morale was shattered and their capacity to regroup quickly to move forward was destroyed. Frankish military morale was buoyant. The tide had turned. If all went well the Frankish armies would be back in Bordeaux within five years and on their way to Toulouse again.

The church should have been in a very good frame of mind, but it wasn't. It was that man Leo III causing trouble again. After the victory over the Saracens he went quiet for a while but then he got a bee in his bonnet about Islam and started publishing all sorts of regulations restricting the use of icons. In 726 he issued an edict that the worship of images, pictures and relics was idolatrous and must stop. Iconoclasm was in full swing and, not satisfied with the response, he directed that all such icons should be systematically destroyed. The majority of the clergy opposed the decree and argued publicly that the icons should be maintained. They could not see that in parts of the empire, and especially in the Balkans, Christianity was little more than superstition, morally and intellectually degraded.³⁶ They believed that the saints represented on the icons exercised beneficial powers through them, that they presided at all important events of human life wherever the icons were displayed, and that the icons themselves were a powerful channel of grace.³⁷ Violence broke out in many areas. In 730, in the closing stages of his papacy, Gregory II had spoken out against the emperor at a synod in Italy and Leo promptly responded by extending the prohibition of image worship throughout the empire, including the remaining Byzantine provinces of Italy. He deposed the Roman-appointed patriarch of Constantinople, seized part of the papal lands and placed the dioceses of South Italy and Sicily under the direct control of Constantinople. (In fact, because of continuing wars in the east, he could not enforce those decisions in the west.) It is hardly surprising therefore that another of Gregory III's first actions on assuming the papal office was to anathematize Leo and to excommunicate all who supported or took part in the destruction of the icons or, in Italy, statues.

The whole controversy played into the hands of the Lombard kings who, having accepted Catholicism, were open contenders for political power in Italy. Morale in the church in Rome was low but that of the Frankish church, which was still largely controlled by the degenerate and perverse royal household, was up like that of its army. Why should they take any notice of Boniface or anyone else from Rome? So Boniface paid another visit to Rome in 737/738. The Arabs had continued their push north and had just defeated the armies of the Khazar Khanate. It must have been uppermost in the Pope's mind that the Khanate would shortly convert en masse to Islam and when it did the Arabs would have a very powerful ally and a stepping stone on the route through Russia to eastern and northern Europe and Scandinavia. That put them in an even stronger position to move on Rome from both east and west. The Pope desperately needed to strengthen his alliances. He needed a diplomat capable of some very deft foot work. Boniface had arrived in Rome as an Archbishop but left as Papal Legate to the German provinces and the pope's personal envoy and negotiator. In 739 he carried a very special message from Pope Gregory III to Charles Martel. The Lombards were continuing to threaten an attack on Rome in spite of their conversion to Catholicism. The blunt question was whether Charles would enter an alliance against the Lombards and come to the pope's aid in the event of an attack. The answer was no. Charles needed continuing good relations with the Lombards so that in the event of the Muslims breaking north again or crossing the Rhone to the east he could call on their help again. He said the pope should negotiate a twenty-year peace treaty with the Lombards. The pope didn't have much option. He did as he was bid. Two years later both men – Charles Martel and the pope – were dead.

PIPPIN, BONIFACE AND AN ALLIANCE OF CONVENIENCE

Charles Martel had built on the authority which his father, Pepin, had established as mayor of both the German and French provinces and had virtually set up a dynastic succession. He was succeeded by his sons Carloman and Pippin as equally autocratic mayor-rulers of the French and German provinces respectively. Gregory III was succeeded as pope by a Greek named Zachary whose appointment was largely a matter of imperial politics. Rome became even more dependent on the goodwill of the Franks than it had been before, because of Lombard antagonism to a Byzantine pope. In turn the new pope became very heavily dependent on Boniface and his connections. Boniface was elevated, yet again, to the office of Papal Legate to the whole of the Frankish Kingdom. The power game was hotting up, both within the royal household and across Europe. When the king died his successor was such a puppet to the twin mayors as to be little more than an irritation at the breakfast table. Then in 747 Carloman relinquished his office of mayor for the French provinces and entered a monastery. Pippin wanted absolute authority. Boniface wanted total control of the Frankish church under the Roman umbrella. They were surprisingly accommodating. Boniface supported Pippin's claims and Pippin supported the organization of a combined synod assembled under the direction of Boniface. The synod sent the pope a solemn promise of loyalty.

The alliance had been concluded, but Pippin didn't like the thought of Boniface as a powerful competitor at the head of a body more tightly knit than his own civil administration. Boniface had done his dash. Pippin began to negotiate directly with the pope and set out to clip the legate's wings. He wanted no competition, either royal or religious. He asked the pope to clarify who should be regarded as king of the Franks: he with his power, or Childeric III with his crown. The pope was caught. To retain control of the church in the Frankish Kingdom which he had only just achieved – and to secure Pippin's military support against the Lombards – he had to dump the old monarchy which the church had originally sponsored for the very same purposes. Claiming the support of the supreme spiritual authority which his church, with his bidding, had just acknowledged, Pippin convoked the Diet of Soissons, had himself duly elected King of the Franks and was anointed by one of the Frankish bishops – in the pope's name, of course. Pippin had outmanoeuvred Rome and Pope Zachary didn't get his quid-pro-quo. But when he died and Stephen II, a Roman, assumed office in March 752 the new pope made another effort to get an alliance against both the Lombards and the Byzantines. He sent a special team to negotiate with Pippin. It did not include Boniface. He was to return to organizing missionary work in Frisia.

ICONS AND DONATIONS

The negotiations dragged on. They were still in progress in 753 when a synod at Hieria, convened by Emperor Leo's successor, Constantine V, re-opened the debate on icons. It declared those of Mary and the saints to be idols and those of Christ to be theologically unsound. It ordered their destruction. Persecution increased, and relations between Rome and Constantinople plunged further. Stephen's negotiators and Pippin reached agreement on the conditions for an alliance in January 754 and it was ratified in April.

Within a couple of months Pippin's Franks were doing battle for the pope to recover the territory in dispute with Constantinople. Boniface wasn't there either. The former monk from an insignificant little English village who had been largely responsible for engineering the Frankish-Roman alliance had been ambushed and killed in Frisia on June 5th. It would be another 46 years before the establishment of the Holy Roman Empire would be formalized, but the framework had been built. A few weeks later, on July 28th, with almost indecent haste, the pope apparently relied on a forged document, the 'Donation of Constantine', to justify re-anointing Pippin and anointing his two sons as well with imperial titles which implied Frankish responsibility for the protection of the western church. It was probably intended to bring about a break with imperial Byzantium. In any case it certainly hastened the process. The forged document was designed to show that Constantine had ceded sovereign authority over the whole of the western empire to Pope Sylvester when the capital was changed from Rome to Constantinople. It seems that if it had really been necessary to produce such a document, the 'donation' would have been used to substantiate Rome's claims to the imperial cities of Rome and Ravenna and to the whole of Italy. Pippin seems to have understood the message. Two years later he obliged. His armies swooped and cleared the Lombards from the disputed territories.

By then the Abbasids had been in power for six years. They had crushed the last Chinese army to be sent to Central Asia at the Battle on the Talas, they had virtually completed the elimination of the Umayyad Caliphate hierarchy and they were planning their next northward expansionist move. But perhaps the church in Rome had been getting the wrong vibes from the intelligence it received just after Pippin had claimed the Frankish crown. The Arabs, as we know, were being distracted by the question of succession but also by attempts to set up local-language forms of Islam, especially by the Berbers, in view of wide differences in culture between regions of the empire. The Abbasids, with their strong Persian links, saw themselves as bearers of the revealed law of religion and upholders of the Islamic form of personal and community life and government rather than as Iranian rulers of an empire and they had little interest in maintaining the power of an Arab empire. Their caliphs assumed roles something like a cross between popes and emperors with even a touch of the god-king philosophy which was the downfall of both Alexander the Great and Julius Caesar. They paraded as "the caliphs of God" and not of the prophet. Not being tied to the Arabs, they endeavoured to unify the Muslim world by showing that every ethnic group, men and women, slaves and masters, artisans and peasants were all equal before God and fighting for God's universal reign. But their simultaneous efforts to impose their own reign from above, to promote the idea that they were predestined to lead Islam, and the deification which they did nothing to discourage, meant that Islamic decision making lurched from popular consensus to decree by an isolated caliph.³⁸ This was consistent with the Shi'a philosophy but it meant that the Abbasids lost touch with large sections of the Arab community, the Berbers and the Moors, who each saw them as Iranian impostors and set out to tear the caliphate apart to retain what they each saw as true Islam. This was especially the case in Spain, furthest removed both geographically and ethnically from the new rulers in Baghdad, and local power struggles added to division between supporters of the Abbasids and the Umayyads. Spanish cohesion was lost.

Buoyed by the Frankish successes in pushing the Muslims back as far as the pass at Villefranche, the Christian communities rose against the weaker Muslim rulers and began to pick them off one by one. Rome was reprieved and the church survived the challenge of Islam. But it was victory by default. It was Islam's turn to suffer because of the inflated ego of its religious rulers and their misunderstanding of themselves, their role and God. The Arabs could be expected to fall back as they squabbled among themselves and the church should be prepared to follow, or so the reasoning ran in Rome. When Pippin died in 768 his two sons succeeded him but one died after only three years and the other, Charles, assumed full control of the Frankish Empire. In spite of his arranged marriage in 770 to a daughter of the Lombard king in an effort to absorb Italy without a fight, relations did not improve. The royal marriage was dissolved a year later. The Lombards threatened the cities claimed by the Pope who then called on Charles to honour his obligations and swore an oath of eternal friendship with him at the grave of Peter at Easter 774. Charles very obligingly put down the Lombards – completely this time – and assumed the title of king of the Lombards to go with his title king of the Franks. But he may have had a twinge of conscience. Instead of executing his former wife's father he packed him off to a monastery.

In Constantinople the new emperor, Leo IV, who was crowned in 775, thought the policy of religious reform had gone far enough. With Charles now hand in glove with the pope and surrounding his remaining Byzantine provinces in Italy, he feared for their security and called off the program of iconoclasm. He was just in time. A few years later, when Charles crowned one of his sons, Pepin, King of Italy the Byzantine provinces in the south held out against him. In any case Pepin died shortly afterwards without being able to press his claims. A few years later again, in 787, while Charles was fighting the Muslims in Spain, Empress Irene convened a general council at Nicaea and the decisions of the synod of Hieria were reversed. The issue of the icons was buried, at least for 27 years.

THE BIBLE OR THE SWORD?

In the meantime the unholy alliance between the pope and Charles had already been reaping great material gains for both the church and Charles, although the same could not be said for the people of northern Europe. Charles' men carried the swords which encouraged the Saxons to join the church and the pope's men carried the Bibles which sanctified each extension of the Frankish domain. The new program to subjugate the Saxons and the balance of the Frisians by repressive force which began in 772 made Boniface's coercive tactics look angelic. The people were required to adopt Christianity and to acquiesce in the rites of the church as a condition of peace and protection. When any of the pope's men were assaulted or killed, when there were patriotic uprisings or when communities reverted to their pre-Christian worship practices there were massacres. Four thousand five hundred Saxons were slaughtered in one day alone.³⁹ A papal decree, Capitulatio de partibus Saxoniae, specified death as the penalty for refusing baptism. The Anglo-Saxons might not have been happy to know how their 'Peter's Pence' were being spent, especially when the program was pushed north into Denmark and the Danes began to retaliate with attacks on Britain. Lindisfarne, the monastery where Wilfrid had trained as a monk, was sacked in 793 and Jarrow the next year.

When Leo III became pope at Christmas 795 he decided that what was good enough for the Danes was good enough for the Jews. Those who refused baptism were for the high jump. The years of his pontificate saw chaos in many directions and his decisions dragged the church deeper and deeper into the mire. Charles had fought against the Muslims in Spain in 778 and now he founded "the Spanish March" which was to protect the regained areas of northern Spain from falling under Muslim influence again. The 'march' was the last thing Spain needed, but Leo III sent Charles the keys to the tomb of St. Peter and a banner as symbols of his gratitude and of Charles kingship. There were, of course, those who believed he had done the wrong thing, and pressure built up against him so much that in 799 Leo had to flee to Charles in Germany for protection. With an eye to the future, and with designs on Byzantium, Charles promptly reinstated him. He needed him in Rome. Leo would be useful as pope when the right time came. But Leo beat him to it. When Charles visited Rome for Christmas in 800 Leo popped a crown on his head as he rose from prayer and declared him Charlemagne, Caesar and Augustus. The mob was happy. It had a better guarantee of protection than ever before. The Church was happy. The final break with the Byzantine Empire and freedom from imperial interference would now be a mere formality. But Charles was not happy. He had hoped to get control of Byzantium by some means – fair or foul didn't matter – but now his chances had been dashed. However he was undoubtedly in a much more powerful position than before and he would make the best of it.

The road to Rome and power had been rough but now the Holy Roman Empire was a reality. Conceived in fear and jealousy and fathered through intrigue by a church which had run completely off the track, it claimed to represent God the Father and God the Son and to be driven by God the Holy Spirit. Bastardy would remain its hallmark until it crumbled. Civilizations would flourish and develop in Asia and Southern America while oppression was the rule in Europe. The world would have to wait a long time to hear the Good News of Salvation through the Gospel which had been delivered to a small nation in the Middle East by the Messiah a long time before. Unfortunately the Good News had become enmeshed in the self-misunderstanding and machinations of a corrupt and ruthless church intent on wielding absolute authority through a shackled, obsequious and equally ruthless imperial power.

ON THE ROMAN ROAD

CHAPTER 8

A CHALLENGE WITH A DIFFERENCE

In an age when most western Christians know more about the T.A.B.¹ than the W.C.C.² and when the morning talk-back star on local radio has more apparent influence in their day to day thinking and action than the church, it is difficult for many of them to appreciate that it was ever any different. And when all they hear of religious affairs in other communities is that strict Jews require their food to be cooked in special ways or that priests in Thailand wear saffron coloured robes they find it equally hard to understand that there is any more meaning in religious faith for other people than for themselves. It's only a question of different rituals they might say, or "they" don't believe in the proper gods. The idea that people actually allow their religious beliefs to influence their business operations and their personal conduct sounds either faintly amusing or incredible. "But after all we used to make our pubs close on Sundays and there are still restrictions on some activities at weekends," they might think – perhaps a little ruefully. "Yes, of course. It's our superior western ethic which we are just born with, combined with our superior education system. We don't need to worry about organized religion any more when we've got that! What a lot of nonsense."

The factors which have resulted in Western thinking developing in this way are both important and complex. An outside observer may well ask why it is only in history books that we read much about church-based mass movements like the ones which helped to force changes to child labour laws, prison reform and the establishment of schools for the general public. Then our observer may also ask us about all those foreign mission programs which the churches set up to take Western civilization to the developing countries. Yes... We will come to that issue later. Certainly the church has known periods of dynamic activity and social influence and there are still many serious efforts to bring salvation just a little closer, like development aid projects, political awareness programs, human rights campaigns and programs of aid without strings attached for self-determination movements such as those which helped to bring down Apartheid in Southern Africa. The pity is that such efforts are swamped by counter-productive attitudes and activities and sheer apathy which have become dominant features in the Western way of life. But before we throw too many bouquets about the church's achievements in its recent history we should recognize that many such movements are now initiated and organized either by people with no direct connection with the church or by people of other faiths, and we still have to work through that ghastly period of the Holy Roman Empire. While it seems a long time ago it was largely during that period that the ingredients for today's trouble spots, and especially the Middle East, were prepared and the relationships between the three partners in the triangle were fixed.

The church has never liked the idea of being one partner in a triangle. Before Muhammad it didn't even like the idea of being one member of a partnership in which Judaism was the other partner. In its view the people of Jewish faith had reneged on their responsibility and forfeited any right for their community of faith to exist, and we have already noted many situations in which the church had tried to force Judaism out of existence. It continues to deny, even today, that it forms a triangle of faiths together with Judaism and Islam. Its self-understanding simply does not allow for any competitors or partners in the Salvation business, and there we have the basis of the problem: the church's understanding of itself. When it comes to grips with the question of what it is and why it exists we can then begin to resolve the trouble in the triangle.

Any student knows that an error in one part of a calculation compounds the error in every later stage of the calculation. So it is with theology. One misunderstanding leads to another and another. The early church used unsound human reasoning to define itself and its role right from the start. It made an error. It arrived at a faulty answer. It then used that answer as the basis from which to reason every aspect of its doctrines, its policies, its practices and its organization. It also used its answer to justify whatever it chose to do. It became expert at producing carefully reasoned theological statements in support of some of history's most dastardly deeds. But as if that wasn't bad enough it chose to redefine God on the same faulty basis. Having done so, at Nicaea in 325, it proceeded to use that definition both as the basis for all future reasoning and in defence of the faulty pronouncements it had already made. The more and more it extended its fabricated castle of doctrine, dogma, mystique and self satisfying liturgical embellishments the more and more it was forced to extend its argument beyond reason into fantasy, and to defend itself both by calling on claims of its own infallibility and by recourse to denigration of both its critics and reason. So we are back to the same point. When the church corrects the original errors it will be able to dismantle the maze of walls and mirrors it has built around itself as scaffolding. When it has done that it will no longer need to be forever on the defensive. The basis of the triangle will have collapsed and all three partners can get on with the job for which they were established. The Good News will be enough to lead humanity towards salvation.

As we have already seen, anyone who was silly enough and brave enough to challenge the church's reasoning got the chop, quite literally for a long time. The first real challenge, led by Arius, was essentially an internal challenge, although when it moved to the political and military arena the church portrayed it as an external challenge. By forcing the challengers into that situation and by continuing to institutionalize in line with its role as an instrument of the state, the church backed itself into a corner. It became no different to any other large institution such as a government agency, political party or commercial enterprise. In fact it very quickly took on the roles and the appearance of all three. Deeply ingrained attitudes, policies and exploitative or corrupt practices can seldom be eliminated from such organizations by management changes alone. Outside investigations or audits and pressure are necessary. The church has proved to be no exception. Muhammad and Islam, as the third partner in the triangle, came along to provide such outside pressure. It proved insufficient at the time and the church hung on desperately and consolidated its position. That is the point we have reached in our long march along the Roman road.

But another outside challenge was building up on the horizon to prompt the church into a thorough reassessment of itself and its theology. It wasn't a matter of military pressure against Rome's authority but exactly the reverse. It was the stimulus of brilliant minds becoming attuned to a rational understanding of the triangle and exposing the basic errors of the church, (the second partner), as the people of Judaism, (the first partner), responded to continuing inhuman pressure from the church and began to reassess their own role in the unfolding history of mankind. A name to remember especially is Moses Maimonides. His intellect towered above his contemporaries and for that matter the whole of the Middle Ages. We shall come to him shortly. Unfortunately the church ignored the opportunity provided by these people and sought to eliminate them by its well tried methods. It had become so inflexible that it couldn't change its stance at all. It couldn't lift an index finger to beckon mankind towards salvation, but it could lift a sledge hammer to crush the challenge.

Eventually the church became so depraved that internal rebellion was inevitable. It erupted with Luther, Calvin and the Reformation and after the dust and fury settled, Europe experienced a burst of sunshine, love and a little hope for two centuries. But the Reformation proved to be only partial and Europe's Jews and much of the world didn't enjoy the burst of sunshine for very long, if at all. The Reformation was more organizational and practical than theological. There was a lot of theology talked but it was an internally triggered reformation and not the result of outside pressure. The great reformers didn't go right back to the basic theological rethink which was called for through Islam. They didn't challenge the basic self-understanding which the church had devised in its early centuries. They accepted those while they challenged the corruption and practical religious barriers which the church had built between man and God which had reached such frightening proportions during the days of the Holy Roman Empire. It is only now, several hundred years after the Reformation that circumstances have developed so that outside pressure can, and will, force that total rethink. The world desperately needs it. People have never needed to understand their relationship with God more than at present and never has the cry for Salvation been louder. In the twentieth century since the Messiah delivered the Good News it is finally becoming a case of 'let's go right back to basics.' No half measures this time. We have got our political sandwich with Israel hard pressed in the middle.

But it was a long hard haul for the European community from Christmas day 800, when a desperate pope thrust an unwanted crown on an ambitious king's head to convert him into an emperor, to October 31st 1517, when Martin Luther nailed his 95 theses to the door of the Schlosskirche at Wittenberg. Only two days before Luther took his action, Leo had been tried on serious charges by a church court which acquitted him and restored his authority as pope when he said he was very sorry, he wouldn't be naughty again, and made an oath of purification.³

In taking his action to crown Charlemagne (Charles) as emperor, Pope Leo had, in fact, double crossed him completely. A coronation had been planned but it was that of another of Charlemagne's sons as King of Italy to succeed the elder son, Pepin, who had died. Charlemagne had designs on the widowed Empress Irene in Constantinople who had, in her capacity as regent for her son, convoked the second council of Nicaea to smooth relations over the iconoclasm row and who had supported his 'Spanish March' to restrain a resurgence of the sympathy for Muslim rule. He apparently believed, like Theodoric, that a marriage or two between royals could do wonders for one's imperial prospects. (See chapter seven, The lost opportunity, page 11.) ⁴ But of course the Synod would not regard a little thing like double crossing the king as a sin if, in its view, the means justified the end. In contrast, only shortly before he took his action which triggered the Reformation, Luther had sat through a sermon to the effect that the purchase of an indulgence to help rebuild St. Peter's basilica in Rome was a guarantee to get a soul out of purgatory. ⁵ Such indulgences would, said the preacher, provide both forgiveness of sins and release from punishment and the soul could be either that of the purchaser or his nominee. ^{6 7} Luther was a priest trained in an Augustinian monastery. The preacher was a special representative of the pope, the papal subcommissary. The most remarkable thing about the Reformation which followed Luther's criticism of indulgences is that the world had to wait so long for it to happen. The most disappointing thing is that the reaction was incomplete and fizzled out for the reason already mentioned. Both factors simply illustrate how deeply ingrained the church's self-assessment had become.

There is no need to work right through the whole 715 years between those two events but there were several major happenings which helped to set the pattern of Europe's life for a very long time. The most important of those events were the series of Crusades and the second major outside challenge. They are intimately related and must be looked at together. At that time the church was not an exclusive group on either the conservative or radical fringes of society. It was the biggest single factor in fixing society's course. It was also the biggest political organization in the world and a devastatingly conservative influence, maintaining the social and economic status quo once it had established its grip on an area. As an instrument of state over much of Europe, for much of the period it received generous financial support from the state but it also had its own devious methods of extracting taxes. In addition it had an insatiable appetite for land and frighteningly sadistic methods of obtaining it. With its private armies as well as the support of the emperor's very obliging armies it didn't take long to stake its claims. Because of these things the church became the most enduring feature of the European scene as the years passed and the tribal and political map changed continually. But it was certainly not the most endearing feature.

Charlemagne died and was succeeded by Louis the Pious in 814 but the well established methods of Christianizing new areas, either military pressure or power politics, were used with numerically good effect for the entire period of seven hundred years of the Holy Roman Empire and then longer. Actually, if the church had chosen to recognize the prior authority of its Judaic heritage it could have justified a program of conquest for imposed conversion by reference to

Deuteronomy, the fifth of the Judaic books of law, the Torah, which is attributed to Moses. Some passages in Deuteronomy set out conditions under which a Jewish king may wage war against another nation, including the obligation to offer a peaceful settlement before waging war, and the action to be taken if the other nation refuses to discontinue idol worship and to adopt basic Judaic law.⁸ However to acknowledge Deuteronomy in that way and to act on its precepts would have required the church to show that the people being conquered were the essence of depraved idol worship, that it had the support of the civil judges, and that it was not appropriate to enter into a treaty for peaceful settlement and the renouncing of idol worship. These laws provided the basis on which King David and King Josiah conducted their wars, but not all of their counterparts were equally scrupulous. John Hyrcanus was less than faithful to the law when he used an army of pagan mercenaries to force the Idumaeans to adopt Judaism and to accept the practice of circumcision.⁹

Such recognition by the church should not have been difficult because in Matthew 5:17–20 Christ is reported as saying that he came not to abolish or annul the Judaic Law but to complete it, and that not a letter or a stroke of the law shall disappear until all its purpose has been achieved. But of course such recognition would also have required recognition of a continuing role for Judaism and the acknowledgment of the working relationships between religious, political and civil authorities which that involved. That would have required a new self-understanding on the part of the church and, of course, it is around that issue that the whole trouble in the triangle revolves.

ENOUGH OF THE SWORD!

However, apart from confirming that Muslim military conquest policy was completely civilized and innocuous, the consequences of Christianizing new areas by the sword were not always quite what the popes and holy emperors might have liked. The Vikings, for example, stepped up their retaliatory raids against Britain and also took the opportunity to export surplus population. They destroyed a large number of Irish monasteries and churches over a period of fifty years and had the audacity to set up a pagan kingdom in Dublin in 851. Six years earlier they had burned Hamburg in retaliation for the Frankish efforts to subjugate and Christianize Denmark by the sword using that city as a base. They had earlier taken the defensive but fairly ineffective step of building the immense Danevirke Wall right across the Isthmus of Slesvig. Still pretty upset, they sent a party to Northumbria in 867 to burn everything within reach.

The Swedes were a canny lot. Their merchants at Birka had developed lucrative commercial connections among the Franks and rather than wait to be ravaged by Louis and his equally pious Christian rabble they sent an emissary around 830 with a request that a party of Christian missionaries be placed in Sweden.

The Carolingian Empire of the Franks, which had been formally established by Pippin's election in 747, broke up on the death of Louis the Pious in 843 and the title 'Emperor of the Holy Roman Empire' lapsed for some years. When it came back into regular use again with the crowning of Otto, a Saxon, as king of Germany in 962 it carried more prestige than power but the church was still the main beneficiary of the links it provided: certainly not the emperor, nor the people.

Quite apart from the concessions which they had wrung out of the Byzantines for help in the defence of Constantinople, the Bulgars had continued to expand the territory which they controlled. They did a deal with Charlemagne when he returned from Spain. They helped crush the Avars whose territory had sat between them and the Franks and thereupon gained the apparent advantage of common border contact with both Byzantium to the east and the Holy Roman Empire to the west. However they found themselves in the middle of bitter rivalry between the two wings of the church for the minds of the people and Tsar Boris eventually had to make the customary leadership decision. In 864 he aligned himself with the eastern church, accepted baptism and allowed Bulgaria to be used as a springboard for the church's expansion into Yugoslavia, Rumania and Russia. Scandinavian traders had begun to open up trade routes to Asia Minor via the river systems of western Russia which flow south into the Black Sea and the Caspian Sea. Of the two major routes, the Volga and the Dnieper, the latter gradually became the more important. Access to eastern Mediterranean trade via the Muslim-controlled Bosphorus sea route was much easier than via the rugged land routes crossing the mountains of Armenia which had blocked the Arab movement northwards. Colonies were being established at Kiev in the south and Novgorod in the north. Kiev was the more important because it became a tribute collecting centre for the Norman soldier-traders and was a vital trans-shipping point for the movement of cargoes past the Cataracts which blocked the Dnieper River to fully loaded vessels. So the patriarch of Constantinople sent a bishop and a mission to Kiev. The Norman prince who controlled the fortress city of Novgorod was not at all keen on the idea of a Byzantine power base in his midst. He was well aware of what the Holy Roman Empire was doing in Scandinavia. He probably expected the same from Constantinople, couldn't see any point in being subjected to Christianity and its rituals, either with or without a sword, and decided to overrun the mission. It was abandoned.

A few years later both centres were merged into a single state together with about four other trading centres between the Black Sea and the Gulf of Finland on the Baltic by Prince Oleg, who took Kiev as his seat. Claiming descent from the semi legendary Norse prince Hroerekr (or Roderick) as his justification he thus set up the first organized state in modern day Russia. Based on trade between two alien peoples, the Normans in the North and the Black Sea traders, it was in part precipitated by the need to prevent political interference by the power brokers of the Christian Church. But that was not the first contact with a piece of the jigsaw-triangle of Semitic messianic religions for the people of western Russia.

Judaism, Islam and Christianity were each present to some extent in pockets scattered among the tribal peasant farming communities which were ethnically very mixed as a result of waves of Goths, Slavs, Finns, Huns, Alans, Bulgars and Turks all moving through at some stage. They had all been getting along quite well together and without wrangles with the pagans who worshipped gods whose favours were thought to be directed to particular tribes or communities.

Prince Oleg no doubt hoped that his action in establishing the Principality of Russia would lead to political and religious stability. However it did not prevent a steady stream of Christians from moving into the region from Constantinople via Bulgaria or from Germany via Hungary, where, after 50 years of bitter struggle and varying fortunes the Magyars were finally defeated in 955 by King Otto I and the usual process of forced Christianization began. Only two years before, in 953, three of Otto's nepotistic appointees to subordinate thrones, (a brother, his eldest son and a son-in-law), rebelled and joined forces with Hungary in an effort to protect its independence. They were soon brought to heel with great venom. Monasteries began to appear in close proximity to the Russian principality and an army of monks roamed the countryside 'Christianizing' with the aid of Otto's armies.^{10 11}

REFORM BEGINS AT CLUNY

Otto had established a church structure around himself which was somewhat like the earlier competing Frankish church and it was very ready to do his bidding. It had many of the trappings of the Byzantine church. He nominated bishops and abbots and demanded an oath of loyalty to himself.¹² He is said to have done this to offset the sale of such offices by the degenerate and treacherous pope, John XII, whose reign fell as low as any during the Middle Ages.¹³ John XII was eventually deposed in December 963, only the year after he made a desperate bid to hang on to office by inviting Otto I to Rome to be crowned emperor.

There followed a long period when a number of popes were appointed directly by the emperors, when several popes were deposed, and when competing popes claimed to hold office and anathematized each other as anti-popes. The position was only partly resolved in 1059, 96 years, 26 popes and six anti-popes later, when the then pope, Nicholas II, used the device of a papal decree to reserve the appointment of popes to the cardinals and to remove the influence of the laity, whether commoners, nobles or emperors.^{14 15} In the meantime the level of papal degeneration and corruption had already led to a movement for reform from within the monastic system.

The reform movement was led from the monastery of Cluny for which the Duke of Aquitaine had engineered autonomy for the Abbots who were to be freely elected, independence from the jurisdiction of bishops and a guarantee of non-interference from the pope. The movement for reform received a big boost from the struggles between the emperors and the popes but unfortunately the monastic system became the plaything of kings and a very effective lever for more power. The monasteries tended to become pathetically introspective with little in-house activity other than lengthy religious ceremonial, cloistered study and hourly prayers. They were a very heavy financial drain on the community and in some regions had a very negative effect on the population's outlook. In 933, just 22 years before Otto came to the throne, a monastery based on Cluniac lines was set up at Gorze in Lorraine. Aiming to strengthen his position, Otto got right behind it and very quickly there were 150 affiliated monasteries across Germany alone.

OLGA'S TRIP TO CONSTANTINOPLE

It was against that background that Princess Olga at Kiev was persuaded to adopt Christianity and to Christianize her court – and the whole principality – in 957, only two years after Otto became king. However it was to Constantinople that she went to be baptized.¹⁶ It is most likely that her motive in adopting Christianity was the same as that of the traders at Birka: get in while the going is good and don't suffer the fate of your neighbours. However she struck strong opposition from members of her court who were well aware of the situation and when she sent to Otto for a Roman bishop to help put down the opposition, she compounded the problem. Before he arrived she had been deposed and her son Sviatoslav was on the throne. He wanted nothing to do with the politics of Christianity but he soon learned that to rebuff Otto didn't pay. The share of trade between Scandinavia and the Black Sea and Mediterranean which passed through the young Russian principality began to fall. Imperial pressure was re-directing it through regions under imperial domination.

It appears that at the same time the balance between the trade passing along the Dnieper to and from the Black Sea through the principality and the trade passing further east along the Volga to and from the Caspian Sea in Turkish Muslim and Khazar country was swinging in favour of the Volga. This was aggravated by the refusal of the last of the Slavic groups to transfer payment of its tribute from the Khazars to the Christian principality. Sviatoslav attacked and destroyed the capital of the Khanate in 969. His impetuous action, although triggered by his deteriorating trade position, must be seen as a response to the complications which flowed from both the conflict between Constantinople and the Holy Roman Empire and Otto's determined efforts to use his religious position to expand his own empire within an empire. The situation which developed had such long term consequences and implications that they are still unfolding today.

The first effect of Sviatoslav's sortie was to bring him into contact with some of the Muslim settlements and to consolidate his determination not to be absorbed by either of the Christian forces. He was so attracted by their beliefs and way of life that for a time it appeared that he may adopt Islam as the religion of the principality and although he did not do so, because of diplomatic intervention from Constantinople, it gained a substantial following.

The next effect of the destruction of the Khanate capital and its military capacity was to destroy the barrier between the Russian principality and the belligerent Turkic tribes further east who had been kept in check by the Khazars. They began to disrupt trade on both the Volga and the Dnieper so that both powers suffered. Instead of gaining a greater degree of independence the Russians became more dependent on Constantinople and less able to resist pressure from Germany and the Holy Roman Empire. Eventually the Turks brought trade between Kiev and Constantinople to a standstill. This meant the break up of the principality into smaller and smaller power groups and their regrouping around Moscow, but that was still some time away¹⁷

It is said that Olga's grandson Vladimir, wanting to finalize the dilemma she had thrown the principality into, sent emissaries to investigate the religions of each of his neighbours after Sviatoslav's death. Their representatives also called on him at Kiev. We can not be certain whether the issues which most influenced him were their creeds, social policies and theology; the relative magnificence of their rituals and ceremonials (claimed by some to have been important); their diplomacy and trade, or their potential political and military impact on him.¹⁸ He is said to have rejected Islam because of its prohibition of alcohol, saying to a Muslim emissary that Russians are merrier drinking and without it they cannot live.¹⁹ But whatever his real motives may have been he formally adopted the Christianity of Byzantium in 987, married a sister of Emperor Basil II in an obvious bid for influence, and invited the patriarch to send bishops and priests throughout Russia. After having forcibly converted his people to Christianity he was, naturally, canonized as Saint Vladimir.

Within a few years the Khazar exercise started by his father, Sviatoslav, had been completed. Vladimir began a joint military campaign with his Byzantine ally, protector and brother-in-law which was not completed until the year after the end of his reign, 1016. The Khanate was then totally destroyed, its people were scattered far and wide, and within 15 or 20 years their territory had been totally annexed by other tribes. That is where we come to the most important consequence of Sviatoslav's petulant action when the church upset him and we must look more closely at the Khazars.

THE KHAZAR KHANATE

At its peak about 300 years earlier, the pagan Khazar Khanate had stretched about 800 miles north of the Caspian, as far as the climate would allow peasant agriculture, and as far west as Princess Olga's seat of Kiev where they had probably established a town. Its people had come from much the same stock as the Bulgars and there were continuing links between them. At one stage the Khazars and the Bulgars provided an army of 40,000 to help Byzantium in its wars with the Persians.²⁰ But in 737 the Khazars were invaded and defeated by the Arabs. They lost much of their power and could not prevent the Khanate from breaking into three fragments, two of which were controlled by the Magyars and the Volga Bulgars who apparently recognized the Khazars in their homeland area as having some degree of continuing seniority.²¹ The Khanate had already taken a hammering in the three way contest for Armenia which the Arabs had finally won in 717 and other existing powers and fresh waves of Asiatic tribes had gradually annexed its northern and western territories, leaving it somewhat weakened at the time of the invasion in 737. However, although the Khanate was then defeated by the Arabs it was not absorbed into the Caliphate because of the dynastic succession troubles which were paralyzing the Muslims at the time. In fact by their long drawn out fights the Khazars had prevented Islam from flowing freely into the southern and western areas of Russia. They had, however, come into intimate contact with all three portions of the triangle.

After his defeat by the Arabs when, in ordinary circumstances, he would have become a subordinate ruler within the caliphate with Islam being adopted by all of the people (except those who were prepared to pay higher taxes for the privilege of adhering to the faith of their choice) the Khagan Bulan found himself free to follow whatever religion he chose. In 740 he made a deliberate decision to reject paganism and called representatives of the three Abrahamic “heavenly religions” and had them present and then debate their creeds in his presence. The debates did not resolve the issue for him, but having firmly decided to discard paganism he asked each of them which religion they would adopt if they were not free to follow their own. The Christian and the Muslim both said Judaism. His decision was made. Judaic law was introduced.²²

Bulan’s successor, Obadiah, built synagogues and schools, encouraged the study of the Bible and the Talmud, invited Jewish sages to settle and rewarded them royally, and determined that only Judaists could succeed to the Khazar throne. Trading links were soon established with any country which was happy to trade with the Khanate. This meant, in effect, that there was no trade with either papal Europe or Byzantium, but that trade flourished with North Africa, Spain and Marseilles. Immigration also occurred at a steady rate, especially from the Tigris and Euphrates valleys where the short-lived Jewish Kingdom of Mahoza had been set up, and from Byzantium when Jewish refugees fled during the periodic purges against them.²³ And even though the Khanate lived by Judaic law and the throne was reserved for Judaists, religious tolerance was of a high order. The Supreme Court was constituted to include two Jews, two Christians, two Muslims and one pagan.²⁴ The civilization overall was of a very high order compared to anything in Europe.

The establishment of a Judaic Kingdom in this manner, by the peaceful conversion of almost an entire population, provided an immense pool of Judaists which would not otherwise have existed. Its attachment to Palestine and Jerusalem as a focal point for its faith was reinforced by the immigration of Judaists from other regions. However, while many of those immigrants would have had direct ancestral links with the Jewish tribes of pre-Christian times, (and there is no question that at least some of them would also have been converts), the vast majority of the people living in the Khanate at the time of its destruction would have had no ancestral links with Palestine at all. This destroys the basis of the widely promoted claim that all Judaists are of “Jewish ancestry” and, in turn, the politically convenient argument that this ancestry justifies modern Jewish claims to Palestine as a national home. We shall come to that point again later.²⁵

There seem to be no reliable estimates for the number of Judaists in the Khanate in 1016 but those people, violently ejected from their homeland for no crime other than standing in the way of the Christian Church and its political affiliates, like countless hundreds of thousands before them, probably more than doubled the number of Jews in the countries in which they settled. Many settled uneasily in western Russia, Byzantium and the Mediterranean ports while others went south to Caucasian Mountains of Georgia and Azerbaijan and even further south into Asia Minor.²⁶ The Crimea, Hungary and Poland each became home for large numbers of refugees and some were even taken to Kiev.²⁷

The scattering of these people, whose dogged determination to resist forced conversion was not an ethnic factor but a result of their theological self-understanding, made the task of the Christianizers much harder and exposed it historically as an exercise in politics and not salvation. The church's attitude became harder, its bitterness more deeply entrenched and its repressive tactics even more obnoxious. Christians were deliberately and callously indoctrinated with anti-Semitic attitudes. They were taught to believe that their two worst enemies were both Semitic: Jews and Muslims. The Muslims were more often called Mohammadans in a deliberate effort to establish the erroneous belief that such people worshipped Muhammad, whereas Christians worshipped Christ. Gradually accelerating interfaith conflict was guaranteed unless the church adopted more responsible attitudes. That scattering and later forced resettlements provided communities of Jews to be used as the playthings of nineteenth century Christian Russia's pogroms and Hitler's twentieth century holocaust. The addition of the Khazar population of Judaists to the population of Jews already in Europe ensured that community trauma would be on such a scale that the community-at-large would eventually have to recognize the nature of those two situations. It also ensured that the remnant populations, again scattered as refugees, would be of sufficient strength to exercise substantial political influence in the period following World War II.

JUDAISM REVITALIZED

However the conversion and scattering of the Khazar population had a much more important result than any of the factors so far discussed. It severed the tribal link between Judaism and Palestine. It lifted Judaism temporarily above and beyond the tribal limits which the building of the Temple at Jerusalem had tended to place on its thinking. The blinkers were removed and it was Yahwism for all mankind again. Yahweh was God of all and therefore Judaism could encompass all. Jerusalem was more than ever simply a focal point for faith and a symbol of hope for the full flowering of the Messianic age. At one stroke the ancestral connection between Judaists and Palestine as a homeland was severed. Judaism had become its own living illustration of its deeply and sincerely held conviction that Yahweh is God of all. It had a revitalized basis on which to set about preaching to the world and it was in competition with Christianity for believers.

A few Jewish scholars caught the significance of the situation and tried to lift the morale and aspirations of their people. The close links which had developed between the Khazar Khanate and the Jewish communities of Spain, encouraged by the freedom of trade under the Muslims, gave a marked impetus to the reawakening. Among those who played an important role in the reawakening was a Jewish physician named Hasdai ibn Shaprut. He had been appointed to the court of the caliph, Abdur Rahman III, and gained his confidence to the extent that he became, in effect, minister for foreign affairs without title, but he was also officially appointed Inspector-General of Customs for the port of Cordoba. He was still holding that post under the Caliph's son and successor, al-Hakam II, at the time of Sviatoslav's attack on the Khazar capital. He took full advantage of the diplomatic influence of his positions to support and improve the lot of Jews in other countries, including France, and is given much credit for promoting education generally and Spanish Jewish scholarship in particular. Another man holding influential state posts and who played a similar role was Talmudist, poet and statesman Samuel ibn Nagdela who became vizier to King Habbus of Granada from about 1030 to 1055 while the refugee exodus of the Khazars was in its later stages.²⁸

MAIMONIDES

Among the flood of Jewish scholars who achieved prominence under men like these and who require special mention for their influence in developing new insights into the role of Jews and Judaism were the poet Judah Halevi and the philosopher-physician-historian Maimonides of whom mention has already been made. Halevi, (1071–1141), another physician by profession, became very disillusioned by the divided and harassed state in which he saw his community and the world at large. He abandoned his family, wealth and training and began to think and speculate on the meaning and purpose in the scattering of the Jewish people around the world. He was among the first to express the belief that the restitution of Palestine would herald the redemption of the whole of mankind and not just the Jewish people. Through his poetry, the idea took an almost obsessive grip on the imagination of Europe's Jews. Their morale, personal endeavour and achievements reached new heights and Spain's Jews were soon on the edge of their golden age.

Maimonides, (Moses ben Maimon, otherwise known as Rambam), the son of a distinguished rabbinic judge in Cordoba, was born in 1135. He was a young lad at Cordoba during the period when Muslim imperial unity and religious tolerance had failed. The Islamic Empire had broken up into numerous caliphates and sub-kingdoms with decidedly different religious and political emphases. All cohesion had been lost and new waves of Asiatic conquerors, although adopting Islam as a faith, understood nothing of its unifying influence and simply pressed on with expansion of their empires at the expense of anyone and everyone. Asia Minor and Russia were in a mess. The Seljuk Turks had relieved Byzantium of the region of modern day Turkey, between the Black Sea and the Mediterranean. What was left of the Byzantine Empire had disintegrated, regrouped and was about to finally disintegrate.²⁹ And the Spain of Maimonides' childhood was vastly different to the Spain of Hasdai ibn Shaprut also. The Christian kingdoms of the north, aided by Rome and the Franks, had burst out of their northern confines, and, although fighting among themselves, had regained and re-imposed Catholicism over more than half of the country. They had taken full advantage of the Berber invasion and the civil wars which had fragmented the Caliphate into five factions by 1071. But then they had been checked and pushed back for a time when Muslim Spain was reunited under the Saharan Berbers who, at first, brought a new vitality and single-mindedness to Islam in that part of the world. Many Jews were either attracted or coerced into adopting the religious forms of Islam because of its single-minded recognition of the absolute authority of God and, because of the impression which Muslim military success conveyed, that God had rejected the people of Israel and appointed the prophet of the Arabs, Muhammad, as successor to Moses.

During his childhood years Moses resisted his father's efforts to lead him into an academic or rabbinical career. Unable to cope with bitter rebukes, censure and punishment, he left home for a time to seek his own religious understanding and to study at his own pace. When he returned, his father and the community of the synagogue were surprised by his maturity and scholarship. By the age of 16 he had completed his first serious work, a treatise on logical terminology, which indicated the direction his future work would take. In later years, when he dominated Jewish scholarship, his detractors claimed that he placed too much reliance on reason and too little on inspired tradition.

In the meantime, when Maimonides was 13 years of age, Cordoba was overrun by the fanatical Almohad Berber sect and the Jewish religious practices which had evolved as a blend of Judaism and Islam were suppressed. The Almohades imposed conversion to Islam using the well known methods of the Roman church and destroyed much of Cordoba. Increasing oppression and the progressive elimination of the Jewish community led to his father's decision to flee to Almeria, on the Mediterranean coast. In 1157, when Almeria was also overrun, the family fled again and a year or two later they settled in Fez, Morocco, where many Jews had responded to the pressure of circumstances and converted to Islam. Rabbi Maimon set about counseling and supporting those Jews who had remained faithful and wrote widely in an effort "to free the people from the calamitous delusions that the persecutions afflicting them were a sign that God had turned away from Israel and had chosen the Arabs to carry the teaching of God through their prophet Muhammad."³⁰ Maimonides, then 22, studied rabbinics under Rabbi Judah ibn Susan (or Sossan). But he also studied medicine, some other sciences and philosophy with great zeal, taking full advantage of a phenomenal memory, and he continued work on his commentary on the Mishnah in Arabic which he had begun in Spain.

In 1165 Rabbi Maimon took Maimonides and his younger brother, David, to Acco in Palestine, possibly as a consequence of the martyrdom of Rabbi Judah ibn Susan at the hands of the fanatics in Fez. Having experienced the pressure of the Almohades in Spain and Morocco they would have been very concerned to learn that the equally fanatical Shi'ites in Yemen were also trying to impose conversion to Islam on the strong Jewish community in that region. Then, after about a year, Maimonides and David settled at Fostat, (old Cairo), in Egypt where David supported them both for some years through his trade in precious stones while Maimonides continued his studies, trained as a physician and wrote prolifically.³¹ Maimonides' first interest was to pursue the knowledge of God and prophecy but to do this he turned to logic and the works of both Aristotle and Plato. He did not rely solely on the Talmud. Undoubtedly the dominant memory of Spain which the impressionable young man took with him was the fierce fanaticism of an extremist Muslim Almohades, but he knew both Christianity and Islam very well and the decidedly different philosophy which he developed split Jewish scholars and theologians as well as antagonizing both Christians and Muslims.

Between 1166 and 1172 he completed The Book of the Commandments and the Commentary on the Mishnah, he broke the influence of the Karaites in Egypt, and he intervened in the Yemen to encourage Jews to remain faithful, to stand against the pressure from the Shi'ites to convert, and to resist the temptation to follow a false messiah who had gained some prominence in the region. Controversy raged in 1168 when he wrote that revelation is not to be taken literally and that the words "God said" in the Torah are to be taken as a metaphor for 'this is a prophetic communication.' The implications for Jewish teaching were enormous but they were even greater for the Christian Church with its self-understanding as the exclusive mouthpiece for Christ and thus, in its view, for God. However controversy did not undermine his authority and as his reputation spread Maimonides was consulted increasingly for responsa to questions on civil and religious practice, even by the Gaon of Baghdad, and as early as 1170 there are Arabic references to him being regarded as the leader of the Jewish community. In fact such widespread consultation was a further cause for controversy because his critics maintained that only the geonim or heads of the academies in Babylon, backed by the full authority of their institutions, could make responsa which could have application throughout the Diaspora. As well as that he did not cite authorities, name authors or give any references in his writings and this suggested a "presumption of sovereignty" which made verification of his rulings difficult and impeded further research by others.³² After his brother drowned in 1173 he served from time to time as personal physician to the family of Saladin, (the Kurdish officer who had seized the Sultanate and recognized the authority of Baghdad), but his other interests tended to draw him away from his practice of medicine.

THE MISHNEH TORAH

During the years from 1175 to 1185 Maimonides worked feverishly on his 14-volume Code of Jewish Law, the Mishneh Torah. But during those years there were interesting and contradictory plots being hatched in the playgrounds of the theologians. Saladin, a Muslim assisted by trusted Jewish advisers, worked equally feverishly, preparing to expel the Christian Crusaders from Palestine; the Christian Spanish formulated the Law of Teruel which stated that "the Jews are the serfs of the king and the absolute property of the royal treasury"; and Pope Alexander III and the Third Lateran Council adopted their canon on relations between Christians and Jews which stated that Jews were prohibited from having Christian servants, that Christian testimony against Jews was to be accepted in all lawsuits and that Jews who converted to Christianity were not to be deprived of their possessions. That contrast in attitudes and policies from one faith to another is another sad indictment of the church's self-understanding.

Regarded as one of Judaism's most magnificent achievements,³³ the Code of Jewish Law is so comprehensive, with interpretations of the Law from both the Talmud and the Geonim that, for a time, it made direct study of the Talmud almost unnecessary for ordinary people. Copies prepared by professional copiers were carried to all parts of the Diaspora and it helped to strengthen Jewish self-understanding and commitment or resolve. Considering the state of communications at the time its impact was enormous and rapid and it soon "conquered the hearts of scholars, students, rabbis and judges", and many communities made it their book of laws.³⁴ However, because the processes of learning and understanding constantly expand human capacity for learning and understanding and make the concept of a pool of knowledge (which the church had promoted and by which it had been unwittingly inhibited) redundant, Maimonides' Code did not become a virtual everyday replacement for the Talmud and it is now regarded as simply one element in Talmudic study.³⁵ Of course even if there were no other issues to consider that would be sufficient reason to place the Mishneh Torah in a list of the world's most important works, but there is a far more important issue: its contribution to our understanding of the trouble in the triangle.

In the last of the fourteen volumes of the Mishneh Torah, The Laws of Kings and Their Wars, Maimonides reviews Talmudic teaching and comments on the appointment of kings, their responsibility in war, the future resettlement of Eretz Yisrael, relations between Jews and gentiles, the Jews' obligation to teach gentiles the seven key commandments the re-establishment of the monarchy, and the future Messianic Age. His astute understanding and his prophetic interpretation of earlier writings now provide a vital piece as we try to complete the jigsaw puzzle which is the trouble in the triangle. In his preface to the entire work Maimonides wrote that in the Diaspora Jews no longer gathered in their traditional way to study the oral law because of the difficulties and dangers involved. "In the present era", he wrote, "troubles have multiplied and the times weigh heavily on all. The wisdom of our wise men has been lost and understanding has been hidden from our men of knowledge. Thus, those explanations and halachot (aspects of the law) have now become difficult to comprehend and many do not understand their intent." His aim was, he said, to clarify what was permitted or forbidden, the pure and the impure, and other laws of the Torah until the entire oral law could be set in order without questions of difficulty, thus revealing all the laws to both great and small. But the translator and commentator Rabbi Eliyahu Touger places Maimonides work and motives in a wider context. In his introduction to his own modern English language translation of The Laws of Kings and Their Wars he quotes the passage that the (future) king's purpose and intent shall be to elevate the true faith and fill the world with justice, destroying the power of the wicked and waging the wars of God. He then maintains that the Rambam did not compose those final chapters to conclude his work with reassuring prophecies of a glowing future but, rather, because the Messiah's coming is the key to the return to the observance of the entire Torah, and because "the Messiah will lead Israel and the world at large to its ultimate goal: the knowledge and service of God as expressed by Torah and Mitzvot (commandments)." ³⁶

... GATHER THE DISPERSED OF ISRAEL

Maimonides wrote that at some time in the future the Messianic King will arise, renew the dynasty of King David, return it to its initial sovereignty, build the Temple and gather the dispersed of Israel. He said that anyone who does not believe in him or does not wait for his coming denies not only the statements of other prophets but also the Torah and Moses. He then set out a series of references to the prophets and the Torah to support his contention, beginning very deliberately with Deuteronomy 30:3–5 which is to the effect that "... God will bring back your captives, have pity on you and gather you once again from among the peoples where He has scattered you. Had you wandered to the ends of the heavens God would gather you even from there, reclaim you and bring you back to the land your fathers' possessed so that you in your turn might make it your own, prospering there and increasing even more than your fathers."³⁷

Similarly, Maimonides drew on Deuteronomy to support his contention that the borders of the re-established Israel would be expanded by the addition of three more "cities of refuge." This command was never carried out, he said, and surely God did not give it in vain. But, somewhat surprisingly, he drew on the notorious incident from the early Christian Era in which Rabbi Akiva supported the claims of Bar Kozibah (Kokhbah) to be the Messiah to "prove" that the Messiah need not work miracles, bring about new creations or resurrect the dead to establish his credentials. If a king can demonstrate that he is from the line of David, is learned in the Torah, observes the commandments, compels all Israel to walk in the way of the Torah, fights the wars of God, builds the Temple and gathers the dispersed of Israel, then he is definitely the Messiah, he said. However he added a qualification based on Zephaniah 3:9 and Daniel 11:35 that if the king did not also improve the entire world by motivating all nations to serve God together it would show that although he was a proper king of the line of David, God had caused him to arise "to test the many" He put Jesus of Nazareth into that category, more or less comparing him with Bar Kozibah, saying that he had aspired to be the Messiah and was executed by the court in line with the prophecy in Daniel 11:14 that "the vulgar among your people shall exalt themselves in an attempt to fulfill the vision, but they shall stumble."³⁸ Then in a scathing attack on the church for having elevated a false messiah to the status of a unit of a Trinitarian God Maimonides asked whether there could be a greater stumbling block than Christianity. He said that all the prophets spoke of the Messiah as the redeemer of Israel and its saviour, one who would gather their dispersed and strengthen their observance of the commandments. And yet the church, which claimed Jesus as Messiah, caused the Jews to be slain by the sword, scattered and humbled their remnant people, altered the Torah and led the majority of the world to err and serve a god other than the Lord.³⁹

MUHAMMAD, JESUS AND THE MESSIANIC AGE

However Maimonides went on to recognize a constructive role for both Jesus and Muhammad. "It is not within the power of man to comprehend the intention of the Creator," he said, because "His ways are not our ways and His thoughts are not our thoughts, but ultimately all the deeds of Jesus of Nazareth and that Ishmaelite who arose after him will only serve to prepare the way for the Messiah's coming and the improvement of the whole world by inspiring the nations to serve God together." This would be consistent with Zephaniah 3:9: "I will make the peoples pure of speech that they will all call upon the Name of God and serve Him with one purpose."⁴⁰

Then, as the finale to the entire Mishneh Torah, Maimonides added his key assertions: in the Messianic Age the nature of the world will not change, nor will there be innovations in the work of creation. The world will continue according to its pattern. The words of the prophecy in Isaiah 11:6 that the wolf will dwell with the lamb and the leopard will lie down with the young goat are a metaphor and a parable meaning that Israel will dwell securely, together with the wicked gentiles, he said. The “wicked gentiles” are described in Jeremiah 5:6 as a wolf from the wilderness and a leopard which shall stalk their cities. However Maimonides maintained that they will return to the true faith, that they will no longer steal or destroy, that they will live at peace with Israel, and that everyone will understand what has been implied in the parables. The only difference between “the current age” and the Messianic Era will be the emancipation of the Jews from subjugation by the gentile kingdoms, he said. Then he added his own “simple interpretation” of the prophets’ words: the war involving Gog and Magog will take place at the beginning of the Messianic Age, but before that war a prophet, Elijah, will arise to make Israel upright, to prepare their hearts to serve God and to establish peace within the world.

Acknowledging that the coming of the Messiah was a matter of controversy, Maimonides noted that some sages expected Elijah’s coming to precede the coming of the Messiah. He said that such matters were not defined in the prophets’ words, that the wise men had no established tradition on them, and that they could not be known definitely until they occurred. Furthermore the timing and order of the events or their details were not matters which people should concern themselves over because they are not “among the fundamental principles of faith” and their study will bring neither fear nor love of God. One should simply wait and believe in the general concept, he said, knowing that the Sages did not yearn for the Messianic Era in order to have dominion over the world, to rule the gentiles or to have special privileges, but simply to be free to work within the Torah so that they would merit the world to come. In that era there will be neither famine nor war, envy or competition, but good will flow in abundance and the whole world will concentrate on the knowledge of God.

GOG AND MAGOG

Any prophecy concerning the person of the Messiah and the Messianic era or, (as Maimonides presented it in the Mishneh Torah), a clarification or restatement of earlier prophecy, is bound to be controversial, especially in an environment of dramatic interfaith tension, but the confusion is made worse by different understandings of the names Gog and Magog, and different translations of Maimonides’ words by different scholars. In his translation of The Laws of Kings and Their Wars published in 1987 Rabbi Touger uses the expression “the war of Gog and Magog” on both occasions in which the war is mentioned and places the war in the context of Ezekiel 38 and 39 in which the setting is Gog coming up against the land of Israel to do battle with it. In contrast, the translation by Schonfeld-Brand and Newman of Rabbi Meir Meiseles’ Judaism: Thought and Legend, published in 1964, reads: “...the dawn of the Messianic Age will be heralded by the war between Gog and Magog, and ... before this war of Gog and Magog, a prophet will arise...” Clearly, in the context of the return of the scattered Jews to Eretz Yisrael a war between Gog and Magog as separate entities cannot also be against the land of Israel or involve it, except if it is the subject of the war or as a third party in some other way. On the other hand in a war of (or involving) Gog and Magog the two parties can either be opposed to each other with or without Israel being involved, or they can be in alliance against Israel. There are therefore people who look for a war between Gog and Magog, and people who look for a war with Gog and Magog in alliance against Israel. That distinction is very important and we shall come to this matter again soon enough, but at this point a review of Biblical references to Gog and Magog will help to set the scene for the twentieth century stage of the trouble in the triangle and may help towards an understanding of the way in which Maimonides used those names.⁴¹

The first mention of Magog is in Genesis 10:2, which was compiled from material gathered progressively by three groups of authors between 950 BCE and 400 BCE. It identifies a person of that name as a grandson of Noah, the first tiller of the soil and grower of vines for wine, who settled far to the north of Palestine and who gave his name to that region. A similar reference to his ancestry occurs in I Chronicles 1:5 (compiled from the oral sources between 430 and 370 BCE). The first reference to the name Gog then follows in I Chronicles 5:4 and is applied to a fourth generation descendant of Abraham, the line of descent being Abraham, Isaac, Jacob (whose name was changed to Israel), Reuben, then Gog. There is no suggestion of a direct link between them and research since World War II has brought about such far-reaching reassessments of biblical history and the way in which the early books of the Bible were composed that it is virtually impossible to establish any such links. In any case, writers are not in agreement on whether Noah of the ark and Noah the tiller of vines are the same person. H. H. Rowley⁴² indicates that they are, while John H. Marks⁴³ maintains that they are different persons. But in addition, current understanding⁴⁴ is that there were two periods of major local flooding in the regions of Mesopotamia and Babylonia which are drained by the Tigris and Euphrates rivers, the first about 2,900 years BCE and the second, which is assumed to be the subject of the biblical narrative, some 1,250 years later, about 1,650 years BCE. Because it is now thought that Abraham lived between 1,800 and 1,700 BCE⁴⁵, somewhat before that flood, there is clearly a great deal more work required to reassess the origins of the early books of the Bible and to develop a clearer understanding of the relationship between myth and history.

The references to Gog and Magog which appear next, in Ezekiel 38 and 39, were actually written somewhat earlier than Chronicles, between 600 and 580 BCE, during or following the Babylonian exile. They involve both names, linked, with Gog referred to as a prince in the country of Magog. The prophet anticipates an attack by Gog in alliance with other forces against Israel, either out of greed and lust for its resources or acting under divine direction. He then anticipates that Yahweh will defend Israel and totally destroy Gog in an awesome display of power which will demonstrate the Lord's holiness, absolute authority and special care for Israel in a manner that all the nations will recognize it. Because neither the name Gog nor Magog actually applied to any ruler or country at the time that Ezekiel was writing, scholars have sought to either identify them as Alexander the Great and Macedonia or as future powers of evil drawn from throughout the world, whose defeat will be associated with the redemption of Israel and universal recognition of Yahweh's authority.

THE REVELATION OF JOHN

From Ezekiel we move to the New Testament Book of Revelation which most Christians tend to avoid, finding it the hardest book in the Bible to understand. Written between 90 and 95 CE, its setting is attempts by Roman emperors to impose emperor worship and the martyrdom of many Christians who resist that direction. The aim of the writer, John of Patmos, is generally understood to be to encourage the Christians of the seven young churches to stand up against state pressure and to look for personal redemption and life in the New Heaven and the New Earth. But there is a distinct second phase in the book: prophetic visions of the future in which Jerusalem is depicted as God's seat, with all authority and divine judgement delegated to Christ, the lamb, and with recognition of the faithful of both Judaism and Christianity in a manner which reflects Christ's words that he had come not to abolish the Law or the Prophets, but to complete them. Unfortunately some Christian commentators, noting the crudeness of the original writing and the similarities between Revelation and the prophecies of Isaiah and Ezekiel, regard the writer as a bit of a plagiarist who aped them and merely added some of his own touches, and they therefore cast doubt on the originality and the inspiration behind the prophetic writing. One who does not is J. B. Phillips. He gives the writer credit for writing under divine inspiration and for leaving his work in a somewhat crude form because he did not believe it would be proper to edit what he had written during visions "in the spirit."⁴⁶ When we consider Revelation in the light of the trouble in the triangle, Phillips' attitude is well justified.

The references to Gog and Magog in the Book of Revelation must be read in context with other portions of the second phase of the book which opens with a vision of God enthroned in the Heavenly Jerusalem and with Christ placed in the very subordinate position of a right hand assistant to open seven seals to reveal seven aspects of the future and the nature of salvation and judgement. Although he wrote that Christ was the only figure in the presence of God able to open the seal it was hardly a vision which would support the concept of a Triune God or the Messiah's equality with God. Later there is a visionary exchange between the writer and an angel of the Lord which is a ringing command to worship only God and no subordinate figure. It is strikingly similar to the Qur'anic exchange already noted.

"Then I knelt at his feet to worship him, but he said to me, 'Don't do that: I am a servant just like you and all your brothers who are witnesses to Jesus. It is God that you must worship.' The witness Jesus gave is the same as the spirit of prophecy." Rev. 19:10 [Jerusalem translation]

Then follows a vision of the devil (Satan) being overpowered, chained and thrown into the Abyss so that he could do no evil until "he must be released" (at God's will), and a single reference to Gog and Magog.

When the thousand years are over, Satan will be released from his prison and will come out to deceive all the nations in the four corners of the earth, Gog and Magog, and mobilize them for war. His armies will be as many as the sands of the sea; they will come swarming over the entire country and besiege the camp of the saints, which is the city that God loves. But fire will come down on them from heaven and consume them. Then the devil, who misled them, will be thrown into the lake of fire and sulphur, where the beast and the false prophet are, and their torture will not stop, day or night, for ever and ever. Rev. 21:7–10 [Jerusalem translation]

Several things are noteworthy. First: that this passage is written in the future tense in the style of a prophecy and not in the past tense as a description of a vision, although some translators substitute ‘was’ for ‘will’ in the reference to the devil being thrown into the lake of fire. This is presumably to have it correspond with the vision of the devil being thrown into the Abyss in the previous paragraph. Second: Gog and Magog are not characterized as powers of evil. They are simply ‘all the nations in the four corners of the earth’ deceived by the devil and mobilized for war. Third: there is no reference to the destruction of Jerusalem but only to besieging ‘the camp of the saints which is the city that God loves.’ In the context of the last decade of the first century CE it is reasonable to assume from the use of the words ‘the camp of the saints’ that this long term prophecy anticipates the population of Jerusalem acknowledging Christ as Messiah and living an upright life according to both the Law and Gospel teaching.

THE VISION SPLENDID ...

In its closing phase John’s vision and the prophecy turned to a new heaven and a new earth with Jerusalem coming down from God. It had no temple because the Lord God Almighty and the Lamb were, themselves, the temple, and the city did not need the sun or the moon for light, since it was lit by the radiant glory of God and the Lamb was a lighted torch for it. But it had twelve gates and twelve foundation stones. Above each gate was the name of one of the twelve tribes of Israel and each of the foundation stones carried the name of one of Christ’s twelve Apostles. William Barclay, writing in 1959, eleven years after the establishment of the State of Israel, interpreted the reference to twelve gates to mean that there are many ways into the City of God, that there is not one exclusive “gate” or church but many and that “a man can find his own” church or gate. He then suggested that the reference to the twelve tribes of Israel as well as the Apostles “stands for the continuity of the church.” He wrote: “The God who revealed Himself to the patriarchs is the God who also, and far more fully, revealed Himself in Jesus Christ; the God of the Old Testament is the God of the New Testament. From beginning to end it is one unbroken line of revelation culminating in Christ.”⁴⁷ Such an interpretation reflects the long-standing Christian position that there is no role for Judaists in the City of God or the Messianic Age. However there is an alternative interpretation. Christ’s Gospel is the foundation on which the city stands but a city wall has little point without means of entry and the Torah was that point of entry. The city can only function when its component parts (the walls and the gates) complement and support each other and when its people work in harmony. The gates are open to welcome those who may enter in from any direction:

“The pagan nations will live by its light and the kings of the earth will bring it their treasures. The gates of it will never be shut by day – and there will be no night there – and the nations will come bringing their treasure and their wealth ...”

and there is a role for both the successors of the twelve tribes of Israel and the twelve Apostles, to guide them there. But the pathway to the City remains obscured, strewn with stumbling blocks thrown up out of ignorance and in long-running disputes. This is not a message which the church was eager to receive in the first century CE, or which most of its commentators even after World War II have been prepared to recognize. But when prophecy becomes reality the gates of Jerusalem will never shut and the pagan nations will live by its light which the prophet saw as “the radiant glory of God and the Lamb being a lighted torch.”

... AND THE CAVE

But finally we come to the Qur’anic parable of Dhul-Qarnain in Sura 18, The Cave, verses 83–110. The key figure in the parable, Dhul-Qarnain, (whom some commentators, including Qur’anic translator N. J. Dawood, identify as Alexander the Great), is portrayed as being made “mighty in the land” (by God) and as being given means to achieve all things. He receives a divine command to either punish or show kindness to a series of communities which he shall encounter, according to their circumstances. He encounters two communities and acts on the divine commands without incident. Then he encounters a third in the valley “between the Two Mountains” in which the people “could barely understand a word.” The parable, which opens with the injunction which identifies statements which Muhammad is believed to have dictated under Divine inspiration: “Say: ‘I will give you something of his story ...’”, continues: ⁴⁸

‘They said to Dhul-Qarnain, “Gog and Magog are ravaging this land. Build us a barrier against them and we will pay you tribute.” He replied: “The power which my Lord has given me is better (than any tribute). Lend me a force of labourers, and I will raise a barrier between you and them. Come, bring me blocks of iron.” At length, when he dammed up the valley between the Two Mountains, he said: “Blow (with your bellows).” And when he made the iron blocks red with heat, he said: “Bring me molten brass to pour on them.” Thus they (Gog and Magog) could not scale it, nor could they dig their way through it. He said: “This is a mercy from my Lord. But when my Lord’s promise has been fulfilled, he will level it to dust. The promise of my Lord is true.” On that day, We will let them come in successive waves. The trumpet shall be sounded, and We will gather them all together. On that day Hell shall be laid bare before the unbelievers, who have turned a blind eye to My admonition and a deaf ear to My warning. Do the unbelievers think that they can make My servants patrons besides Me? We have prepared Hell to be their dwelling place.’

The message of the parable is, briefly, that if those who profess to believe neglect the responsibilities which their belief involves, scoff at Divine revelation and the Lord’s apostles and place their faith in servant/patrons of similar weak faith, they will be subject to Divine intervention and judgement. It is very easy indeed to interpret the circumstances of the Jewish community and the key players at the close of the nineteenth century and in the years leading to the establishment of the State of Israel as a classic illustration of that message. The ‘people between the Two Mountains who could barely understand a word’ are represented by the Zionist communities of Europe. Gog and Magog are represented by the competing and oppressive Christian forces of Eastern and Western Europe; the servant/patron is represented by Britain; the iron and brass barrier by the Balfour Declaration; the levelers of the barrier by Nazi Germany; and the Trumpet by Hitler’s Mein Kampf. Some ‘People of the Book’ find it difficult to accept the idea that God might involve a tyrannical oppressor as an instrument of judgement upon a nation which is the subject of a Divine Covenant and which has been – at least nominally – righteous. However the brief Book of Habakkuk, in which the writer foreshadows the invasion of Judah by the Chaldeans as an instrument of Divine judgement upon the injustice and tyranny within the decaying kingdom, provides a clear illustration of the concept.

We may still have some way to go to fully understand how Maimonides’ saw the roles of Gog and Magog and the dawn of the Messianic Era, but the prospect cannot be discounted that he anticipated a situation such as that illustrated by the Qur’anic parable of Dhul-Qarnain in The Cave. And certainly there is a marked similarity between his approach and that of John of Patmos in that they both anticipated a role for Jews, Christians and, in Maimonides’ case – because of his historical placing – Muslims.

By the time that he completed the Mishneh Torah Maimonides was already the accepted leader of Jewry in Egypt, but in 1187, two years after it was published, he was honoured by the Vizier with two special appointments. The first was as court physician, which meant that medicine again became first call on his time. The second was as nagid, or supreme head of the Jewish community within the sultanate. The office had been allowed to lapse some years before because it had been disgraced by the despotism of the previous holder, and Maimonides’ appointment restored it to a place of honour. His appointment also ended the “dismal state of chaos” which the community had experienced, and is said to have “aroused universal joy among the Jews.”⁴⁹ The office carried considerable authority and responsibility but, being very conscious of the consequences of the abuse of power and apprehensive about both his personal ability to be completely even handed in his dealings with other people and the reaction of Jewish leaders in other regions, Maimonides was reluctant to flaunt the title or to exercise his authority except when there was a degree of urgency. He expressly asked that Jews not attach the title to his name in documents or letters so it was used only by the Arabs.⁵⁰

Maimonides’ appointment as nagid was a consequence of the esteem in which he was held by the sultan, the vizier and officials of the Egyptian court, confirmation of his ability in a number of fields, and a reflection of the personal relationships between him and the sultan and the vizier. However the importance of his appointment lies in the fact that the office existed and that it was filled at that point in history, and in the self-understanding and attitudes of the three Abrahamic faiths which it indicates. The mainstream Muslim authorities, generally acting within the Qur'anic understanding of 'the people of the Book', not only permitted the Jews to organize their own community but gave official recognition to its leadership. With complete freedom and with the security and protection of the Sultan's court a Jewish leader could write objectively and critically about the religion of the host power – in its own language. He could even counsel (or incite) Jews in other regions to resist the authority of radical Muslim sects in power in those regions. (See above, Maimonides and the Jews of the Yemen.) There was no such tolerance in Christian Europe where the church and its associated powers were intent on either subjugation, assimilation, conversion or elimination of the Jewish community.

THE GUIDE OF THE PERPLEXED

In spite of the enormous demands of his medical practice, the nagidship, his additional role as a judge, and a constant stream of requests for advice from throughout the Jewish world, Maimonides continued his studies of prophesy and the great philosophers, notably Aristotle, and eventually completed his major philosophical work, The Guide of the Perplexed, in 1195, nine years before he died. The Guide set a new benchmark in philosophical and religious thinking and as a consequence it generated enormous intellectual debate which was fueled by his enigmatic style of writing. This aggravated controversy which had broken out in 1188 around Maimonides' interpretation of the resurrection of the soul and the body. In his Codex he had included belief in resurrection as an article of faith. Later, when he was questioned on this, he referred to resurrection as the cornerstone of the Torah and said that it must be considered as "the soul's return to the body." This satisfied no one and instead of reducing the level of controversy it made the situation worse and in some rabbinic circles he was subjected to scorn and ridicule.⁵¹

Maimonides showed strong affinity with the ideas of Aristotle, as did many Muslim writers of the time, but he disagreed with Aristotle on the question of the eternity of matter, insisting that it was created by God's divine authority from nothing. Nothing occurred contrary to the creative laws of God and any apparent exceptions expressed through miracles or prophesy were exclusively at God's will. In other words, only God can make exceptions to God's laws of nature. He insisted that in spite of God's omniscience man bears responsibility for his deeds because he enjoys free will and ethical choice. He opposed the tendency – most evident within the church – to define God by attributes, insisting that man can only affirm the negative: what God is not, and not what God is.

THE TRIANGLE IN PERSPECTIVE

Maimonides was greatly concerned by the state of the scattered Jewish people, the extraordinary and diverse pressures on them and their natural tendency to adaptation and he had those concerns in mind when he wrote that while custom precedes law it also annuls law. However he was writing just as well for Christians and Muslims who had shown a far greater readiness to syncretize. He saw quite clearly that both Christianity and Islam are historical extensions of Judaism and that all three have an important role in preparing for mankind to face and understand the truth of God and the truth of humanity's relationship with God in the era of the Messianic awakening. However, as already noted, he rejected the proposition that Jesus of Nazareth was the Messiah of Jewish understanding and he knew that Muslims reject the Christian understanding of the term 'Messiah.' It therefore appears that on that basis he saw Islam as arising directly from Judaism rather than as a consequence of Christian error, distortion and abuse of the role of the church. In the 'Guide of the Perplexed' he went to some length to show that one movement results from the one before it and so on, until you get back to God as the ultimate cause.⁵² Then, later in the book, discussing the theme from the Biblical Book of Lamentations that Israel would go through a period when its prophets would receive no visions from the Lord, he wrote that the obvious reason for this "truth" was that "the instrument", Israel, had been impaired. He believed that prophecy would return to Israel in the days of the Messiah and he pleaded that the Messiah would reveal himself speedily, as Israel had been promised.⁵³

Now, from our vantage point as the trouble in the triangle unfolds, it is apparent that Maimonides did not grasp the inconsistency in the links he made between three vital factors: firstly, the idea of a sequence in the development of the three movements; secondly, his assumption about the derivation of Islam; and thirdly, Israel's loss of prophetic capacity after failing to recognize Christ, the Messiah, (or, as he put it, until the Messiah is revealed). He was simply too close to the power structures of Islam, its claim to be the true faith, and the trauma of oppression by the Almohades in Spain and Morocco, and the Shiites in Yemen to fully appreciate the relationship between Christianity and Islam. However Maimonides was, in fact, in the finest prophetic tradition himself.

While the church was vigorously insisting that the earth was the centre of the created universe and that the stars were fixed around it as if painted on a huge revolving ceiling, Maimonides could use Aristotle's views of an uncreated universe as a building block in his own reasoning which foreshadowed scientific discoveries of the nineteenth and twentieth centuries. He argues that the universe was created by God; that man was the ultimate piece in creation; that God would not use or allow a change in natural law to bring about the unnatural destruction of the world, and that these situations are quite consistent with a non- eternal universe in a state of continuous change.⁵⁴ Hundreds of years later, when people like Copernicus, Darwin and Mendel were rapidly confirming Maimonides' views about change and the universe, the church was still suppressing scientific reasoning and insisting on the infallibility of its pre-conceived notions as strenuously as it ever had.

BURN IT!

Maimonides believed passionately that the Messianic Age would not differ materially from his own era but that it would involve a society with moral and intellectual conduct patterned on, or determined by, humanity's fuller understanding of God and God's absolute righteousness. There would therefore be no dictators, oppressors or master races: just peace.^{55 56} Then the scorn and ridicule which greeted his earlier works turned to bitter denunciation and cries of heresy when he wrote of Judaism as a rational religion. Although the progressive intellectuals welcomed the opportunity to develop a rational view of religion, the Jewish conservatives attacked him with vigour. In the years following his death the Maimonidian Controversy reached the stage of open conflict between the 'pro' and 'anti'-Maimonidians. Rabbis in Southern France pronounced an excommunication against anyone who read the Guide to the perplexed and in Paris some rabbis burned copies in their possession. The 'pro' camp in Provence then proclaimed a counter-excommunication, sought the support of their colleagues in Aragon for similar action, and wrote letters of protest to rabbis in northern France. The Jewish 'anti' party even took their complaints to the Inquisition, claiming that The Guide of the Perplexed constituted a heresy.⁵⁷ The Jew-terrorizing inquisitors must have been very happy at this turn of events with unsolicited collaboration from their arch enemies and cooperated with highly organized burning of Maimonides' works. This denunciation by his own people brought such disgrace to the anti-Maimonidean camp that attacks against the Rambam ceased and the campaign shifted to attacks on his disciples for spreading dangerous philosophical teachings. However the interfaith antagonism ran so deep that when a cardinal in Paris burned all available copies of his Guide of the Perplexed it was the signal and the excuse for the church to go on publicly burning not only Maimonides' works but the whole of the Talmud for about 300 years.⁵⁸

Perhaps the conflict and confusion was to be expected in view of some of his writings.

The Israelites did not believe Moses our teacher in consequence of the signs he performed; for he whose belief rests on signs must still harbour a suspicion in his mind of the possibility that the sign might have been performed by magic or wizardry. All the signs which Moses performed in the wilderness he did through necessity and not to adduce evidence of his prophecy ...

It is a clear and unequivocal feature of the Torah that it is an ordinance designed to endure for eternity and admits of no alteration, diminution or addition ... Hence we learn that no prophet is authorized to introduce any innovation at any future time. Should therefore a man arise, either from the Gentiles or Israel and perform any sign or wonder and declare that the Lord has sent him to add any precept or abrogate one in violation of what we have received from Moses or should he declare that the commandments ordained for the Israelites were not meant for all time, but were only temporary enactments; behold this man is a false prophet; for he indeed comes to repudiate the prophecy of Moses our teacher. The penalty to which he is liable is death, because he presumed to speak in the name of the Lord that which He had not commanded him. [Maimonides. Yesodei ha'Torah]⁵⁹

Argument raged over such statements. If they were directed at Muhammad and Islam then, in the church's view, they were correct. But if they were directed at Christ then of course they were wrong and had to be destroyed. If it did occur to the church that they could have been written with the fathers of the church in mind rather than Christ, then that was just as bad anyway. Let us agree, the church said, that it is quite impossible that Muhammad could have received direct revelation, but that does not suggest that revelation stopped with the destruction of the Temple in Jerusalem. Numerous Christians, enjoying the exclusive benefit of the Holy Spirit (according to the church) received visions and revelations, like Patrick in Ireland, Constantine and Bridget.⁶⁰ And of course during the Apostolic period there were Stephen, just before he was stoned, and Peter when he was given the universality of the Gospel through his vision of the unclean food.

But there were even stronger statements to be considered. Maimonides' assertions that the Messianic Age would be heralded by a war between Gog and Magog and that the King Messiah will restore the kingdom of David to its former position and dominion, rebuild the Temple and gather the dispersed of Israel, were hardly calculated to endear him to the church.^{61 62} After all, the Messiah had already arrived, been rejected by the Jews and, at least in its view, appointed the church as His sole successor. And Maimonides couldn't say who Gog and Magog would be either. He didn't have a crystal ball. But we will come to him again soon enough. But gradually his work was recognized as a towering contribution not only to the life of his own Jewish community, but also to the evolution of humanity's overall thinking about civilization and salvation.⁶³

For a long period the situation in Europe was complex and chaotic. In the far west, in Spain, the Jewish community recovered, enjoyed a Golden Age under Muslim rule and developed its religious life and thought quite strongly. The Christian church continued to split down the middle around the roles of Rome and Constantinople, and it continued its extension-by-faulty-reason into the murk of superstition, myth and flamboyant practices while it set about its series of dastardly crusades. The Islamic empire was also plagued by intrigue and its progress faltered around the establishment of a hashish-dependent cult of Shi-ite Assassins, but the Asiatic Mongols were preparing to clean up the lot.

MARY'S ELEVATION

In the east – the front line against both Islam and any invading forces from Asia – the church was pursuing earthly magnificence and cloaking almost any local superstition in a ritual of respectability. The investigators sent to Constantinople by Vladimir had reported that the splendour of the church's ceremonial was greater than it would be possible to find anywhere else and beyond their ability to describe. Mary was gradually being elevated further and further. The belief that she appeases the wrath of God, mediates between man and God and, as the mother of God, even exercises power over God in matters of justice and condemnation became widespread. The patriarch of Constantinople had even gone as far as to preach that no man is redeemed except through the Mother of God.⁶⁴ The use of the Rosary had become accepted, the recitation of the Hail Mary was made obligatory by a synod in Paris, Saturday was dedicated to masses for Mary who was said to be the neck connecting the head (Christ) to the body (the Church), through whom man received everything from God and who made everything more acceptable for transmission to God. Two religious orders were set up especially for the reverence of Mary and a rationale was developed to support the proposition of Mary's immaculate conception and bodily assumption.⁶⁵ To cap it off, Mary was described as both the bride of Christ and the equal of Christ in terms that are positively degrading to the glory of God and the role of the Messiah.⁶⁶ Veneration of Mary, the Star of the Sea, the Mother of Mercy or simply Mary the mother of Jesus of Nazareth, had become an obsession.

The church was on a treadmill and it had lost its grip on the brake. Before Luther would appear to swing his hammer the Feast of the Immaculate Conception would be added to the calendar; writers would be claiming that Mary chanted with the angels instead of crying like a normal baby and that she knew rhetoric, logic and physics better than any other person; a house said to be that of the Holy Family would be set up in a basilica at Loreto, supposedly having been miraculously transported first from Nazareth to Dalmatia, and all members of the University of Paris would be required to take an oath to defend the immaculate conception.^{67 68}

Relations between Rome and Constantinople had deteriorated steadily over a long period but as the popes felt more secure in their relations with emperors and kings in the west a break with the church in the east came closer and closer, but no single issue can be highlighted as the cause of the final split. Charlemagne was like some of the emperors shortly after Rome adopted Christianity as its state religion and liked to dabble in theology as well as the politics. After all, the popes dabbled in his domain, so he felt free to dabble in theirs. He insisted on credal statements being altered to mean that the Holy Ghost proceeds from both the Father and the Son while the Eastern church insisted that the Holy Ghost proceeds simply from the Father. It was just another twist to the time-honoured arguments over the Trinity. Modern-day students may be tempted to wonder how one thing may proceed from either one or two other things of a group of three equal things. If they can't find an answer they have no need to feel inferior. Some pretty brilliant Jewish, Muslim and Christian students haven't found an answer either, including Maimonides.

DEBATE, NEGOTIATE, EXCOMMUNICATE ... BREAK!

But those matters of theology aside, three issues seem to have dominated the debate. One was the great iconoclasm controversy. Another was Byzantine territorial claims in Italy. The third was the matter of celibacy. The marriage of priests was prohibited by Rome but it was required by Constantinople, and also by the Jews, while for Muslims it was basically a non-issue, although Muhammad was trenchantly critical on occasions of celibate monastic or ascetic life. He apparently believed, from his contact with the Christian church, that such systems were a distraction from the realities of a person's regular responsibilities and imposed additional burdens on other people.⁶⁹

No other doctrinal disputes were as important as those three, although there were many more thrown up. But of course, regardless of what was raised in theological debate, politics was at the heart of the issue. Rome dominated the state. Constantinople was subordinate to it. Rome insisted on primacy in all matters. Constantinople denied it that authority. In Eastern Europe the two church authorities were competing for the allegiance of kings and for numbers. The situation was unreal. It came to a head in 1054 when the Normans wanted a piece of the action in the Mediterranean and annexed the Byzantine territory in the south of Italy. The Byzantine Emperor, Constantine IX, wanted an alliance with the pope to shift them out, but the patriarch in Constantinople opposed the arrangement for fear of greater ecclesiastical interference. He closed the Latin churches in Constantinople, demanded several reforms and waited.

A papal delegation of three legates arrived to negotiate, or at least to press Rome's claims, on the basis of the pope's primacy and the forged Donation of Constantine. The pope had died in April and his successor had not yet been appointed, so the patriarch probably made much of his claims to seniority as patriarch of the See ranked second in Christendom. The negotiations failed. The senior legate, a cardinal, drew up a bill of excommunication and placed it on the alter of the Hagia Sophia on July 16th 1054. The patriarch responded, of course, by offering the three legates a similar compliment. The break was complete. The world had two bodies of Christ instead of one.

The Prophet of Islam had not succeeded in forcing a thorough review of either Christian or Jewish understanding of the relationship between God and Jesus of Nazareth – and the Christian theology, self-understanding and practices which flowed from that – but his influence had been very great indeed. The Byzantine Empire and the Eastern Church were in the front line against the onrush of Muslim Arab imperialism and they were therefore forced to think very carefully about their position and their theology. There was a combination of genuine theological response and fear of military subjugation by the Arabs or their allies brought on by religious dispute in the wave of Byzantine iconoclasm, attacks on Mariology and excessive veneration of saints, and also in some aspects of the ongoing Trinitarian disputes. Quite clearly the Eastern Church's reactions to the challenge and the threat from Islam were very significant factors in the break between Constantinople and Rome.

ISLAM FOLLOWS SUIT

However it was not only the front line Christian communities which were forced to begin to rethink their religious beliefs under the impact of Islam. We have already noted some of the reactions within the Jewish community, especially the work of Maimonides and Judah Halevi, but there had also been reactions within Jewish communities living in the heart of the Muslim empire. They coincided with the iconoclasm disputes within the church outside the Muslim empire.

The Umayyad Caliphate, which had governed from Damascus, (leaving to Mecca the role of focal point of the Muslim faith) began to lose its grip and experienced mixed success and failure from about 700 to 750. To the west, the African Berbers had adopted Islam, become an important part of the caliphate and ejected Byzantium and the Christian church from its North African provinces in 696 before sweeping the Arian Visigoths out of Spain in 711. Similarly, on the eastern flank of the Byzantine Empire the Arab forces of the caliphate had overrun Armenia, Iberia and Lazica by 717, but then it ran out of steam. Its bid to overrun Constantinople that year failed and Charles Martel routed the Muslim forces and blocked their progress in France in 732 and the caliphate's only partial success for some years was the defeat of the Khazar Khanate in 737. It was partial in that the caliphate was not able to establish continuing control over the region and, three years later, the Khan adopted Judaism in preference to either Islam or Christianity with quite dramatic consequences which we shall consider in due course.

Dissatisfaction with the direction and leadership of the caliphate, and its system of succession, had been an issue ever since the death of the prophet and, with the ability of the caliphs to hold the semi-independent units of the caliphate together being questioned, that dissatisfaction gradually increased. It was fueled by any other matters of contention which arose. These included disagreement over the administration of taxation, the role of non-Arabs in regional government, and the payment of military pensions in areas where the subject communities had become devoutly Muslim and fully integrated into the Islamic system, and where Arab armies were no longer seen as armies of occupation but as protectors: all matters which the Umayyads were finding difficult to handle. But they also included conflict over the personal style and conduct of the caliphs, disagreement over the role and treatment of non-Muslims in a Muslim community, and open competition between clans for the leadership. Minor conflict gave way to open rebellion and in 750 the Abbasids, a people with direct ancestral links with the family of Muhammad, seized control of the caliphate with the support of the Shiites and a largely Persian army. The survivors of the defeated Umayyad dynasty – for that is what it had become – were hunted down and virtually eliminated.^{70 71}

The new dynasty of the Abbasids immediately set out to establish new directions for the caliphate. The caliphate was to be a theocracy. A new capital was established at Baghdad. A new system of administration was introduced with a staff hierarchy and access to the caliph, Abu 'l-'Abbas, was restricted so that he assumed the status of lawmaker and semi-divine god-king, administering religious affairs from above his subjects in a manner which suggests some influence from the Persian god-king version of Zoroastrianism. Regional differences within the caliphate became more marked and the political influence of Arab appointees was reduced, although this was offset to some extent by the use of Arabic as the cultural medium for Islam, and military service pensions for Arabs were gradually reduced and finally discontinued in 831. To demonstrate that no one else was of equal status to the ruling Abbasids they married only slaves, and from 800 to the end of the dynasty no caliph was born the son of a free mother. The effect of these changes was that the dynasty became the focal point for Islamic unity which was no longer dependent upon the political stability of the 'Arab Nation.'⁷² In this revised role the caliph was on a pedestal. He became the arbiter of all religious and legal decisions, his pronouncements were taken to have the full authority of the word of God, and even if his personal conduct was actually quite licentious and did not match his public utterances it was assumed that his conduct was above reproach and his word was absolute. It was as if the caliphs had modeled their role and authority on the Roman Pontiff.

While he was personally leading Dar-al-Islam, Muhammad, although recognized as reciting portions (but not all) of the Qur'an at the command of God, spoke of and used the Qur'anic statements which he had already recited or dictated in the sense that they were for guidance in personal conduct and matters of public administration and not in the sense that they were hard and fast laws. When he was approached for decisions on such matters he would reflect for a time and give a response appropriate to the circumstances. This showed clearly that he allowed for interpretation of the simple words of the Qur'an. The Umayyad caliphs had endeavoured to work in the same manner to maintain the spirit of the prophet's approach, but of course they were at a distinct disadvantage. However, as a result of their new approach to the caliphate, Abu 'l-'Abbas and his successors found it necessary to have an indisputable law which their subordinates, not necessarily well schooled in the sharia, could work from without having to refer a constant stream of disputes to them for an interpretation. This was a change of immense importance.

It did not lead to the centralization of law, and the administration of law remained a local or regional matter, but it placed even more emphasis on the Qur'an as the written word of God and the basis of civil law, and it raised the status of the officials who had to arbitrate in matters of law. Local legal practice had to correspond with, or be underpinned by, prophetic tradition. There was greatly increased emphasis on the literal acceptance of the word of God as recited by Muhammad and much less encouragement for Muslims to turn to the 'The Book' of the Jewish and Christian faiths. There was a gradual shift in understanding. The Qur'an, instead of being an additional flow of God's word, complementing the others, became the final and absolute word of God and in direct competition with The Books of the Christian and Jewish communities.

Islam was following the same course as Judaism and Christianity. Judaism evolved very slowly from the days of Abraham and continues to evolve. The church was established by those who followed Jesus. Its very elementary organization and practices, its basic theology and its codes of civil conduct were determined by those people but they have evolved or been developed over a period of two thousand years. They are continuing to evolve. Similarly, when Muhammad died only the basic concepts of Islam were in place and its organization, theology and civil codes were developed by his successors.⁷³ Neither Jews nor Christians can criticize Muslims for that. Without being fully aware of it, the Muslims were responding to the fact that Jews and Christians had failed to recognize Muhammad and had rejected his call for a rethink and renewal. If they do not like the form which Islam assumed in its early days or the evolutionary path it has followed in recent years they have only themselves to blame – especially the church. As obvious as it may be, it bears repeating: if the Roman and Byzantine church authorities had sat down to talk with Muhammad world history would have taken a substantially different course. They did not.

ANOTHER THEOCRATIC STATE

In line with the Abbasids intention that the caliphate was to be a theocracy, the state became pre-occupied with matters of religion to the point at which maintenance of religion and the fulfilment of the requirements of the divine law, as recorded in the Qur'an, became the state's main responsibility. Then, because the state, the law and the administration of justice were all to be based on the precepts of religion, the status and number of people who studied and practiced the sunna and the traditions of the Prophet rose to accommodate the aims of the state. ⁷⁴ About the time that the Abbasids seized the caliphate, or soon after, the first of a series of four great Islamic schools of law was established by Imam Abu Hanifa. This was followed by a school established by Malik ibn Anas, from Medina and, about the same time, probably in the early years of the ninth century a Palestinian who had been educated in Medina, ash-Shafi'i, began the task of systematically coding all of the legal sources which were recognized within Dar-al-Islam. ⁷⁵ This was an important step in the development of the Islamic system of law and justice. Two additional schools were established; one by the Imam al-Shafi'i, and the other by Ahmad ibn Hanbal. Each of these schools gained greatest recognition and influence on a regional basis but, together, they represent the development of a strong continuing line of religious law which may be blamed for a period of stagnation, or perhaps disaster, in Muslim religious life and development. ⁷⁶

The principles on which the law of the caliphate was to be interpreted or expanded included some very simple and direct statements: Man-made laws are defective but God-made laws are perfect; God-made laws are comprehensive and all-embracing, covering spiritual as well as temporal aspects of man's life; man-made laws have limitation of time and age whereas God-made laws are eternal; the Divine law requires no amendment, being perfect and final, and standing good for all times, climes and people; God-made laws include devotion and mundane affairs alike whereas man-made laws have no concern with religion; man-made laws require the sanction of a chief, a court or a government whereas Islamic law, being God-made law, does not depend on such sanction and therefore if a court or state rejects it, it amounts to treason against the Divine Law. ⁷⁷ Naturally there were, from time to time, matters which led to strong disagreement between the schools but these were suppressed under the influence of the Qur'anic teaching that God's community could never agree on error. In simple terms, when regional common usage did not satisfy a case, the truth, or justice, was to be recognized on the basis of ijma.' This was consensus among the legal authorities or the general agreed position across the entire Islamic community. ^{78 79} A person could accept this spirit of ijma or leave the orthodox Muslim community. ⁸⁰

Coinciding with these developments in Islamic jurisprudence there was a surge in the development of dogmatic Islamic theology. It, too, was quite natural because the Prophet's message had been very simple and very direct: go back to basics and start again at the point of the relationship between God and the Messiah, Jesus of Nazareth, using the building blocks of

The Book of the Jews and the Gospel as relayed by Christ. There was no need to spell out a new theology anymore than there was a need to spell out a new law. Christ had said:

Do not imagine that I have come to abolish the Law or the Prophets. I have come not to abolish but to complete them. I tell you solemnly, till heaven and earth disappear, not one dot, not one little stroke, shall disappear from the Law until its purpose is achieved. Therefore the man who infringes even one of the least of these commandments and teaches others to do the same will be considered the least in the kingdom of heaven; but the man who keeps them and teaches them will be considered great in the kingdom of heaven. [Matthew chapter 5: 17–19, Jerusalem translation.]

Muhammad had set out in strict accordance with that commandment. However, as with the law, once the Jewish community and the Christian church rejected Muhammad's call and it became inevitable that the partnership of faiths would become a triangle, it also became inevitable that Islam would require form, laws and theology. And there was no reason why the development of those things should be any more straight forward and free from conflict or trauma than the comparable developments in Judaism or Christianity.

So: shortly after the Prophet's death the Muslim theologians began their debates. Among their concerns was the status of the Word of God, the Qur'an, of course, and how it was transmitted to or through Muhammad. There are sections in the Qur'an which are not consistent with each other or with sections of the Bible in much the same way as there are sections of the Bible which are not consistent with each other. The inconsistencies between books of both the Old and the New Testaments have naturally been a factor in debate on the inerrancy of the Bible (a debate between scholars which, given the circumstances of its composition and the fixing of the Biblical canon is quite remarkable) but there is an important difference between the composition of the Bible and the Qur'an. Whereas the Bible is made up of writings by many people over a long period, the Qur'an was recited or dictated by only one person over a period of only a few years. In addition, differences in purpose and emphasis are apparent between those sections which can be identified as belonging to the Meccan and Medinan phases of Muhammad's ministry. This immediately raises questions about whether the inconsistencies in the Qur'an are of divine or human origin, their meaning and how they should be reconciled.

Did God change direction as the composition proceeded? Did Muhammad make some errors? The first is not conceivable. The second is not an acceptable explanation if the view is to be maintained that Muhammad recited the work under divine inspiration. In any case the debate had to take in the broader question of the nature of God, and the Qur'an required careful study and interpretation, especially in sections in which figurative speech is used in a manner somewhat related to the use of parables in the Christian Gospels. Was the message of the Qur'an absolute and final? Or was there room for free will and reason in interpreting the message? In the same way that the Trinitarian debates had the potential to undermine the self-understanding of the church and the faith of its people, so the debates over the origin of the Qur'an and the nature of God had similar potential. They gave the church and other enemies of Islam much ammunition with which to attack the young faith and the Muslim community. If it had been hard to build bridges between Christianity and Islam right from the moment of Muhammad's challenge it rapidly became more difficult.

THE MU'TAZILITES: UNCREATED REVELATION

One of the groups which played an important part in the debates from the time of the founding of the Abbasid Caliphate to the end of the ninth century and in the formation of Shiite theology was the Mu'tazilites, said to have been founded by Wasil ibn 'Ata.' It stood firm on the belief that the Qur'an and Islam are vehicles for divine revelation and aimed to develop a systematic theology, presented through a series of dogmatic statements, which would become the basis of standardized Islamic teaching. Although it did not succeed in this its influence was so great for a time, and the debates were so divisive, that Caliph al-Ma'mun tried to impose his version of an imperial solution to bring political stability through religious conformity. In 827, believing that they were the only group which could ensure disciplined and reasoned theological and religious development, he issued the decree mihna, (test of faith) backed up by harassment, torture and imprisonment for defaulters, that all Muslims were to adopt the Mu'tazilite belief that the Qur'an was divinely created. With an inquisition-style campaign which coerced the majority of theologians into submission and acquiescence, (although they maintained a firm contrary belief), Caliph al-Ma'mun was also keeping strictly in step with Rome! His successor, Caliph al-Mu'tasim, later confirmed his decree and that belief stood, officially, until 849. In that year the new caliph, al-Mutawakkil, still looking for a political solution to strengthen the caliphate, reversed the decree, dismissed the Mu'tazilite chief judge, and publicly adopted the orthodox Muslim view of an uncreated Qur'an which still found fairly general support among theologians. The orthodox view, briefly stated, was: God's attributes, including revelation communicated through speech, are eternal, without beginning or intermission; the [message of the] Qur'an, being a manifestation of God's revelation, did not originate in time by a specific act of God's creative will, but has existed from all eternity; the Qur'an is therefore uncreated. ⁸¹

82 83

The struggle had been bitter and drawn out, at least one of the contentious issues had been resolved (at least superficially), and the power of the Mu'tazilites had been undermined, but there was also another important outcome. The government and religious leaders realized that both Islam and the Caliphate would be better served if the government limited its interest in religious life to guaranteeing its physical security. In contrast to the situation in the Holy Roman Empire, politics was largely dissociated from religion and increasing independence encouraged renewed momentum across the universal Islamic community. Of course the debates did not stop there and many related issues of theology and government remained on the table. But one thing was clear: however God's attributes and the Qur'an were defined, the revealed Word of God was to be the basis of the total social, political and economic life of Dar al-Islam, its law and its system of justice. And Caliph al-Mutawakkil intensified the campaign to show that Jews and Christians were inferior to Muslims.

THE RABBINICAL DEBATE

Such was the environment in which the Jews of Mesopotamia began to consider their own theology and their own position, and to question the social institutions and fundamental dogmas of the Rabbinical tradition. The process began at the time that the Abbasids seized the caliphate and led to the establishment of a sect known as the Karaites which exercised considerable influence for several hundred years. According to Cecil Roth there was a time when it appeared likely that the Karaites would become the dominant force in Judaism and that rabbinic Judaism would be reduced to an unimportant sect.⁸⁴ Although that did not happen Karaism still has adherents in Israel and several other countries including the United States Egypt, Poland and Russia.

At the time that the Abbasids came to power, Rabbinical Judaism was functioning effectively across the caliphate, taking advantage of a network of commercial links with the somewhat strange protection which Dar al-Islam provided, and it was apparently serving the diverse Jewish community to its satisfaction. Guidance in Jewish law and religion was being provided by the heads (the Geonim) of three academies (Yeshivah), two in Babylon, at Sura and Pumbedita, and one in Jerusalem. Jewish communities sent their queries to the Yeshivah of their choice, received responses from the Geonim, and acknowledged that support with contributions towards the cost of maintaining the Yeshivah. The system had faced and weathered criticism, and dissident groups had formed and disappeared from time to time throughout the history of the faith but there was no continuity in their organization until Anan ben David rebelled against the rabbis and founded the movement of Karaism in Babylon in the wake of the establishment of the Abbasid caliphate.⁸⁵ It is uncertain whether his action was prompted by the vigorous debate within Islam about the status of the Qur'an and the Mu'tazilite resolve that the Divine Word was absolute and sufficient basis for faith and action without a maze of codes and embellishment, or whether he reacted in anger or disappointment when a younger brother was preferred for the prestigious post of Exilarch in 767 on the authority of the Rabbis.⁸⁶ However he rejected the authority of the Rabbis and the oral law, branded the Talmud an imposture, adopted very fundamentalist attitudes to observance of the Sabbath, recognized only the authority of the Bible, and promoted its direct, independent and critical study.

A band of intellectual disciples, known as Ananites, gathered around Anan ben David to help formulate strict tenets for the sect and it gathered strength as they preached at Jewish centres throughout the caliphate. However its early leadership disintegrated and it fell to Benjamin ben Moses Nahawendi to regroup and to establish a Karaite cause in Persia. During the tenth to the twelve centuries expansion continued and the sect spread across North Africa and into Spain, Turkey, Greece and Russia.

After the formal break between Rome and Constantinople competition between the two churches in Russia and eastern Europe soon knew no bounds. However the two church capitals soon had more than competition from each other to worry about. Within a generation after the break the Seljuk Turks overran the whole of the Muslim territories east of the Mediterranean and pushed as far as the Bosphorus, taking Nicaea, totally destroying the Byzantine army and threatening Constantinople across the straits. Rome fared even worse for a time. It was plundered by the Normans when they were consolidating in Sicily and Southern Italy, but it was reprieved.

CRUSADING ZEAL ...

Then a totally new dimension was added to the crisis. Constantinople sent a delegation to Rome to ask for help against an expected thrust across the Bosphorus. The pope, Urban II, saw a wonderful opportunity. By organizing a massive volunteer army in the name of the church he could achieve several aims at once. He could reabsorb the Eastern Church by occupying Constantinople in the guise of an allied defence effort. He could regain access to Jerusalem which had been denied by the Seljuks who were much less tolerant of Christianity than the Egyptian Caliphate had been and he could set up a Holy Roman State along the eastern Mediterranean and recover trade routes to Asia at the same time. These had been almost completely closed by the Christian-Muslim conflicts. As well as that he could gain a major diplomatic victory over Islam. Two councils (or perhaps Synods) were held in quick succession to drum up support for the plan. It had to have religious justification. It would be called a crusade and a "Truce of God" would be declared for the duration. Because of its spurious self-understanding the church was about to plumb new depths of religious intolerance, bigotry and human depravity.

The decisive council was held at Clermont in France in November 1095. A major propaganda program was launched against Islam and a papal declaration was made that all crusaders would receive indulgences and martyrdom in the event of death. Urban II set up a new rite for granting immediate plenary indulgences to remit all temporal punishment for sins which would normally have incurred penance.⁸⁷ The response to the program was quite fantastic. It would have gladdened the heart of any 1990s media manager and illustrates the grip which the church had on people's minds at that time. The rabble flocked from everywhere to indulge their lusts of every sort, protected, so they thought, by the promise of indulgences. The condition in which they left the country, property and people wherever the crusades wandered was reprehensible. Some seven identifiable crusade movements took place but they are often divided for historical ease into three periods or crusades. The contrast between the conduct of the crusaders and the Muslim armies of 460 years earlier can be put down, in large measure, to the difference between the Pope's indulgences and Muhammad's instruction that Believers should not betray Allah and the Apostle nor violate their trust. "The spoils belong to Allah whose reward is great," he had said.

At the end of the whole abortive exercise the church could claim to have made some material gains but the consequences were disastrous. Christian attitudes towards non-Christians deteriorated to such an extent that bigotry became so deeply entrenched that it has prevented proper understanding and fathered the presumption of religious superiority until the present day. With the system of indulgences the same thing happened as it did with Mariology. The treadmill got faster and faster and the practices more depraved. The church was manoeuvring itself further and further into a permanent theatrical role of playing God and building barriers between man and God. Asia Minor became dotted with outposts of Christianity that perpetuated the attitudes of the crusades, added to the burdens of governments and guaranteed an effective base for conflict in the twentieth century. Central and western Europe's economies took a battering and feudalism, with the church taking full political and economic advantage of its position, became more firmly entrenched. Instead of reuniting the eastern and western churches the crusades bricked up the wall between them and established a precedent for separation rather than reform. Denominationalism and community division would henceforward go wherever the church went. Jerusalem was relegated to the role of a religious relic in the Christian mind with five or six branches of the church competing for the right to take advantage of its shrines, with a minimum of cooperation between them. It gradually ceased to be a focal point of faith and became little more than a tourist attraction and a focal point for conflict. Rome was firmly the centre of the faith.

... JEWISH COHESION

But the first crusade had another remarkable effect, the importance of which can easily be overlooked. In chronological sequence it was the very first major effect. The crusade was launched within six months of the firm decision being taken to launch the program, in May 1096, with Peter the Hermit leading it. A massive gang of murderous thugs, discontented peasants, monks and soldiers released from duty by their nobles shambled from Cologne through the Rhineland, Hungary and Bulgaria towards Constantinople. Whole villages of Jews who wouldn't accept instant baptism were slaughtered in what were the forerunners of the nineteenth century pogroms. The general looting, rape and property destruction which the mob unleashed right across central Europe pales into insignificance against the impact of that crusade on the Jewish population.

That single episode wiped away the distinction in Jewish minds between ancestral Jews of Palestine and the Khazar converts. They all suffered the same fate because of their faith, not because of their ancestry. They were now all more Jewish than ever. Their communities became more tightly knit and because of that their attachment to Jerusalem and their longing for the Messianic Age became stronger and stronger. Judah Halevi, the poet-physician, was 25 at the time. Another ingredient for the twentieth century showdown was being weighed out. The Khazar dispersion and the crusade calamity were complementary in developing the new Jewish self awareness.

When the Western Christian rabble reached Constantinople the Byzantines were so aghast that they were refused entry to the city and were shipped across the Bosphorus to face the Turks as quickly as possible. They got their just deserts. They were massacred completely by the first Turkish attack. But the church was quick to take full advantage of that needless, stupidly devised exercise in papal influence and tragedy for humanity. The massacre on October 21, 1096 of 300,000 lily-white martyrs – the pope had said they were – provided first class propaganda material for the anti-Muslim campaign and to whip up recruits for successive crusades.^{88 89 90} However while it was happy to take advantage of the abortive operation it is no wonder that the church is reluctant to admit responsibility for that “people’s crusade” and that the military exercise which was only then being organized is usually described as “the first crusade.”

Some 80,000 well organized and somewhat better disciplined crusaders, including strong cavalry forces which have become revered as knights in shining armour, led by Frankish and Norman princes in league with the pope and dominated by their armies, had gathered at Constantinople by May 1097. They captured Nicaea quickly and easily and Byzantine forces then occupied it promptly to prevent it from being looted. The crusaders then moved on to a major battle at Dorylaeum on June 29th. Organized Turkish resistance ended at that point. But the Turkish army was not their only opponent. Dogged local resistance and ambushes combined with summer conditions in harsh unfamiliar environments to make progress slow and to bring the worst of treachery and self interest out of the crusaders. Private crusader states were set up at Edessa in lower Armenia and at Antioch in Syria by the most disgraceful methods.

... SLAUGHTER AND DESTRUCTION

Jerusalem was reached just two years after the crusaders had crossed the Bosphorus and it was captured on July 15th 1099 after a one month siege. The savagery and butchery of three days of blood lust compares with anything in recorded history – including the destruction of the Holy City in 135. The pope’s brainwashed crusaders splashed through streams of blood of women, children and defeated defenders as it ran down the streets.^{91 92} Under Muslim rule quite a large community of Jews had grown up in Jerusalem and those who had not been slaughtered in three days of holy terror were rounded up, driven into one of the synagogues and incinerated. That little exercise marked the end of Jewish settlement in the city of their faith for several hundred years. One of the Pope’s aims had been accomplished. At least he would have been happy on that count. Among the Jews slaughtered was the entire, substantial settlement of Karaites which had provided missionaries for work in centres throughout the Byzantine Empire as well as throughout the Muslim world. Karaite missionary enterprise therefore virtually ceased and this compounded the decline of Karaism (especially in the East) which had already been triggered by Saadiah ben Joseph’s vigorous counter-campaign against the sect and the recovery of Rabbinical Judaism⁹³

A Latin state stretching from the Gulf of Aqaba to Edessa and based on Jerusalem was set up and the “legality” of the crusader states of Edessa, Antioch and a third at Tripolis was recognized with their inclusion in it as principalities. The Greek Orthodox patriarch was replaced by a Latin, the Orthodox community found itself under harsher restrictions than it had experienced under the Turkish Muslim “infidels” and the struggle between Constantinople and Rome became deeper instead of being solved by Rome’s aid. Synagogues and mosques, including the Mosque of ‘Umar, were seized and converted into churches in yet another sharp break from Muslim tolerance. But worse was still to come. Jerusalem was declared a Christian city. Was Rome trying to invoke the prophecy of Revelation, perhaps? Both Jews and Muslims were excluded from it, their property was forfeited and they became serfs in a feudal system imposed by European overlords whose law, culture, medicine and education were quite inferior to their own.

Muslim moves to reverse the situation ought to have been expected, but Europe’s Christians, indoctrinated with ideas of their own superiority, were shocked when Edessa fell in 1144, and another crusade was declared. The Muslims of Syria, Palestine and Egypt united under Saladin (for whom Maimonides later became family physician) to fight it. The outcome was a drawn out debacle for the crusaders who were led by Europe’s two senior crowned heads – the kings of Germany and France – but there were two small side benefits. A small English contingent was organized officially to take part in the crusade but most of its members were never to enjoy the views of Palestine. They joined up with a Flemish contingent and relieved the Muslims of Lisbon. The city was gratefully accepted by the Portuguese as a base for a new Christian kingdom. They had been trying to secede from the kingdom of Castile for several years. The pope recognized that as crusading, of course. Similarly, one German division stayed home from the Holy Land and subjugated the Wends at the southern approach to Denmark. That was also crusading.

Perhaps it was a coincidence, or perhaps it was trumped up in another recruiting exercise, but it was in the year Edessa fell that the notorious story began to circulate that during the Passover, Jews must kill a child, crucify him and drink his blood as a part of their ritual. A youth, William of Norwich, who was said to have been killed by Jews was declared a martyr and although he was never officially canonized stories of miracles performed in his name were spread by Thomas of Monmouth, an abundance of icons was produced and his remains were transferred to Norwich Cathedral in 1171. Similar martyrdoms were ‘documented’ with monotonous regularity during the second half of the century. Perhaps the most infamous was that of Simon of Trent in 1475. Seventeen Jews were forced to confess to his ritual murder. They, and a host of others, were executed and, amid some controversy, confirmation of the verdict became the subject of a papal bull. Simon was beatified and Jews were not admitted to Trent for about three hundred years.⁹⁴

England became totally entangled in the net of the crusades in 1187 after Saladin captured Jerusalem in a Jihad or Holy War which brought the Latin kingdom to an end with surprising mercy compared with the Christian crusades. Richard the Lion Hearted and Philip II of France were caught in the politics of international competition but, for all that, Richard's determination to take England into the crusade is still difficult to understand. To raise the money needed he released the Scots king from vassalage for a lump sum of 10,000 marks, levied a tax on landowners with 100 acres of land or more and also levied a tax on men who were not prepared to take a trip to the Holy Land. It was a case of your money or your life. Out of that crusade came the annexation of Cyprus; the relief of Acre and a series of other coastal towns; and a peace treaty which gained access to Jerusalem for Christians, plus three territorial footholds for Christian powers. That peace treaty provided a talking point hundreds of years later when world powers were again tussling for economic gain from Asia Minor. England held the Palestinian coast from Tyre to Jaffa, France held the Lebanese/Syrian coastal section from Beirut to Margat and also Antioch, and the Armenians held a section of the south eastern coast of Turkey. In spite of tales of brilliance to be woven into English heritage, Richard came away with blood on his hands. He executed 3,000 Muslims in cold blood in Acre when their ransom money didn't arrive on time.

In addition to that, his decision to lead a crusade, and the manner in which he raised money for it, triggered the first large scale civil purges against Jews in England which had previously been a haven for refugees from oppression in Europe. Communities in London, Norwich, Lynn, Dunstable and Stamford all felt the deadly thrust of the bloody sword – even while Richard was being crowned in London on September 3rd 1189. But the worst came in York. The local Jewish community took refuge in the castle and held out against a siege for some time. When all hope was lost they systematically killed each other one night, led by their rabbi, to deprive the English Christians of their pleasure in a blood bath next morning.

Richard was captured in Austria while on his way home in December 1192 and held to ransom for the immense sum of 150,000 marks. The Duke Leopold was determined to take revenge for insults he suffered at Richard's hands while they were together in Palestine.⁹⁵ The decision to raise that money from further taxes in England over the next twelve months kept interfaith antagonism running at fever pitch and the people could hardly be told that it was necessary because of Richard's religious or racial bigotry.

After so much experience with the crusade technique Rome began to put it to other uses. Three so-called orders of chivalry were established. The Order of St. John was to run hospitals for veterans. It did. But its involvement in less savoury aspects of Latin power politics kept it on the run. It was expelled from Jerusalem, set up a base in Cyprus, then Rhodes and finally Malta.

The Knights Templars, with a base on Mount Moriah, were to protect Christian pilgrims en route to and from Jerusalem. They may have done that, but they also set themselves up as a banking and trading house, 'acquired' large tracts of land throughout Christendom, including the Crusader States, and dabbled in inter-tribal Muslim politics. Their order was finally dissolved a hundred years later by order of a Council at Vienne.

It was the third order, the Teutonic Knights, which had also been established to run hospitals, which left the greatest scar on Christianity. The pope and the Duke of Masovia enlisted the aid of the order to Christianize Prussia and the Baltic States and the emperor granted its grand master princely powers. It was entitled to annex any lands which it might capture from pagans, provided they were given Christian instruction and compensation for the seizure of their land. As the knightly enthusiasm degenerated into a lecherous scramble for estates the pope called in the newly-founded Dominican order to take over the religious work. He changed the split up of captured land to allocate one third to the bishop and only two thirds to the captor. It took fifty years to convert Prussia by this technique. Castles and German immigrants to work the estates appeared everywhere. The “new Christians” were simply the serfs again. When it came to Lithuania’s turn for the conversion treatment, its king, Jagiello, took a leaf out of the Swedish and Russian books and accepted Christianity “freely” in 1386 by making an alliance with the Poles, marrying a Christian princess, being baptized and inviting a Roman bishop to Vilma. The Teutonic crusaders were foiled. Done out of another big land grab.^{96 97}

Under a treaty between the Teutonic conquerors and the conquered the rite of baptism was obligatory for everyone within one month. Anyone who declined the privilege was to be banished and anyone who relapsed into pagan worship was to be reduced to slavery. Converts had to adopt monogamy; build churches and attend on Sundays and feast days; support the clergy financially; confess to a priest at least once a year; observe the Lenten fast and take communion at Easter.⁹⁸

... AND OPPOSITION CRUSHED

Another secondary use of the crusade technique was to eliminate Rome’s theological opponents. Even before the Lateran Council in 1215 and well before the Inquisition was officially constituted by Pope Gregory IX hoards of crusaders were being gathered to remove the irritation of heretics. The city of Beziers was an important centre in that Mediterranean coastal strip of France which had seen a political change from Visigothic Arianism to Catholicism then a welcome change to Islam and an unwelcome change back to Catholicism.

It was only natural that such changes would lead through syncretism to the adoption of all kinds of unorthodox beliefs and practices as people tried to rationalize conflicting teachings and retain some sense of identity. Beziers became a fruitful hunting ground for any group which promoted a new “final” religion. Supporters of the Cathari and Bogomil sects from Bulgaria and Germany took refuge from persecution in southern France during its more settled period under the Muslims and a blend of their beliefs took root rapidly with the sect taking the name Albigenses. They and their beliefs, known as the Albigensian heresy, were condemned at the third and fourth Lateran Councils (1179 and 1215) and a drawn out crusade was mounted against them. Some 20,000 people were put to the sword in a bitter campaign without regard to age or sex.^{99 100 101} But the crusades were not over. In 1204, the year Maimonides died, after three years of shame the pope temporarily “reunited” the eastern and western churches in a crusade which had been diverted from Jerusalem partly for that purpose and partly to raise funds to pay Venetian banks and shipping companies for the cost of the crusade by looting Constantinople and its coastal provinces.

Then came the most heinous crime of the crusades. Working on the basis that the adult population was disenchanted with the crusades and needed a fresh stimulus to gather recruits, quite apart from the fact that the flower of its manhood had been killed during the crusades anyway, a children's crusade was organized in France and the Rhinelands in 1212. It got out of hand and the excitement generated led thousands of young boys to march to Marseilles and into Italy. At the French port they were lured on board ships and sold into slavery in Egypt. Those who headed for Italy either perished on the way or dispersed among the serfs.¹⁰²

In turning even that tragedy into a recruiting campaign against Islam the pope declared that children had put adults to shame and he pushed on with preparation for a crusade against Egypt. An absolute political farce developed from the struggles between the church hierarchy which was intent on maintaining its religious self-righteousness, its dominance over the various states, and its dominance over an emperor who brought Jews, Muslims and pagans into his court in open defiance of the church and as a public criticism of its arrogant self-misunderstanding. Frederick II had absolutely no intention of mounting a military crusade against the Muslims or against any other people on the basis of their faith. The pope excommunicated him, proclaimed a crusade against him and invaded his Italian provinces with the intention of annexing them to the papal states. Responding appropriately, Frederick sailed with an army for the Holy Land after he had married the daughter and heir to the Christian claimant to the throne of Jerusalem. But of course he didn't draw swords. He drew chairs at the table of the Sultan instead, discussed the Mongol push west, and returned with not only a peace treaty but also the crown to a revived Christian Kingdom of Jerusalem. He had no trouble in either expelling the pope's crude crusaders from his territory or in extracting absolution from the pope.

GENGHIS KHAN: A COUP FOR ISLAM

It probably meant nothing to the pope that the Sultan's accommodating gesture was a short term plan to avoid a war on his western front while he had the Mongol invasions to worry about out east, nor that it was equally in Europe's interests to have that arrangement. The brilliantly led and highly disciplined Mongols had already made one exploratory push into Russia via Persia, Iraq, the Caucasus and the former Khazar Khanate about seven years before. The European powers had badly misjudged that expedition. They seem to have been unable to grasp its significance as an armed exploration to determine what resources there were and what resistance there would be to a full scale invasion. They saw it as a hit and run looting expedition and simply rejoiced when the Mongol armies moved on.

Genghis Khan had the same idea as the pope. World domination. But he made no pretence that his aims were other than political and he was determined to do the job properly in due course. He was consolidating his position in China and had gained firm control east of the Caspian sea and Ural Mountains. In west Asia the Shahdom of Khwarism had been pushed further west into Persia, the smaller caliphates had been eliminated and the major ones had been brought into somewhat closer cooperation. They were expecting and preparing for another attack. But in Europe there was no coordinated defence against a future attack. The region was preoccupied with religion-based conflicts. The northern Russian principalities were energetically trying to keep the Teutonic Knights in the Balkans at bay. The central European states, linked with the Roman Church, had nothing in common with either the basically pagan northern Russian principality or the southern Russian principalities and their Byzantine allies. The result was that when the Mongols came again in 1236 to conquer and to establish vassal states, Europe was completely unprepared and the eastern states began their dominoes dance. The Mongols had got as far as Poland and Hungary and were moving on to Austria before the unexpected happened. The Great Khan died, the Mongols got caught up in their own succession struggle, and their armies withdrew from everywhere west of Russia. That was when the Sultan saw his opportunity, struck at Jerusalem in 1244 and relieved Rome of that artificial kingdom which Frederick had taken home with him.

The stop-go crusades were about to start again with Louis IX of France immediately agreeing to lead one. But before he did, the pope sent emissaries to the new Great Khan asking him to lay off Christian Europe, to adopt Christianity and to cooperate in areas of common interest with the pope. They were well received, invited to stay for the grand installation and then packed off back to Rome with a message that the pope and his princes should submit to the Great Khan. A question mark hung over the issue of collaboration. Stalemate perhaps. But at least there was not a renewed attack and so Louis IX took his turn to lead a crusade in 1248. He reached Egypt and spent some time there – as a captive until his ransom money arrived in 1250!

More papal emissaries visited the Great Khan and we are told there was no positive response. But only a few years later a Mongol army struck west again and this time it stayed south of the Caspian in Muslim country. To the great relief of everyone, it eliminated the Shiite sect of Assassins but then captured and destroyed much of Baghdad and Damascus before being checked in 1260 by the Muslim armies near Nazareth. In the same year Mongol expansionism came to an end when the empire was divided among a number of princes who settled down to either govern their new territories or fight among themselves. With the pressure relieved the Egyptian Sultans were able to regain the coastal regions from the Latins one by one, but of course a strong Christian presence remained. Only one more abortive crusade was attempted.

If the popes and their emissaries had been hoping that the Mongols would eliminate Islam and then link up with the church at the Bosphorus their hopes, high until 1260, soon turned to despair. The Mongol rulers found Islam to their liking and adopted it one by one. Persia was the first in 1295. Although Islam was already the dominant religion of the region its decision was very significant because its territory included the base of both the fanatical Assassins, which had brought Islam into disrepute, and also the Nestorian Christian Church. The Khan had sent a deputation to the Council of Lyons in 1274, twenty one years before, as well as giving full consideration to the Nestorian Church. At Lyons the Eastern and Western Churches have been temporarily reconciled, but neither of them took any action to establish an alliance with the Khan or to build on his approach.

Then in 1340 the Mongol Khanates of Russia and Turkestan followed suit and adopted Islam.¹⁰³ Part of modern day Russia, lying north of Afghanistan and Iran, Turkestan had an effective presence of all of the religions of the period except Roman Christianity. The central Russian region apparently only had a smattering of Greek Christianity and Islam over its basic paganism. However because of the religious tolerance of the Mongols, the existing strength of the Greek Church in Western Russia, and the rapidly changing power patterns in Russia, these decisions appear to have had little effect. They were only a ripple in the progress of Orthodox Christianity at the time although they became an important factor in the twentieth century.

But the Church in Rome had only itself to blame for the fact that the decisions were even made. The Great Khan, no doubt recalling the papal emissaries' visits of 1246 and Rome's apparent eagerness for a relationship which amounted to an alliance against the Arab nations, sent a request to Rome in 1269, five years before the Persian Khan's approach to the Council of Lyons, for one hundred Christian teachers for his court. He got only two. There was no pope at the time to respond properly to the request and the church was too busy tearing itself apart in the west to worry about a bit of evangelism in a kingdom only four times the size of all Europe. The Inquisition was in full swing. The Great Khan was therefore very fortunate indeed that Rome declined the opportunity to spread that sort of Christianity and bigotry across Mongolia, China, Korea and a half of Russia. Six years later, and only the year after Persia's Khan formally adopted Islam, the Nestorian Church happily established an archbishopric at Peking. Christians were back again after abuses of the monastic system had led to all monasteries in China, Christian and Buddhist alike, being closed 400 years before. The Muslims did not operate a system of monasteries and had not been expelled, but against that they had not established a large scale evangelical program either.

Of course the church had not been inactive in Western Europe while the crusades and Mongol invasions were in progress in the east. It had been stung into action by the vigour of Jewish scholarship in Spain and France, the professional and commercial success of Jewish communities and, in particular, by the effect of Maimonides' writing. His talk of rationalism in religion was bad enough when the church was preaching that Christianity was strictly a matter of faith and absolute acceptance of doctrines which it, as the exclusive and infallible interpreter of divine revelation, had politicked into the record books. If people began to believe his story the church would have a hell of a job on its hands. But when he claimed that Christianity and Islam both had a divine role to play, together with Judaism, in bringing mankind to the Messianic Age and Salvation he had really gone too far!

THE CHURCH'S ANSWER: AQUINAS

If Maimonides was correct, then the entire fabric of Christianity had to be dismantled and rebuilt from the bottom up. Where would it start and where would it finish? The doctrine of the Trinity was untouchable. Everything was built around that. Then Muhammad: the church had gone to great lengths to deny him and his attacks on the church, Mariology, icons, saint worship and intercession. If Islam was indeed an instrument of God's will, what would Europe do to a church which had sent hundreds of thousands of its young men in their prime to their deaths to recapture the Holy City from it? The answers and the implications were so staggering that Maimonides had to be wrong. The trouble was that a lot of people believed him.

The Church knew that the challenge from Maimonides, a Jew, was at least as great as the challenge of Islam through Muhammad. They were both saying "turn back the clock and start all over again." The church either had to prove he was wrong or produce its own rationale to justify its position. It could also resort to its old well tried tricks of intimidation and denigration. It tried the lot. Already, in 1215, the Fourth Lateral Council in Rome had decreed that all Jews must wear some form of identification at all times and the decree was being rigorously enforced from country to country by various techniques and with a wide variety of identification tokens. Maimonides had been dead for eleven years but his Guide of the Perplexed was read more widely every day. Thomas Aquinas would not be born for another ten years. The tide rolled on.

Born into the nobility of Naples in 1225, Aquinas was placed in the Benedictine monastery at Monte Cassino as an oblate at the age of five. Shades of Boniface. However his family resisted his decision to take religious orders and he went through a rough period while he was making up his mind at the age of 19 whether to stay in the church system or get out. He stayed in, took Dominican orders, extended his studies in theology, and began lecturing in scripture in 1252 at the age of 27. After a period in Paris he returned to Italy, served in the papal court, became preacher-general of the Dominican order then served in a series of senior posts in Italy and France.

A prodigious but enigmatic writer, Aquinas sits at the pinnacle of the Western Church's pre-Reformation attempts to present its teachings and its doctrines in a rational manner.¹⁰⁴ He was widely hailed as the Christian Church's answer to Maimonides whose writing was by then dominating theological thinking and attracting the attention of academics and active thinkers who were not committed to a particular religious viewpoint. However the influence of Maimonides and his successors was not restricted to the uncommitted and, in any case, there just wasn't room for anyone who was uncommitted. His influence had begun to undermine the authority of the clergy in France and Spain and this in turn aggravated the conflict and power struggle between the French and Roman wings of the church. In some regions, especially in France, the struggle of the former Frankish church to avoid subordination to Rome which the politics of Charles Martel, Boniface and the popes had imposed, still simmered just beneath the skin. It erupted periodically with competing claims for papal office and the so-called 'decisive' crusades against heretics in southern France which Innocent III had called for at the fourth Lateran Council, after the "Children's' Crusade" had brought several related issues to the boil again.¹⁰⁵

The Dominican order in which Aquinas had taken vows, had been set up between 1220 and 1223 at Bologna, northern Italy, to put an end to the continuing Albigensian heresy in Southern France and to tidy up the mess which the crusade against it had left. At the same time the Franciscan order, which had been set up in 1209, was expanded and reconstituted to help with the task.¹⁰⁶ As a young oblate Aquinas would have been told of the glorious exploits of both orders in putting down the heresy to keep people on the straight and narrow. He was about six when the Inquisition really began to pick up steam and he was nine when the Dominicans condemned Maimonides' Guide of the Perplexed as prejudicial to faith.¹⁰⁷ To have a copy of it was as big a crime as being an Albigensian. He was 17, and it was still two years before the confrontation between the church and his aristocratic parents over the question of his joining the Dominicans, when a big public bon fire of 24 cart loads of Talmudic books, priceless Judaic manuscripts and Maimonides' writings was held in Paris. They had been collected in raids by Dominicans and Franciscans on Jewish homes, institutions and Libraries while the Jewish community was at worship on the Sabbath a few weeks earlier.¹⁰⁸ Perhaps these events seemed distant and hardly the sort of things he would become involved in, but perhaps the glorification of them was a stimulus to his decision to join the order. In any case by the time he was 38 (in 1263) some of his major works were being used as ammunition in just such situations. There was a never-to-be-repeated exercise in freedom of speech and Christian-Jewish dialogue when Rabbi Moses ben Nahman (Nahmanides) won hands down in a four day debate with a Jewish convert to Christianity in front of the King of Aragon.¹⁰⁹ At that stage Aquinas was home in Naples after his first round of posts in Paris.

Aquinas cannot be described as a critical, independent writer. He did not go back to square one and apply his undoubtedly brilliant mind to the basic theological issues which separated Judaism and Christianity. He started quite definitely with the church's self understanding with which he had been indoctrinated from the age of five and the doctrines which he was appointed to teach. Because of this, what he did in fact was not demonstrate Christianity to be a rational religion but use the techniques of rational thinking in an attempt to justify the church's self assessment, its definition of God and most of its doctrines of the day. He confirms this in the forward to his "Summa Theologiae" which is regarded by many as his greatest work.

*"Since the teacher of Catholic truth has not only to develop advanced students but also to shape those who are making a start...we propose in this work to convey the truths which are part of the Christian religion in a style serviceable for the training of beginners...(and)...we shall try to pursue the truths of Christian theology..."*¹¹⁰

Aquinas set out to justify most of the church's doctrines, but not all. He developed an elaborate case to support the church's system of sacraments but he seems to have been distinctly uncomfortable with its teaching about transubstantiation. This had only been formalized at the Lateran IV even though belief in the Real Presence of Christ in the Eucharist under the appearance of bread and wine had been widely preached from the eighth century. The denial of the belief that any change takes place in the bread and wine used in the Eucharist, called the Berengarian Heresy after its proposer, had actually been condemned by various synods from 1055 and finally by a council held in Rome in 1079, 146 years before Aquinas was born, when Berengarius was forced to retract his teaching.^{111 112} He relied quite heavily on Aristotle's philosophy to justify it.

However he didn't throw up any smoke screens to hide his feelings on the church's teaching about Mary's conception. Working in the very city where support for that doctrine was later made obligatory for all of the university's staff, Paris, he bluntly opposed the proposition that she was immaculately conceived. And he produced some quite amazing reasoning to interpret or modify some of Augustine's teachings while appearing to justify them. His discussions on the unity of God, the Trinity and the origin of the Holy Spirit within the Trinitarian concept show masterly skill in the use of words (with due credit to the translator), but also emphasize quite dramatically that the concept cannot be supported by rationale.

Extracts from his published works illustrate the point.

On Being and Essence is one of his earliest works and is thought to have been written between 1250 and 1256 (when he was between 25 and 31 years of age) which places it either in his advanced student or early teaching years and possibly before he was ordained, which was sometime between 1248 and 1252.¹¹³ In it he wrote:

*...therefore everything that is such that its existence is other than its nature must have its existence from another. And because everything that exists through another is led back to that which exists through itself as to its first cause, there must be one thing which is the cause of existence in all things because it alone is the ACT-OF-BEING.*¹¹⁴

A great effort is needed to interpret that as a statement supporting equality and eternal co-existence within the Trinity. Later, writing about 1269 in the most famous of his works, Summa Theologiae, having laboured his way at length through an effort to rationalize the Trinity he wrote:

The Holy Spirit is distinguished personally from the Son insofar as the origin of one is distinguished from the origin of the other; but the difference itself of origin is found in the fact that the Son is only from the Father, but the Holy Spirit is from the Father and the Son; for otherwise the processions would not be distinguished from each other....Because it is from what the Son received from the Father that the Holy Spirit proceeds from him, it can be said that the Father spirates the Holy Spirit through the Son or that the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Father through the Son, which means the same thing.

Later in the same work he wrote:

*Augustine says (Fulgentius, De Fide ad Petrum ii): 'It is a property of the Father to beget the Son.' But to beget is an act. Therefore, notional acts are to be found in God. In the divine persons distinction is founded on origin. But origin can be properly designated only by certain acts. So in order to designate the order of origin in the divine persons, we must attribute notional acts to the persons.*¹¹⁵

These passages must be seen against the back drop of the ever-tightening tangle which the church had got itself into. The Inquisition was in full swing by then and the church had officially been running heretics, Jews and Muslims to ground for 38 years although, in practice, for a great deal longer. In 1229 Frederick II approved an edict entrusting the hunting out of heretics to state officials but Pope Gregory IX believed that the emperor would not press the issue because of his well established religious tolerance. The pope thereupon claimed the office for the church in 1231. He had already appointed panels of inquisitors who were, as already noted, largely chosen from the Dominican order of which Aquinas was a member and the Franciscan order. The inquisitors were assisted by juries of clerics and laymen and if an accused refused to confess to heresies the most outrageous methods were used to bring about a change of heart. Penalties for proven guilt ranged from confiscation of property or imprisonment with torture to death by burning at the stake. Confessors were let off lightly with fines, flogging or appropriate penances.^{116 117}

The church needed a fairly uniform basis on which to judge heresy and the writings of Aquinas helped to provide it. But in addition to that, his Summa Theologiae also provided the justification for the death penalty.

*There is the sin, whereby they deserve not only to be separated from the church by excommunication, but also to be shut off from the world by death. For it is a much more serious matter to corrupt faith, through which comes the soul's life, than to forge money, through which temporal life is supported ... But on the side of the church there is mercy, with a view to the conversion of them that are in error; and therefore the church does not straightway condemn, but after a first and a second admonition...if he be found still stubborn, the church gives up hope of his conversion and takes thought for the safety of others, by separating him from the church by sentence of excommunication; and, further, leaves him to the secular court, to be exterminated from the world by death...*¹¹⁸

THE BASIS OF CATHOLIC THEOLOGY

But there was even dissent over the basis for faith, heresy and punishment which Aquinas provided. Three years after his death both the bishops of Paris and the Archbishop of Canterbury condemned selections from his teachings. As if in response to these criticisms the Dominican order officially upheld Aquinas' teachings in 1278 and declared them to be the basis for its operation. But then, in contrast, the Franciscans, the other main partners in the Inquisition, prohibited the reading of the "Summa Theologiae" in their schools only four years later. At least the papal office was being consistent with some of its previous decisions when it canonized Aquinas about 50 years later. However his influence and reputation only reached its peak six hundred years later, in 1879, when Pope Leo XII directed that his teachings should be the basis of the theology of the Catholic Church.¹¹⁹ Quite a departure from the use of the Good News as the basis for the life and teaching of the-body-of-Christ-on-earth in the Messianic age and certainly a long way from the teaching that he who is without sin should cast the first stone.

Aquinas was also named patron saint of Catholic schools and education.¹²⁰ The pope wrote in his encyclical at that time that "... as the enemies of the Catholic name borrow their warlike preparations from philosophic method when they begin their attacks on religion, so the defenders of the science of God borrow many weapons from the stores of philosophy by which to defend the dogmas of revelation."

The church was beginning to feel the pressure of close scrutiny again. Darwin had published his "Origin of Species" and "The Descent of Man", and the church had responded by declaring the pope infallible. Karl Marx, whose Jewish family had given in to the church's coercion and accepted baptism had published "Das Kapital" and, with Friedrich Engels, "The Communist Manifesto." In addition Europe's pogroms against Jews were approaching that intolerable climax which led directly to the establishment of the World Zionist Organization and plans for a national home for Jews.

In declaring Aquinas' teaching to be the basis of the Catholic Church's theology the pope was proclaiming to the world that in over 600 years the church had been unable to produce a more reasoned response to Maimonides and his religious rationale than that which one of its teachers had written in the heat of the Inquisition as an urgent response to the logic of developments in Jewish thinking. The one bright spot is that the pope's decision played down Augustine and his teaching.

Another 38 years on, in the upheaval of World War I, with his peace plan rejected by both sides, with the church despised in Russia where the revolution was by then a fact, and with the British Government secretly negotiating to arrange a Jewish national home in Palestine, Pope Benedict XV could do no more than uphold Aquinas' teaching yet again. The study of philosophy and theology and the teaching of "these sciences" was to be carried out accurately by seminary professors according to the "arguments, doctrine and principles of St. Thomas which they are inviolately to hold." he said. Clerics who had already studied humanity were to devote themselves to further study on that basis: to philosophy for two years and to theology for four years.¹²¹

It seems the church was determined not to learn. Aquinas had been a very faithful servant to it and had tried to present its teachings as theology but above theological comparison and as science but above scientific evaluation.¹²² Even in spite of his lengthy reasoning, he was caught in the same rut as his predecessors: believe what we tell you to believe because as the church we tell you to believe it. But by the time the church reached the twentieth century it should have had a new line of reasoning to support its position if it was not prepared to review its theology and if it had to play according to Maimonides' rules of rational thinking. It had run out of excuses. It was living in an age of science with every aid that scientific method and thought could offer readily available to it and yet all it could do was cut deeper into the same old rut: believe what we tell you to believe because our saint, Thomas Aquinas, told you to believe it 650 years ago.

Poor man. That was another part of the church's teaching that he had difficulty with: saints, intercession and Mariology. His teaching on prayer was simple and direct. When we approach the throne of grace our prayers should be confident, ordered, suitable, devout and humble he said, and he who taught us the Lord's Prayer graciously hears our prayer along with the Father.¹²³ There is not much room for saintly intercession in that sort of teaching, and yet there are still prayers addressed to both Mary and Augustine, and popularly attributed to Aquinas, in circulation and use.¹²⁴

Having spent his working life trying to justify faith by means of rational thinking, Aquinas introduced a new twist with the last of his major published works. He set out five arguments to try to prove that God exists and that the world existed because of God. It was another response to Maimonides who had built on the arguments of both Aristotle, then much despised by the church, and a Muslim philosopher, Avicenna, in setting out four proofs of God's existence and unity in the "Guide of the Perplexed." Maimonides' arguments were aimed squarely at the Christian doctrine of the Trinity. They were devastating, but at one point in his work he admitted that it was easier to negate the non-existence of God than to assert God's actual existence.¹²⁵ Aquinas' "proofs" were a Christianized adaptation of Maimonides and they were going to provide the absolute statement which, in effect, would eliminate the need for faith. His rationale was not equal to the task.

In December 1273 Aquinas was working on an assignment which was never to be finished. It was probably part III of the Summa Theologiae. Some say he experienced a vision while others say that he suffered a breakdown. But, for what ever reason, he put aside his pen, declared that he could not go on and that such things had been revealed to him that all that he had written seemed, then, to be as so much straw.¹²⁶¹²⁷ This raises the question whether he was inspired with new insight to reinforce his published views of the church or whether he was overwhelmed and disillusioned by the enormity of the tragedy which flowed from the inquisition in which he had played such an influential role. Perhaps he had glimpsed a new Jerusalem rising from the heap of straw. Perhaps he then saw a difference between what God is like and what he was teaching. He died without adding to his writing three months later while on his way to Lyons for the council of reconciliation with the Eastern Church to which he had been summoned by Gregory X. Some writers say that he died as the result of an accident but Clark reports that he was already in weakened health when he began the journey, that he fell ill, broke his journey at his sister's house and was taken from there to the Cistercian monastery at Fossanuova where he died listening to the Canticle of Canticles.¹²⁸

It was that council to which the Mongol Khan of Persia had sent a deputation only to be rebuffed or, at best, ignored. The church was still preoccupied with its internal struggles and the inquisition. It would stay that way for some time. The ferocity of the Inquisition was still rising and falling with its terror concentrated into France and Italy, of less influence in the rest of the Holy Roman Empire and Spain, and hardly apparent at all in Britain. Intimidation was a most effective way of maintaining the church's political authority and its vice-like grip on the minds of the people. It was also the most effective way of preventing people from understanding their relationship with God. It bottled up human aspirations and salvation because it retarded human and social development, put blinkers on education and human understanding, inhibited normal community and trading activities, and inhibited contact with other peoples and development in political thought.

Maimonides had said that man needs peace and security for his physical well being so that his spirit may be free to acquire truth. The sole aim of political law should be to regulate the relations between man and man to provide a base of external well being, he said.¹²⁹ The church just could not comprehend such a concept. In its view what humanity needed was the church's teaching, its ritual of baptism and maybe a few other things like absolution. It couldn't understand that ethical self-discipline and not imposed ritualistic discipline is necessary for the liberation of the spirit which then enables mankind to achieve knowledge and enlightenment. It couldn't understand that baptism isn't something magical and exclusive but that it is public confirmation of a commitment to the Messiah's teaching and example.

Also, in the church's self assessment, it had faced and defeated another challenge and was establishing its proper and impregnable position. It failed to see that by shaking off that challenge, by refusing to reassess its position and the theology on which it was based, and by continuing to use intimidation to strengthen its political position it was making the inevitable reassessment more traumatic. It was building a solid shell around itself. But it did not stop to think that the hardest shell takes the biggest hammer and makes the biggest bang when it breaks. It was busy proving Maimonides' point about intimidation having the opposite effect to peace and security. It was also confirming – without wanting to and without being aware of it – Maimonides' point about one movement or course of action being the forerunner of the next and the next, and so on. Every major action which it took to strengthen its position at the expense of someone else or out of disregard for the Messiah's teaching-by-example brought about a situation or a reaction which became an ingredient in the twentieth century trouble in the triangle. Now, about eight hundred years after the publication of Maimonides' major works and the church's effort to suppress them, and in the second generation after the establishment of the State of Israel as a consequence of the trouble in the triangle, academic interest in his writings is at a new peak. In 1954 a Maimonides Year was proclaimed in Israel to mark the 750th anniversary of the death of the man who has been described as 'the greatest of Jews since Bible times'¹³⁰ and 'the supreme theologian of Medieval Jewry' who 'stood at the confluence of four cultures (Arab, Christian, Greek and Jewish) and whose mind carried the main intellectual currents of his time.'¹³¹ But the level of interest and the importance of his work to each of the partners in the triangle is such that in 1985 UNESCO¹³² organized a conference at its headquarters in Paris to celebrate the 850th anniversary of his birth. Although the conference was proposed by the World Jewish Congress, it was co-sponsored by Pakistan, India, Cuba, Spain and the Soviet Union, none of which had formal diplomatic relations with Israel at that time, and it attracted scholars from Africa, Asia, Europe and the Americas, including Jews, Muslims and Christians.¹³³

And now when we look back over the first 400 years of the Holy Roman Empire the main trends are easy to recognize. It was actually long before that period that the church's self-misunderstanding and misconduct had set the scene for the establishment and spread of Islam and it had been largely the challenge of Islam which prompted the establishment of the Holy Roman Empire in the first place. It was Islam which also provided the umbrella and the freedom which enabled Judaism to reach new heights of cultural and philosophical achievement in Spain and in Egypt. Then, together, they exposed the basic errors of the church which moved to inhibit European thought and economic and political development even further through its repressive backlash.

The church's antagonism towards both of its partner faiths in the triangle which was then fully formed caused Europe to lose its eastern trade routes and helped to prompt the crusades in an effort to reopen them. The politicking within the church to bring the Franks under Rome's authority deepened the internal divisions and helped to increase the severity of oppression in France. That politicking reached its peak with the crowning of Charlemagne and this aggravated the rift between east and west. That rift led in turn to competition for a place in Russia and the establishment of foreign principalities there; the destruction of the Khazar Jewish kingdom; the scattering of a massive population of converts to Judaism; and the very conspicuous severing of the ancestral tribal links between Judaism and Palestine.¹³⁴ It also strengthened the position and influence of Islam beyond the Arab empire and left Europe's defences unco-ordinated and ill prepared to face invasion.

These things also helped to bring on the crusades which then welded ancestral Jews and converts to Judaism into one tightly knit community; strengthened the Messianic attachment of the entire Jewish community to Jerusalem; replaced Muslim tolerance towards Christians with deeply entrenched bigotry between communities, and established European political footholds in the Middle East. The crusades also tightened the feudal system in Europe, repressed its social, economic and political development and introduced interfaith bigotry and terror to countries such as Britain where it had not been experienced previously. However another of their main effects was to stimulate Jewish scholarship even more. This led to a new understanding of the triangle – at least outside the corridors of power of the church – and to a new understanding of the Messianic Age for mankind. The ever-increasing complexity of the situation encouraged further syncretism, the growth of heresies and, of course, the Inquisition to put them down.

The church's self-understanding prevented it from seeing that the Inquisition was crushing Europe's spirit and its scholarship. If it had understood the opportunities for evangelism beyond Europe, which it neglected to concentrate on enforcing the Inquisition, the church did not show it. It was too busy screwing down the blinkers over the eyes of the people in its seven percent of the world's land masses to worry about the other 93 percent, especially since it was still preaching salvation in terms of Athanasius and Augustine.

Unfortunately Europe was only half way along that rugged Roman road from the papal Christmas celebrations of 800 to Luther's hammer and nails. The rest of the world still had a long wait to enjoy the thrill of salvation at the point of an inquisitorial sword. But the long term relationships between the three partners in the triangle had been firmly established. The church had made a bed of swords and the people of the world would have to lie on it for a very long time.

CHAPTER 9

WHEN THE COFFER RINGS

When Aquinas set out in January 1274 for the gathering he would not live to attend, the Council of Reconciliation at Lyons, the world was still only half way through the era of the Holy Roman Empire and the situation across Europe was generally very bleak and very unstable. For a couple of hundred years the design of the jigsaw puzzle which was Europe had changed repeatedly as principalities, kingdoms and khanates rose and fell and as popes and kings struggled for supremacy and for control of secular administration. The Mongols had made some strong exploratory sorties into Europe in 1221, crushing the Shahdom of Khwarizm in Persia and a number of Russian and Eastern European principalities along the way. They had then come back in force in 1236, staying north of the Caspian and Black Seas that time, and took only six years to sweep through Russia, Hungary and Poland, giving many principalities the temporary dual status of affiliates of the Holy Roman Empire and vassals of the Mongol Khan. The indicators all pointed to a continuation of instability.

The fringes of the continent had changed even more than its heartland, because the conflict between the church (together with the powers which it could coerce or beg to support it from time to time) and Islam complicated the situation. For the previous two hundred years the Muslims had continued to push east and south east through Afghanistan and into the Indian sub-continent and expansion in that direction did not seem to bother the church much at the time – as long as they stayed away from Europe. Of course the eastern Mediterranean and near east regions were subject to the same invasion pressures and instability as Europe. The result was that when Dar al-Islam began to decay also, with a lot of infighting and fragmentation, and the Mongols resumed their push westward in 1258 the Muslims were unable to resist and the Mongols crushed the Abbasid Caliphate at Baghdad. They appeared ready to sweep through Syria, Turkey and into southern Europe, and the fear of being swamped brought dramatic changes in the power structures of Dar al-Islam. The Muslim Turkish Mamluks regrouped very quickly and in 1260 their strength in the near east even brought a glimmer of hope for a bit of stability for the people of Europe when they blocked the westward thrust of the Mongols at the battle of Ayn Djalout, near Nazareth.

The turmoil and complexities of the second four hundred years of the Holy Roman Empire clearly make it impossible to deal with the period in detail so we must be content with a selection of highlights which helped to shape it and which illustrate the evolving relationships between the three partners in the triangle of faiths. Of course the power struggles for control of the church (or churches) continued. The Greeks had been flexing their muscles in an effort to topple the pope's puppet in Constantinople. They were fed up to the back teeth with 57 years of papal domination which followed the devious crusade of reunification in 1204. In 1261 they succeeded in re-establishing a rather weak Byzantine Empire by revolt, taking advantage of the breathing space which had been provided when the Seljuk Turks were removed from Anatolia by the Mongols a few years earlier. It was that new political situation, coupled with the fact that the Mongols in Syria had lost their belligerence as a result of the battle of Ayn Djalout and they, too, were showing a close interest in Islam, which made the Council of Reconciliation politically necessary. The Roman church's rebuff to the delegation from the Persian Mongol Khan which attended that council is therefore all the harder to understand – until we learn that Pope Gregory X used the council as a forum in an unsuccessful bid to finalize a crusade planned by Charles of Anjou for a few years earlier but canceled. Charles had personal ambitions which got in the way of his religious zeal and his nephew, Philip III of France, would not cooperate either.¹

DIVERSE VIEWS OF JEWS AND STATE

Other developments had brought another glimmer of hope for relief for some people in regions in Europe where the church of Rome had been unable to maintain its vice-like grip. Poland was such a place. It was Catholic but it was distinguished by real religious tolerance. Perhaps its tolerance had been influenced by the need to rebuild the country after the Mongol invasion of 1240–41 had left the Christian middle class cut to ribbons, the economy wrecked and the principal cities in ruins, but it was real. The Polish monarchy set about a deliberate policy of attracting merchants and craftsmen from Germany and the immigrants naturally included large numbers of Jews for whom Poland meant not only business opportunity but also escape from oppression in the Germany of the Holy Roman Empire. The first crusade could not be forgotten. There was the ever present prospect that it might happen again. What was good enough for the people of Beziers could surely be considered good enough for the Jews. But King Boleslav the Pious had other ideas.

BOLESNAV'S CHARTER

In 1264, (just after the great Jewish-Christian debate in front of the King of Spanish Aragon, while the prospect of a seventh and ultimate crusade was still only a papal daydream, while Aquinas was working on his Summa of Christian Teaching for Jews, Muslims and Pagans, and still then years before the Council of Reconciliation), Boleslav issued a model charter for the protection of liberties for Jews. Poland's Jews were assured of relative freedom from molestation as well as freedom of opportunity to an extent which was quite rare in Christian Europe to that time.² No door was to be closed to them. However the shine of apparent humanity in the king's decision loses a bit of its brilliance when we scratch a little deeper and find that the politics of immigration and capital cash flow did have quite a bit to do with it. As an incentive for enlistment in the glorious crusades the Fourth Lateran Council had ordered a moratorium on interest payments on money borrowed by crusaders. Just how the scheme worked is a little vague but it appears to have been effective in recruiting crusaders for various foul purposes in between the major treks towards the Holy Land and the eastern trade routes. It appears also that almost anyone could be declared a crusader for the purposes of gaining interest remission on money borrowed from a Jew. And of course during the Inquisition Jews would be arrested when they sought to press their claims for interest at the end of a four year moratorium and would not be released until they agreed to write off the debt altogether. Of course they could always be encouraged to agree by having a few nails torn out or some similar pleasantries. Then if a Christian beneficiary had any qualms about enjoying the financial benefits of such Jewish generosity he could always share them with a Papal pious cause such as financing the crusade against the Albigenses or Constantinople to ease his conscience.³

URBAN'S USURY CHARGES

Whether Pope Urban IV was dissatisfied with Jewish cooperation in this scheme or whether he was already gearing up for another crusade does not really matter, but in 1263 he turned the screws a bit tighter. He ordered that Jews were to be forced to remit usurious charges and that until they complied they were to be denied any contact at all with the Christian community.⁴ That was when Boleslav stepped in with his Jewish Charter. It worked well because the Jewish migrants got the peace and opportunities they were looking for and Boleslav got what he wanted too: large scale migration complete with the capital needed for Poland's rehabilitation. Of course the church couldn't let such a situation continue indefinitely and the clamour eventually broke in synods for the "equal treatment" of all Jews so that within a few generations Poland, too, was responding to the well tried inquisitorial techniques of France and Italy. Actually, so that we can get to the root of all the trouble which flowed from so-called Jewish usury we must delve a little deeper. When we do, we find, yet again, that the situation was a consequence of the church's exalted view of itself and its role, its narrow interpretation of Christian theology and the decisions which it took.

Medieval European society had no organized provision for banking or money lending either to provide for cases of need or to allow for personal initiative. The aristocracy didn't need one. Its members had adequate provision for personal negotiation with recourse to no end of devious alternatives if negotiation failed and they were not in the least interested in a financing system for the masses. It could mean competition and the break down of the existing social order in which the church was at the top of the pecking order. There was no room for that! At a time when, in the words of church historian J. L. Hurlbut, the papacy was at "the high water mark of power" Pope Innocent III wrote that not only the whole church but the whole world had been committed to the pope with "the right of finally disposing the imperial and all other crowns."⁵ When he was trying to justify the crusade against Constantinople a few years after the Third Lateran Council, he proclaimed himself, in the office of pope, to be the Vicar of Jesus Christ, a servant given pre-eminence over a family; successor of Peter, the Anointed of the Lord, the god of Pharaoh; set midway between God and man, less than God but greater than man and judge of all but judged by no one. ⁶ On this basis, according to August Franzen's reasoning, the sovereignty of the secular rulers was not excluded and the papal claim to leadership was only of an indirect character. Papal leadership "merely demanded the acknowledgment of the supreme norms of the Christian faith and the moral authority of the papacy," and in this way dualism was preserved. However countless previous and subsequent contests between the papacy and monarchs, suggest otherwise and Innocent worked with great cunning to develop a structure of papal liege lordships.

FOR INNOCENT, THE SUN RULES

In an episcopal letter 'The moon and the sun' dated October 1198 he wrote that: the Creator set up two luminaries in the heaven, the greater light to rule the day, the lesser to rule the night; similarly He set up two great dignities, one (the pontifical authority) to rule the souls, the other (the royal power) to rule over bodies; as the inferior moon derives her light from the sun, so the royal power derives its dignity from the pontifical authority. ⁷ In March 1202 he followed that with a claim of over-riding papal authority in the election of kings. Writing to the Duke of Zahringen he said the princes should recognize that the right to examine the person they elect king "belongs to us who anoint, consecrate and crown him ... and ... when in an election the votes of the princes are divided we may, after due warning and a fitting interval, favor one of the parties." ⁸ By various devious, coercive means, beginning with Sicily in 1198, Innocent soon numbered the kings of England, Aragon, Portugal, Denmark, Poland, Bohemia, Hungary, Dalmatia and other smaller territories among those who accepted their countries and their crowns from the popes as fiefs. In Franzen's words: "The preservation of law and peace, the traditional duties of the emperor, therewith passed to the papacy and a papal system of vassalage developed which was construed entirely on the strong moral authority of the pope." ⁹ However not everyone would accept his contention that the papal system of vassalage was construed entirely on the strong moral authority of the pope. It was a case of sheer power politics and callous exploitation of the church's grip on people's minds by the papacy.

After discussing the nature of the struggle for power between the English crown and the church which led to the appointment of Chancellor Thomas Becket as Archbishop of Canterbury and his subsequent assassination, Leslie Paul describes King John's abject vassalage to Innocent III as an even clearer example of the depth of the church's conflict with the state and the reality of papal power.¹⁰ In a dispute over authority for archiepiscopal appointments, the king denied the pope's appointee, Stephen Langton, entry to England and forced him into exile. England was placed under papal interdict, churches were closed, no masses were said, only baptism and burial was permitted, and the king was excommunicated. After four years, threatened with deposition and invasion, King John agreed to pay heavy reparations, surrendered his throne and the kingdom of England to Innocent III, and received them back as the pope's vassal.

From the powerful political and commercial positions which the church had gained (and was in the process of imposing more strenuously) and from the make up of its clergy it is reasonable to believe that these considerations were far more important than theology when the Third Lateran Council debated usury in 1179. The gradual change from a barter economy to a money economy since the depressing impact of the first crusade had already changed the face of feudal Europe and weakened the church's position as well as that of the aristocracy. However vast sums of money had been borrowed privately by crusaders without which the church would never have been able to mount its ghastly campaigns and that was the reason Council had the issue before it. In an historic and momentous decision the Council decided that interest could not be charged on loans between believers and, by way of a penal clause to enable the decision to be enforced, Christian burial was to be refused to all who followed the heinous practice of charging interest. The council had devised a very effective method of imposing hardship, retarding development and maintaining the existing system of social privilege. The church was not only the representative of God, and therefore the spiritual leader and the teacher of the world, it was also its economic planner, controller, policeman and judge. The decision was justified by misinterpretation of Christ's Sermon on the Mount and there was no right of appeal. Even so it may have had some moral justification if the church had financed its own wars and if it made provision for loans without interest in cases of need. But it didn't and people still needed loans in an inflating money economy.

The reason that the issue of the conduct of the crusades even had to be raised at the council was a damning indictment of the church. The fact that it reached the decision that it did is equally damning. To justify it by misrepresentation of Christ's teaching and to perpetuate it by giving it the status of a religious absolute was worse.

As the economic system changed both in response to urbanization and as a means towards urbanization and industrialization, and as money became the standard for wages and exchange in trade a shadow of moral impropriety was cast over the developing finance system because of the church's decision. But at the same time the status of the church changed and it became more and more dependent on capitalism and income from revenue generating investments which were not directly under its management. For a very long period this has meant that when certain aspects of capitalism which are very clearly exploitative and of questionable morality have come under attack the church has seldom had enough courage, proven capacity and public confidence for it to be heard in moral judgements on the issues involved. In addition, many of the corporate bodies now involved in the complex and fragmented total life of the church are dependent for management expertise on people who are drawn from, and who are themselves dependent upon, the operation of the capitalist system as it exists. Because of this, actual resistance to change has been added to reluctance to think through the problems associated with it. This has led to a further drop in confidence and to polarization within the church around conservative money management and activist groups have become frustrated at their inability to change the system. It is only in the past two generations that the situation has slowly changed.

However, at this point we are more concerned with the immediate consequences of the Third Lateran Council's decision on usury in 1179 which was made in the context of, and greatly influenced by, its decision to forcefully suppress the Albigensian Heresy. This was one of three related heresies which had taken root in Germany, Italy, the Balkans and France, its stronghold. The Albigenses believed that Christ was an angel with a phantom body whose redemptive work was limited to his teaching, who did not suffer and did not rise again. They rejected the sacraments and held to an extremely rigorous moral doctrine.¹¹ The council declared them and their beliefs anathema and prohibited any person, prince or commoner, from supporting them, having any financial dealings with them or allowing them housing. When this had little effect a crusade was mounted against them in 1208, and in 1220 a special papal inquisition was set up. Lords or princes were threatened that if they did not cooperate they would be excommunicated, their rights withdrawn and their land divided among the Catholics who would then be required to exterminate the heretics. And "Catholics who assume the cross and devote themselves to the extermination of heretics shall enjoy the same indulgence and privilege as those who go to the Holy Land..."¹²

As so often happens, practical politics, financial considerations and theology were all mixed up and the council's decision only forbade the charging of interest by Christians. This was an immediate encouragement for lenders to enter into arrangements with Jews and other non-Christians or to find alternative lending procedures and legal fictions to get around the restrictions. They were little different to twentieth century finance houses and bankers in this respect. They were very much human beings.

Those who were put at a disadvantage in ordinary transactions were those whose scruples led them to obey the church and those in a weak or insecure position. There was a natural tendency for Christians to turn to non-Christians for money transactions and they – especially Jews who were isolated from the mainstream of the Community by the church's previous decisions – were encouraged to enter an important field which Christians were supposed to reject. This naturally generated further friction, intense competition for the bigger money markets which were dominated by Italian Christian finance houses and a tendency for the Jewish financiers to be left with the smaller domestic transactions, pledges and pawnbroking.¹³

So the church had done it again. The complications and increased interfaith tension which flowed from Pope Urban IV's subsequent decision in 1263 that Jews were to be forced to remit usurious charges led to even more pressure for discrimination against Jews, their isolation from Christian society and the infamous "equal treatment" regulations.

FOR ORTHODOXY, SUBORDINATION MEANS SECURITY

Further east, in the principalities of north western Russia which had become tribute paying vassals dominated by the Mongol Khanate of the Golden Horde, the Greek Orthodox Church secured its position by seeking a role subordinate to the princes instead of trying to compete with them or dominate them in the manner of Innocent III. The princes were very happy to accept as their state religion a form of Christianity which actually asked them to rule it rather than trying to push them around, but again it was a matter of politics which determined the church's attitude. Subordination to the princes in the same way that it had remained subordinate to the emperors in Constantinople, up to 1204 anyway, was the only approach that the Eastern church could take to compete with the church of Rome. Byzantium had neither the military or economic strength to enable the Eastern church to compete directly and it could not survive as a second denomination without them.

The papal attitude left no room for either cooperation or competition. It wanted only total absorption. The Inquisition was proving that. Anyone whose theology was not strictly orthodox Roman was a heretic and the conflict over the status of Aquinas' writings between the religious orders which were conducting the Inquisition was showing quite clearly that even Rome could not decide exactly what was correct orthodox belief. It followed that a person with strong personal convictions who was not going to be told exactly when and how to bow was very likely to be declared a heretic and to provide one body-weight of fuel for a public bonfire. Burning at the stake was the church's preferred method of disposing of heretics. The Greek-based church in the Russian provinces could not leave its people in this position and it therefore had to either make some very tough decisions and a clean total break with Rome, or take an easy decision to do nothing and therefore accept total subjugation very quickly.

Several other factors, coupled with the church's reactions to them, also helped to shape the church in Russia as it began its long march towards the crucial nineteenth century and took the stance which made it a focus for conflict in the twentieth century, but this was the vital one. The undercurrent of the church's exalted view of itself, its authority and its role was dragging it into ever deeper water.

While the Mongols were unifying Russia in a political sense their oppressive relationships with their Russian vassal princes, many of whom were of Finnish or Nordic ancestry rather than Slav, forced them to take brutal and arbitrary measures to maintain communal obedience and drove a wedge between the princes and the people.¹⁴ It also led to a devil-take-the-hindmost struggle for power between the princes to whose coat tails the church was clinging for protection and authority. The church could not avoid being linked with and involved in tyranny. Nor could it avoid becoming nationalistic in the same sense as pre-Christian pagan religions, even more formal and ritualistic, and more removed from the purpose for which it came into being. The foundations were being laid for a religious institution just as sick as that of the Holy Roman Empire from which it had cut loose.

Such was the state of the church when Rome eventually began to take a closer interest in the world beyond the Muslim empires from where the Mongols had come. Pope Nicholas IV sent embassies to the Great Khan's successor in China in 1289 and in spite of strong opposition from the Nestorians and other Europeans already in Peking, a competing Catholic church was established. About ten years later an Archbishopric was set up. It is probably fortunate that there were relatively few Christians and Jews in China at that stage because the indications are that if it could have come to an understanding with the Khan it would have set up an office for an Inquisitor also. The purges had already gone the other way and crossed the English Channel.

CLEMENT'S EXPANDED INQUISITION

Not content with the anti-Jewish policies of Urban IV, his successor, Clement IV, had extended the authority of the Inquisitors to cover Jews who, inspired by Maimonides, were attempting to convert Christians. In his infamous bull 'Turbato Corde' he referred to exceedingly numerous reprobate Christians denying the Catholic faith and going over to the rite of Jews in a manner worthy of damnation. He then went on to direct the Inquisitors to act against Christians who showed any sympathy for Jews in the same way as against heretics, but that in the Case of Jews caught inducing Christians into their abominable rite due punishment was to be imposed, with the help of the secular arm if need be, and with no right of appeal.¹⁵

But it was left to Honorius IV to enforce the Inquisition across the channel. In 1286 he soundly berated the primate of England and his clergy for their negligence in failing to act on earlier instructions to restrict Jewish influence and to prevent Christian conversion. He commanded the primate to report the steps he would now take to correct the situation. The English clergy very quickly got the message to act or else! In 1290 all Jews were expelled from Oxford and their property was granted to the provost of Wells.¹⁶ Determined to track down and to convert or denigrate every Jew behind every lamp post or sand dune, Honorius also directed the University of Paris to train Arabs and other recruits from the East for the clergy so that they could carry the church's message back to their own countries. Two years later those papal embassies were on their way to Peking.¹⁷ Another five years on and his initiative in England brought traumatic results. All Jews were given three months in which to sell up their property and to be out of the country.

Honorius had set in motion a program of mass Jewish population expulsions which would make the map of Europe look like the pattern on an island beach with winds and tides sweeping the sand first one way and then another.¹⁸ The church's crude, manipulated theology and abuse of power, evident in every morally bankrupt political move it made, was building up a massive bank of dud cheques which would eventually be tendered for Salvation which the church was supposed to be in the market place to offer without charge.

Papal demands for ultimate authority over the crown in all matters, whether the levying of taxes, waging wars or his own divorce proceedings, the excesses of some of the knightly orders and the general abuse of ecclesiastical authority reached such a level and had such a fearful, disruptive and degrading effect on society that King Philip IV prohibited the export of money from France in order to cut off French finances to the pope and so clip his wings. The pope, Boniface VIII, replied with a bull in high flown terms to the effect that the church, outside of which there was neither salvation nor remission of sins, inherited from Christ absolute authority in both spiritual and temporal affairs like two swords. One was wielded by the church directly through its priests and the other by the kings and captains on behalf of the Church, at the will of the priests and by their permission.¹⁹ Actually he was only putting into different words the sickening sentiments of Innocent III, and Pope Gregory VII (Hildebrand) at the time that he and Henry IV exchanged exile for excommunication (1077) over the issue of the papacy having absolute power over sovereigns. According to J. L. Hurlbut: "Gregory VII did not aim to abolish the rule of the state, but to subordinate it to the rule of the church, and of the pope as the church's head. He desired the secular power to govern the people, but under the higher jurisdiction of the spiritual kingdom, as he regarded it."²⁰ Augustine would have been proud of him! Quite a departure from "Render unto Caesar the things which are Caesar's and unto God the things which are God's." (Matthew 22:21, Kings James translation.)

PHILIP'S TRIAL OF STRENGTH

It was too much for King Philip. He summoned a Council of the Three Estates (the Lords, the church and the Commons), and with its support tried to bring the pope to trial. He was arrested but was released, in poor health, after only three days. Far from resolving the dispute between the church and the state the incident piled more fuel on the fire. The church dug its toes in. It did everything it could to distract public attention from the church-state issue, and Christian bigotry plumbed new depths as the church whipped the populace into a frenzy of anti Jewish lust. Accusations and rumours of the ritual or sacrificial murder of Christians by Jews were assumed to be fact and 'justice' was dispensed freely with little or no trial. The church succeeded in driving virtually all Jews out of Paris in 1306 and attempted to prohibit their return for forty years.

However the papacy and the power of Rome had suffered, French influence within the church increased. The king was able to insist on more Frenchmen being appointed to the College of Cardinals, a number of Frenchmen were elected popes in succession and in 1308 the papal court was shifted from Rome to Avignon where it sat for seventy years, some say as an instrument of French political power. Philip was even able to force Pope Clement V to dissolve the Knights Templars, to enforce the forfeiture of their property and the trial and execution, at the stake, of the order's grand master as a heretic.

This period marked the beginning of the decline of both papal power and the vigorous application of Augustinian theology. The decline of one accompanied the decline of the other. Theologian and historian Trevor Ling says: "The church was The City of God, of God the omnipotent ruler; ...(it was also)...the undisputed successor to the Roman Empire, and its earthly ruler was Caesar's heir during the centuries when there was virtually no single secular power strong enough to resist ecclesiastical control." Challenges to both the theology of the papacy and papal secular control began to appear by the fourteenth century and "a new intellectual force had entered the European arena in the shape of Aristotelian thought – preserved and transmitted to Western Europe by Islamic philosophers." The relationship between faith and reason had begun to change. In earlier times reason had been subordinate to revelation. By the time of Aquinas there was something approaching a partnership between reason and revelation, even though the papal powers either did not understand it or could not tolerate the thought. Ling says that Aquinas had sensed the decline coming, and that his development of a system of philosophical theology may have been “a valiant attempt to stave off the day of the divorce of reason and faith.” By the next century “faith based on revelation, and knowledge based on reason were beginning to be regarded as separate and distinct from each other.”²¹ Responsibility for the trauma which the long drawn out process of change involved rests squarely with the church and its self-misunderstanding. The writings of theologians who challenged the church’s established theology, and who took their lives in the hands when they published, contributed to the process but it was really built into history, predetermined by the church’s conduct and its abuse of the power which it grasped so avariciously.

Time dragged on and the burden of both feudal and church oppression weighed heavily on the populace. The states of western Europe remained fairly stable but in the east the states and powers were grouping, fragmenting and regrouping with constant conflict and instability. Commercial activity was certainly on the increase right across Europe, with the basis of trade being the import of silks and spices from the east and furs, wax and honey via the Baltic, coupled with the export of finished cloth to Russia and the east.

Unfortunately the benefits of that commerce were not spreading uniformly over the continent and the disparity contributed to the tensions and conflict. A handful of major cities had grown up with a merchant and banking class competing with the church and the princes for authority. Urbanization was an ever present influence and brought with it new social influences and stresses. Construction and retail trade were becoming more and more important as people began to crowd into towns in preference to living in rural areas. The tendency was encouraged in the interests of commercial activity.

Craft guilds and leagues of merchants were growing as a means for their members to either protect or monopolize their particular activity. The bigger leagues, such as the Hanseatic League which was based in the towns of the Baltic and North Sea, cut across state borders and religious faith, causing the church more and more difficulty in its devilish efforts to isolate Jews from all contact with the Christian Community. Because of their protectionist policies both the leagues and the guilds also caused conflict within their communities, especially when they included a particular religious affiliation as a condition of membership.

THE BLACK DEATH

Such was the social condition of Europe when the Black Death struck. A fearful combination of bubonic plague, spread by rats, and pneumonia-type complications, it was apparently introduced from China to Sicily about 1346. Within two years it had spread through Italy, Germany, France, Spain and across the channel into England. It is said that within three years between a quarter and a third of Europe's population died, but it is also said that an estimated forty per cent of the clergy succumbed.²² With earlier plagues it was largely a problem of poor living conditions, the lack of organized sanitation, overcrowding, poor elementary hygiene and inadequate clean water supplies. However this time the clergy, with anti-Jewish elements well to the fore, took full advantage of hysteria, superstition and ignorance to pursue their miserable campaigns. Mass baptisms were organized as vast numbers who had resisted the church's rituals rushed to take advantage of its preventive medicine much like the people of Augustine's Numidia. When they found it didn't work and their families were still dying of the plague the mobs naturally turned against the church. But how easy it was for the clergy to deflect their wrath onto the Jews who were accused of everything from poisoning wells, poisoning water supplies and breeding rats, to having supernatural resistance to the Black Death, which implied that they had demonic witchcraft in their rites.

The anti-Jewish fever reached a peak in 1348 when the plague reached the Savoy region of France, bordering Italy and Switzerland, and only 200 kilometres from the seat of the papacy at Avignon. A Jew at Chillon on Lake Geneva confessed, under torture, that his fellow Jews in the south of France had developed an elaborate plan to poison the water supplies of the Christian populations. The argument would have then followed that by eliminating Christians (including the papal entourage at Avignon) the Jews could dominate the world. The poison, prepared from spiders, frogs, lizards, human flesh, the hearts of Christians and consecrated hosts (from the Eucharist), had been distributed, so the poor man admitted, to Jewish communities throughout Christendom. The wave of massacres which followed probably accounted for the deaths of far more Jews than the plague did. Bands of Flagellants gathered in Avignon and paraded through Europe, their numbers swelling as they demonstrated at churches, flogging themselves mercilessly for long periods in penance, and calling for the extermination of Jews as a means of bringing on the Second Coming of Christ and the Millennium.

The campaign of violence swept north, right across Switzerland and along the Rhine to Strasbourg where the route divided. Some bands of Flagellants went to Holland and back into northern France. Others went through Germany as far as Hamburg, east through Poland, then south through Austria, into Italy and across to Sicily. The massacres exceeded anything in the history of Jewish martyrdom to that stage, with the possible exception of the Crusades. At the start of the outrage the entire community of Chillon was put to death with refined horror and then a total of sixty large communities and one hundred and fifty small ones were utterly exterminated. Twelve thousand died in Mayence alone. Not all of the slaughter can be blamed on the Flagellants but in Frankfurt they took their own appeals so seriously that they murdered every Jew in the city.²³ German Jewry was crushed and could not recover except by forced migration from elsewhere. The Flagellants had saved the Inquisitors quite a lot of work. The pope, Clement VI, is said to have issued several statements condemning the massacres and pleading the innocence of the Jews but they were couched in such double-talk that they did little to correct the situation and they were probably not intended to, having been issued after approaches by Jewish leaders to the man who had ultimate responsibility for the Inquisition anyway. However such unauthorized slaughter apparently raised either his anger or his embarrassment to the point that he issued a prohibition against any further such processions in 1349.^{24 25}

Paul Johnson gives a brief but very telling note on the history and practice of flagellation in the church in his A History of Christianity. He notes that it was introduced in the fourth century by certain sophisticated pagan sects being “absorbed” into the church. Processions were led by priests with banners and candles; in Germany the whole process was especially ferocious with iron spikes added to the leather scourges, and after the reading of ‘a heavenly letter’ spectators dipped pieces of cloth into the blood and “treasured them as relics.” He also notes that Pope Clement VI encouraged public flagellation in Avignon in 1384. This date cannot be reconciled with the fact that Clement VI held office in Avignon from May 7, 1342, to December 6, 1352.²⁶ It therefore appears that either the date should be 1348, in which case Clement encouraged the mass processions of the Flagellants across Europe during the Black Death and then issued his prohibition after they got so out of hand, or that it was Pope Urban VI (in office at the later date of 1384) who formally encouraged them again at that later date. A few years later, in 1396, “the pillar of Spanish orthodoxy, the Dominican anti-Semite and rabble rouser, Saint Vincent Ferrer, led a party of flagellants through Spain, France and Italy, following the instructions of a vision.”²⁷ The fact that the church absorbed the practice of flagellation in a blatant act of synchretism is inexcusable, even if some may argue that it was understandable, just like every other act of synchretism. However the fact that the practice continued under official sponsorship for such a long period with such catastrophic consequences indicates the depth of moral and psychological sickness to which the church had sunk at a time when it was demanding recognition as the sole and divinely appointed spiritual and temporal representative of God – and ordainer of all monarchs, princes and lesser fiefs.

On a different level the Black Death also had other far-reaching social and political consequences. It highlighted the conflict of interests between the landed gentry, merchants and the aristocracy on one hand and the mass of the population on the other. The first group was much less affected by the plague than the second group, in terms of the proportion of deaths, because of the marked difference in living conditions. However they lost at least a quarter of their labour force and their markets in a very short time and that really hurt much more than the tragedy and stench of death all around them.

The economy was in disarray. Manufactured goods were in short supply so prices soared. So did wage demands and with labour in short supply workers were able to move freely from one job to another to improve their prospects and their wages. But because of developments in farming practices and the reduced population, food was in good supply.²⁸ This aggravated the friction. In an effort to peg wages and prices at pre-plague levels, royal ordinances were introduced in both England and France to control wages and to prevent workers from leaving their jobs in search of better pay or more congenial working conditions. They had little effect and so the aristocracy petitioned the King of England to enforce them through the courts. The broad base of the population against whom the laws were selectively disadvantageous reacted strongly. Both England and France experienced their first civil riots.²⁹

The struggle to improve the ordinary person's lot in life was on. But it didn't result spontaneously from the plague and its labour laws. It had been brewing for a long time. The plague simply brought it to a head. The church had the ball at its feet again and it could really show what the Good News of Salvation and reconciliation was all about. But it had already crossed to the other side of the road again and it botched the chance. For one thing it made a recovery more difficult by stepping up its efforts to eliminate the Jewish communities which had developed a great deal of expertise in merchant and banking activities, (encouraged by the Lateran Council's anti-usury laws of the crusades), and which were therefore in an excellent position to help alleviate the difficulties. For another its attitude was hardly one of reconciliation and negotiation. But apart from those real impediments it had anchored itself squarely in the camp of the oppressors in several ways.

With its immense chain of monasteries across Europe the church was by far the biggest land owner, quite apart from the holdings acquired by the Teutonic Knights and others through their so-called evangelization programs. In most of the monasteries the religious did little or no work. They were there to contemplate and pray to Mary, and the saints of course, for the souls of the Christians. Never mind about their earthly conditions. Peasants were employed on a pittance to work the estates of the monasteries and naturally the church wasn't at all keen to see them go or to have to pay higher wages.

Then there was its increasing financial dependence on the wealthy land owners and the aristocracy for funds. It wasn't the ordinary people who directly kept the church afloat financially, it was the wealthy by whatever means the church could extract their wealth. They, in turn, extracted it from the ordinary people. That income was in jeopardy for two reasons if the church sided with the populace in demands for higher wages and less servile conditions. Firstly, because such demands would place a strain on the finances of the landed gentry and merchant classes and so reduce the funds available to be extracted. Secondly the church's support would strain relations between the wealthy and the church.

In 1348 the papacy was already in financial difficulty but the pope greatly aggravated the situation right at the time that Europe was under greatest strain by a decision to purchase massive properties at Avignon for the papacy, complete with the curia and the church hierarchy. It was to provide an alternative papal territory corresponding to the Vatican in Rome. The gradual transition from an agrarian to a mercantile economy with growth of merchant cities was steadily reducing the strength of the papal states and the church's control over these was under constant political challenge also and, midway through the Avignon papacy (which the church chooses to call its 'Babylonian captivity'), as we have seen the collapse of the economy due to the Black Death aggravated the situation, so it was hardly the right time to embark on a property buying spree of that magnitude.³⁰

RELIGIOUS BLACKMAIL

These things all led to a lot more questionable financial practices by the papacy to bolster its dwindling finances. In fact the curia resorted increasingly to religious blackmail. It looked for all sorts of ways to levy taxes and tributes outside the state system. The sale of religious offices, privileges, pardons and dispensations was rampant. Existing fees were increased and new fees were levied on the slightest excuse, even for some of the church's sacraments. Among the most despicable examples of the sale of supposedly sacred offices was the demand for substantial payment for an archbishop's pallium. This was held to convey or depute the papal plenary authority to a subordinate and while its use and consecration was more akin to superstition than religious practice it was held in the highest awe and reverence. Those who received an income producing authority or benefit from the pope were required to pass on to the curia the revenue for the first year, crusade taxes were levied under threats of censure or excommunication for non payment, and feudal taxes from monarchs under the system of papal fiefdoms, and anything else it could think of were increased. There was sharp contrast between its own actions and the theology used to justify those crusade anti-usury laws. Resentment grew among the civil elite and those who owed their positions of privilege to the favours of the church, but the church's hold over most of these people was still so strong that few could resist the threat of censure and excommunication or even the possibility of being declared a heretic and gaining first hand experience of the stake.³¹ And besides: if they had to raise more money to satisfy the demands of the papacy they could always pass the demands down the line to the ordinary people who sat in their pews or worked their land.

On top of all that there was the complex relationship with kings and states which had been a constant source of conflict. Both the church and the states had either controlled or used their influence in the appointment of their puppets in the other's domain over a long period and the issue of the pope's right of veto in the appointment of kings and princes had still not been resolved. King Louis of France intervened in an attempt to clip the papal wings a bit further in 1324, midway between the forced transfer of the papacy to Avignon and the Black Death. He appointed a general council to draw up proposals for a democratic church structure. The council, which included prominent university figures, notably Marsiglio (or Marsilius) of Padua, adopted Marsiglio's paper Defensor pacis as the basis of its proposals. It denied the church's claims of the divine origin of papal supremacy and declared that the state derives its authority from the people, the state is the unifying power of society, and the people retain the right to censure and depose the ruler. The council also maintained that the church had no inherent jurisdiction, either spiritual or temporal, that its rights are delegated by the state and may be withdrawn by the state, and that its hierarchy is an institution of human and not divine authority. On the basis of the concept of the priesthood of all believers the council maintained that the clergy was not superior to the laity and proposed a structure with a general council composed of lay persons and clergy as the chief authority in ecclesiastical matters, with the pope as a sort of chief executive officer responsible to that council.

As was to be expected, the pope, John XXII, condemned the paper as heretical and when its authorship became known in 1326 Marsiglio fled to Bavaria and the protection of Emperor Louis who had already been excommunicated. He was joined there two years later by William of Ockham, an English Franciscan teaching at Oxford, who had been asked by his Minister General to examine the papal constitutions on the order's poverty. Ockham was already under attack from Avignon for teaching that any church structures or practices which had the effect in people's thinking of limiting God's omnipotence and freedom of action should be done away with. His report that in the Franciscan dispute Pope John XXII had taken an heretical position was the last straw. A conciliar movement grew out of the work of Marsiglio, Ockham and others of like mind and proved to be a precursor to the eventual Reformation. (Sources: ^{32 33 34 35})

And so the church had failed again. When it could have provided a powerful spear head to a campaign to lift the lot of the people and give them a glimpse of the Good News the task was beyond it. It was only concerned about its own aggrandizement and the politics of power. The struggle for the Messianic Age to break through the bonds of human degradation shifted course with the Black Death. It had to take on the form and therefore the status of a political movement rather than a religious cause. The church had forced it to by the actions which it either took or did not take in the critical years from 1348 to 1351 because of its view of itself. The need which it perceived to maintain the power and privileges of institutional religion had again set in train events and stresses which would build up a case against it ready to burst as another of a chain of challenges just 500 years later. That challenge was Europe's rash of revolutions in 1848, Karl Marx's Das Kapital and the Communist Manifesto.

At least the church was being consistent with its economic policies. Its opposition to change after the Black Death and its anti-usury laws during the crusades both worked against the interests of the ordinary people and were repressive in their long term effects. The church had not made a serious attempt to understand the situation. All that it was capable of doing in 1348 was to deflect any blame for the tragedy and the catastrophe onto the Jews and to organize and promote public displays of religious fervour by groups such as the Flagellants. With or without the Flagellants there were public processions with dancing to the accompaniment of chanted psalms and proclamations of penance for the sins of the world which had brought the Black Death upon them. The psalms were carefully selected to illustrate the failure of the Jews and the need for judgement against them. At best it might be described as a cheap recruiting campaign which failed. There was certainly nothing evangelical about it. At worst it can be seen as a diversionary tactic to demonstrate the church's presence, to camouflage its abject failures and corruption, to increase its influence and its hold over the people, and to incite the ghastly interfaith hatred which was firmly linked with it.

It would be interesting to look closely at the whole period of the Avignon papacy, the factionalism of French and Italian churchmen, and the political as well as ecclesiastical turmoil in Italy which the church admits was "a factor of significance in prolonging the stay of popes in Avignon" ³⁶ and which contributed to the decision to purchase an alternative seat for the papacy at Avignon in 1348. It would also be interesting to ponder why it had not seemed so vital for the church to be intimately linked to Peter's so-called original seat of authority for seventy years, but we must move forward thirty years to 1378 and the politicking around the return of the papal seat from Avignon to Rome.

It is unclear whether Gregory XI, the seventh pope to hold office at Avignon in 70 years, intended to shift the seat of the papacy back to Rome or whether he had visited the Vatican in 1377 to assess the situation, but he died on March 26, 1378 while he was in Rome. According to the rules adopted at the Council of Lyons in 1274, the conclave to elect the next pope had to be held ten days after the death of the pope at the place where he died, so the Roman clergy and politicians had a distinct advantage if they wished to influence the decision of the conclave and the decision on where the new pope would reside. However they were fearful that with the sixteen available cardinal electors being eleven Frenchmen, four Italians and one Spaniard there was a strong likelihood that the next pope would also be a Frenchman inclined to return to Avignon.³⁷ The locals played their advantage with vigour and the electors were put under extreme pressure with scenes of fearful violence. A turbulent mob of thousands of peasants, brigands and rabble surrounded the Vatican and kept up an overnight chant of "A Roman pope, or at least an Italian", interspersed with threats of bloody violence. Windows were smashed, doors axed, armed bands actually invaded the conclave demanding that a Roman be elected, and a massacre was a real possibility. With survival a matter of personal concern but not wanting to install a Roman, the electors chose an Italian archbishop from the city of Bari, not Rome. He was elected on April 8, and crowned Pope Urban VI ten days later – with the cardinals' assent extracted on the day under duress.

COMPETING POPES

Three months later, in July 1378, the non-Italian cardinals all left the papal court, declared Urban's election null and void because of the use of force, organized a fresh conclave at Fondi, 100 kilometres south east of Rome, on September 20, and with the support of the three surviving Italian cardinals, elected a Frenchman, Clement VII, who made Avignon his papal seat. It is not clear whether the action of the cardinals was pure geo-politics or whether they were influenced by Urban's unexpected approach as an "uncompromising, aggressive reformer" who showed violent extremes and was "most extravagant in his denunciation of worldly and immoral clerics." (Sources: ^{38 39})

For forty years the western church had competing popes with their full retinue sitting on two competing thrones – four on the Roman throne and two on the Avignon throne (it actually became three competing thrones for the last few years of the period) – making competitive appointments, successively excommunicating each other and their appointees, and bidding, very divisively, for the allegiance of kings and princes as well as clergy and institutions, and competing in their claims for rights to properties across the continent. The schism caused even greater trauma for the ordinary people of Europe. It would have mattered less if it had affected only the institutional church by weakening its power over the civil authorities and enabling some rulers to change the authority relationship substantially. Numerous unsuccessful attempts were made to bring competing popes together but none would resign to enable a fresh single election.

A breakthrough appeared possible in 1394 when the University of Paris proposed three alternative solutions: concurrent resignations, arbitration, or a general council. The crisis and the debate dragged on, with little prospect of a conciliar solution because that would have really meant adoption of a conciliar structure and a complete review of the origin and basis of papal authority and the role of the papacy. Regardless of the views of radical academics, neither of the competing hierarchies nor the majority of the clergy would seriously consider that because of the threat to the church's self-understanding and, consequently, its fundamental theology. The reasoning ran, with great vehemence, that Christ had founded the government of his church on St. Peter, the holder of the keys. Christ could not be a parliamentary president whose office and works would be regulated by a majority vote, and neither could his vicar.⁴⁰ The clergy preferred the easy path – acceptance of corruption and mismanagement in the papal office – to the soul searching which a serious review of the church's self-understanding would involve.

However, when desperation temporarily took precedence over self-understanding a number of cardinals from the hierarchies of both competing popes agreed to convene a general council, modeled on proposed conciliar lines, to resolve the crisis. It met at Pisa in March 1409 with well over four hundred persons risking the wrath of their respective popes to attend. There were more than 100 bishops, delegates from a similar number, and more than 200 persons carrying accreditation from abbots, cathedral chapters and universities. The council tried both popes, in their absence, pronounced them both enemies of the church, deposed them, and elected a new pope, Alexander V. Of course neither of the deposed popes stood down, they clung to the structures around them, and as neither the council which had elected him nor Alexander had any means of enforcing its decision the church then had three popes instead of two. The situation was ludicrous. The decadence of Christendom, with the Byzantine Empire reduced to three small enclaves, was an open invitation for the Muslims to swoop, but Dar al-Islam was also fragmented, with no strong leader in a position to take advantage of the opportunity.

When Pope Alexander V died one year after his election by the council the church had an opportunity to re-open conversations between the two remaining competitors, but nothing came of it. Support for the conciliar appointment was so strong – Alexander had far more support than the popes in Rome and Avignon at that stage – that the leaders of the Pisa faction may have thought they had gained the upper hand, and the same conciliar mechanism was used to elect Alexander's successor, John XXIII, in 1410. John's election did nothing to resolve the crisis but after some time the German King, Sigismund, proposed a fresh general council, which John would convene and therefore give a greater degree of legitimacy, in a bid to regain unity throughout the church. John agreed, with widespread expectation that he would be confirmed as the legitimate pope.

However when the council convened at Constance on November 5, 1414, the debate centred on the need for all three popes to resign to enable a fresh election, and a system of national voting was agreed upon to avoid the ballot being dominated by John and the Italians. A fresh round of intrigue began and John fled the council to undermine its authority, but Sigismund insisted that it continue without the presence of a pope and on April 6, 1415, it carried a decree, Haec Sancta,⁴¹ claiming authority direct from Christ and placing councils above popes. John was arrested on May 29, tried, and deposed. A few weeks later the Roman faction's competitor, Gregory XII, (who the church now recognizes as the official pope of the period), formally reconvened the council to give it legitimacy (perhaps to undermine the impact of the council's decree on authority or perhaps to improve his own chances of being confirmed in his office) and then, on July 4, announced his voluntary resignation.

HUSS AND WYCLIFFE

It was then two down, with one competitor left still standing: Benedict XIII at Avignon. But as it might take some time to decide his fate the council turned to other business: the fate of the Bohemian preacher John Huss. Huss had been attracted by the writings of Englishman John Wycliffe and took up some of his reform proposals. Wycliffe was working towards his doctorate in theology at Oxford while the Black Death raged. He developed an abhorrence for papal influence at the royal court while the church openly abused its trust and authority in civil matters. He criticized the church's view of itself as having been established in a mystical sense from time immemorial. He maintained that while God's essence was changeless and indestructible the material church on earth derived its secular authority solely through God's grace while it stayed within the moral bounds of that grace. It wasn't at all hard for him to show that many clergy were way out of bounds and that papal authority, monastic life, priestly absolution, confession, indulgences and doctrines such as that of transubstantiation had no basis in scripture. It was during the later years of the official Avignon papacy that he began the English movement for reformation and freedom from Rome, or wherever the church was to be based.

Wycliffe could not have survived for long in Europe but in England he was appointed Master of Balliol College and, later, Warden of Canterbury Hall, Oxford. He developed a strong organization of supporters who preached reform and, under his direction, set about translating the Bible into English. A thousand years after the church had canonized selected papers and declared them to be the complete and absolute Word of God it was still denying the person in the pew the right to read it in his or her own language. God's Word could only be presented to them as interpreted by the pope. Vigorous efforts were made to prevent the distribution of Wycliffe's translation and his 'heretical writings' but they soon had a strong influence in eastern Europe where John Huss took up the cry.

Unlike Wycliffe, Huss was to pay the ultimate price for rocking the holy boat. He preached violent sermons on the morals of the clergy and provoked such hostility that Alexander V, the first of the Pisan popes, issued a bull ordering the Archbishop of Prague to destroy all of Wycliffe's works and to curb Huss' influence by prohibiting him from preaching in private chapels, namely the university where he was Rector. Huss refused to stop preaching or to appear in Rome, and in 1411 John XXIII excommunicated him. He went into hiding with Czech nobility and to flush him out John put the entire city under interdict, withdrawing the administration of sacraments. He then promptly reinforced popular support for Huss and contempt for papal political interference by declaring indulgences for a crusade against another anti-papal leader, Ladislaus, in Naples and tension in Prague reached flash point. Huss had appealed against the curia's decisions and to defuse the situation he agreed to go to the Council of Constance to debate his stand. He was granted the protection of an imperial guarantee of safe conduct from Sigismund, the person who had initiated the meeting of the council.

Huss reached Constance in safety on November 3, 1414, two days before the council was opened by John XXIII and the pope lifted the ban he had imposed on him but, on November 28 he was called to face a heresy trial – not a debate – and after the first hearing he was imprisoned pending the outcome. He remained in prison, in spite of Sigismund's protests, while the long drawn out proceedings on papal authority and succession continued and until after John XXIII fled. His case was then considered by the council on and off over several weeks until the council was in a position to continue with the major task in hand. Then, after Gregory XII's resignation on July 4 Huss's trial continued on July 5. Next day the verdict was finalized: guilty of having dogmatized, defended and preached the heresies of Wycliffe in his own writings. The council declared the imperial guarantee of safe conduct invalid and of no consequence on the ground that faith was not to be kept with a heretic.⁴² Huss was burned at the stake at the Cathedral of Constance, the same day, to close another of those travesties of justice for which the church was famous and which passed as a heresy trial. In the same sick state of mind and as if to make up for a serious error in allowing him to die peacefully in England, the council directed that John Wycliffe's remains be exhumed and destroyed.⁴³

The council then continued with its other business. Sigismund went hurriedly to Perpignan on the Franco-Spanish border to negotiate Benedict XIII's resignation, but, having failed, he returned with delegates from the church in Spain to ensure that, with their support, a move to depose Benedict would succeed. It did, and the council adjourned after deposing Benedict on July 26. It met again in October to agree on procedural changes and the relationship between future popes and the general council of the church, then in November a conclave was held and a new pope was elected: Martin V. The schism in the western church was ended. The Catholic Church officially had a new conciliar structure and the authority of the pope was restricted. But what direction would the church take?

The state of its corporate mind shows through its self-portrait in the decree "Haec Sancta" which was claimed to establish its authority. It saw itself as a holy council lawfully assembled in the Holy Spirit, constituting a General Council of the Catholic Church and therefore receiving its authority immediately from Christ. All men of whatever rank or condition including the pope himself were therefore required to obey its decisions in matters of faith, reformation and the ending of the schism. Anyone who disregarded it would be subject to appropriate penance and punishment unless he came to a right frame of mind in time to save himself and recourse might also be taken to other remedies at law. ⁴⁴

The decision in Huss' trial and his death has been described as a symbol of the independence which the council was trying to express, but the contradictions and the irony in the situation serve to demonstrate how desperately the church was in need of reform and a total re-think of its role. Although the council had been convened on the basis of the conciliar model it was dominated by conservative papists⁴⁵ who, presumably, saw collaboration in a council which they did not want as a means of securing (or propping up) the church's self-understanding and an eventual return to the former authority patterns. This would account for the fact that the first conciliar-model council condemned and murdered one of the key figures in the conciliar movement. It would also account for the fact that having rejected Marsiglio's Defensor Pacis, with the view that the church acted under authority delegated by the state, the church was eager to demonstrate its claimed superior authority by rejecting King Sigismund's imperial guarantee of safe conduct, even at the risk of humiliating one of its key supporters and advocates. The reaction to its sadistic action and the confirmation of its warped self-understanding soon became apparent. Huss was no longer simply the former Rector of Prague University. He was a symbol of the struggle to throw off papal and German domination and abuse. The religious reform movement grew into a nationalist political party: the Hussites. Wars broke out four years later, dragged on for five years and brought a degree of independence with separation of the church from Rome. The Moravian Church is a development from the turmoil of that period.

As it was in England and Bohemia so it was further east. The papal representatives just couldn't keep their fingers out of politics. A mission was set up in Persia in 1318, ten years after the papacy took up residence in Avignon. It had three aims. One was to undermine the Nestorians who had been allowed to operate unhindered through numerous changes in control of the region and had grown to become a significant community. Another was to bring the Armenian Church back into the Roman fold. The other was to convert Muslims. However its only lasting effect seems to have been to cause such dissension in Armenia that a violent nationalist reaction set in about sixty years later and efforts to achieve that sort of unity soon lapsed. ⁴⁶

CONTACT IN INDIA

About the same time a Franciscan four-man mission went to the Bombay region of India. It arrived while the disruption and division caused by Mahmud's conquest and 'pacification' programs in the Hindu regions of northwest and central India – and bloodcurdling reports of his crimes – were still uppermost in people's minds. However Mahmud's invasion by land from his Ghaznavid base of Afghanistan was certainly not India's first experience of Islam and earlier contacts had not led to the trauma which the Franciscans were able to report. The first phase of India's contact with Islam came during the early years of the Umayyad caliphate, possibly during the 660s. Muslim Arab traders buying timber for shipbuilding and other commodities merged with trading settlements on the Malabar Coast of South India which had been established before the birth of Islam. Their personal conduct led to their acceptance by the Hindu rulers who saw no threat to the established religions including Brahmanism (which was making a recovery), Buddhism and Jainism, and permitted the Muslims to build mosques and to take wives from among the high-caste Nair women, and to manage their own community affairs.

In other parts of India there were also strong trading links between Arabs and Indians, with the Indians quite content (due to their own traditional reluctance to travel) to leave the maritime operations to the Arabs. Unfortunately, during the reign of Caliph Walid I a ship carrying gifts from the King of Ceylon to the Viceroy of the Eastern Caliphate, and the widows and families of Arab seamen who had died in Ceylon, was blown of course and into the hands of pirates from the Sind region of the Indus Valley in North India who carried off both the gifts and the women and children. This led to the second phase of India's contact with Islam. When the Raja of Sind did not respond to the Caliph's protest a military expedition led by General Muhammad ibn Qasim was despatched to put the matter right. The town of Debul was captured in 711 and the capital of Sind, Bramanabad, the following year. The raja was killed, Muhammad ibn Qasim married his widow, became ruler of all of Sind by 713 and then began to extend his control over part of the Punjab. The raja of Kashmir appealed without success to the emperor of China for help, but Sulaiman, successor to Walid I and a bitter enemy of the general's family, recalled Muhammad ibn Qasim, imprisoned him and called off the first Muslim invasion of India.

While part of the credit for Qasim's success goes to his ability as a general, part of it also goes to his considerate treatment of the local population, the majority of whom were Buddhists. Qasim did not distinguish between the Hindus and the Buddhists and, on the basis that both religious communities had their own scared scriptures and codes of conduct, he gave them both the protected status of 'People of the Book', that is, the same status as Jews and Christians. The Buddhists therefore welcomed relief from the rule of the Hindu raja. Qasim's tolerance towards Hindu and Buddhist practices and beliefs which later Muslim invaders saw as idolatrous may have been a sign of laxness on his part and it was certainly a factor contributing to his recall. However Trevor Ling says that it is possible to see him "as a representative of Islam at its best during the Umayyad period; vigorous, resourceful, hardy, possibly aggressive, but also tolerant of the religious attitudes of other worshippers of God."⁴⁷ He appears to have championed the philosophy which comes straight from the Gospels: accept people at the point of understanding they are at in their circumstances, then preach and teach by the Word and by example, not by the sword and by casting stones. What a pity the church could not understand that philosophy.

A MIXED APPROACH TO RELIGIOUS TOLERANCE

Back to Mahmud's visit, or phase three of Indo-Muslim contact. Mahmud came to power as the third generation ruler of the Ghaznavid Emirate, an offshoot of the Samanid Emirate, in succession to his father, Subuktegin, in the early stages of the Turkization of the leadership of the newly emerging component states of Dar al-Islam. Arab leadership had necessarily given way to non-Arab leadership as Dar al-Islam expanded. To the west it was the Berbers who gained control and to the east it was initially the Persians. But then at the beginning of the eleventh century the Persians were replaced by the Turks as successive waves of invaders swept down towards them from the north and east, and contrary to normal expectations, the invaders adopted the religion of the people whose territory they were absorbing instead of imposing their own. An important consideration in their decision was the need to retain the strong communal structure and local leadership systems which the Arabs had developed based on Muhammad's teaching, but the simplicity and the authority of Islam's message had enormous impact and commanded immediate attention. The young emirate found (like many new states before it and since) that the only way to survive in the face of both internal and external rivalries was territorial expansion, and organized Islam became both the means of achieving expansion and the beneficiary of it. The remnant Samanids were liquidated first, in 999, then a series of small territories were absorbed into the emirate progressively over a period of about twenty years.

Mahmud's expeditions to India via Afghanistan from his base just east of the Caspian Sea began in 1001. Eventually, overcoming strong and, at times, heroic but disunited opposition from the Indian princes, they reached into Central India. According to von Grunebaum the troops showed great religious zeal and what has been described as "unmistakable signs of their irreconcilable hatred of the heathen" as they stormed temple strongholds, destroyed idols and plundered treasure.⁴⁸ However it is probable that their zeal and the extent of the plunder was due in part to the fact that they were being paid in cash from a share of the proceeds of booty and not from military fiefs (fees) paid from other government revenue because Mahmud's young emirate did not have reserves from which to pay fees. Whatever the reason, von Grunebaum says that after the pacification of the occupied territories Mahmud treated people of other faiths correctly and it was only later rulers who engaged in "unrestrained acts of cruelty which are engraved in the memory of the conquered peoples." The bloodcurdling descriptions of the storming of the temple city of Sumnath which some writers have perpetuated "are founded less on fact than on the general mood of the time," he says.

But Mahmud's toleration of the continuation of non-Muslim religious communities did not extend to non-Sunni communities within Islam. He insisted on strict orthodoxy and Shi'ite congregations which had developed from trading activities in the Indus Valley were destroyed as being a sectarian blot on Islam. It can be argued that Mahmud's invasion was no more violent or traumatic than the crusades, the Inquisition, the Christianization of Scandinavia, or other episodes in the church's history which we have yet to come to, and that he established the basis for a very vigorous, determined orthodox Islamic society in the regions of India which came under his influence. However such arguments do not justify his policy and there is no doubt that he was very largely responsible for the virulent tensions which continued between Muslims and Hindus in India, which Britain exploited without scruple during the colonial era, which resulted in the partition of India into two nations on a religious basis, and which still explode with violence from time to time.

After Mahmud's death in 1030 his son Mas'ud maintained the Indian campaign until he misjudged the challenge from the Seljuks, because of his concentration on India, and was defeated in 1040. This enabled the Seljuks to continue their push south and west, to gain control of Persia, Iraq and Syria, and to re-establish the Eastern Caliphate with the unifying influence which had always been expected of it.

On arriving at Tana, near Bombay around 1320, the four Franciscans took much the same line as if the power of the state was theirs and not the Muslims and followed the church's standard misrepresentation of the prophet's teaching. A dispute broke out and one of them, Thomas of Tolentino, described Muhammad as the son of perdition whose place was in hell with his father, the devil, alongside all his followers with their false, pestilent, accursed laws which were hostile to God and the salvation of Souls.^{49 50} Three of the party, friars, were promptly executed and the fourth, a lay brother, after burying his colleagues and deciding that success would be very difficult in that region, set out for the safer environment of Quilon in South India where a Nestorian community was well established. As if there were not enough people in India to evangelize and to help, Rome did its usual thing and in 1329 appointed him bishop for the region and succeeded in disrupting the area to such good effect that all traces of the community disappeared for a time.

In the territory of the Mongol Golden Horde, (Russia, north of the Black and Caspian Seas), and China the story was really little different, but there was an interesting twist to relations with the Golden Horde. It appears that by some means (probably the work of a Franciscan 'mobile convent') the Khan, Toqtaï, (ruler since 1290), was persuaded to accept baptism in 1311, together with his wife, three sons (at least two of whom had already adopted Islam) and a number of lesser Mongol chiefs. Hopes were high for another mass conversion. But within months the khan died and his two elder sons reverted to Islam. His successor, Ozbeg, who ruled until 1240, was already a convinced Muslim. He allowed the missionaries to remain but two years after his death they realized that the future of the Mongols was with Islam and not Christianity. Perhaps their welcome mat had been removed.⁵¹

In China, where John of Monte Corvino claimed to have baptized 6,000 people by 1305 at the unwelcome archbishopric at Peking, a church was established at Zaitum, which must have been in territory disputed by the Mongols and the Chinese, using Peking as a base in 1313. The sources available indicate that the papal representative dabbled in relations between the Chinese and the Mongols, presumably with an eye to influencing the status of both of the Mongol-approved churches – the Nestorian Church in China and the Greek Orthodox Church in Russia. Papal influence gradually increased, but so did antagonism towards Rome, so that about the same time that John Wycliffe was preaching against the same sort of interference in the English court, the Chinese at Zaitum rose against the Mongol authorities, threw them out and killed the Latin bishop. The date for his death is given as 1362. Retribution against the Chinese followed but, in addition, all Christian missions were closed and the Latin population was expelled from Peking seven years later, in 1369.⁵²

In Spain the people of three religious traditions were enjoying a short period of relative peace together, the convivencia, but it was about to come to an end. In 1391 social unrest resulting from the same changes in rural-urban employment and relationships which had affected the rest of Europe built to the point that peasant revolts erupted, with the Jewish community as the main target. Thousands of Jews were forced to adopt Christianity; synagogues were destroyed, and hundreds of Jews were massacred. The wave of terror began in Seville on July 6 and by August 13 it had swept the country from south to north, reaching as far as Perpignan. The Jews were under enormous pressure to disperse, or flee the country.

Expulsions, it seems, were becoming fashionable again and the church tried another one just before the turn of the century. King Charles VI of France is possibly best known for loosing effective power to his uncles when he reputedly went mad in 1392 and for signing the Pact of Troyes which (in theory anyway) gave Henry V of England the French crown as well after the conquest of Normandy. But it was he who also signed a decree in 1394 expelling all Jews from France “perpetually” except for subsistence communities in Avignon and Provence. These two centres are especially interesting in view of the fact that Avignon had been the starting point for the Flagellant-inspired excesses against the Jews during the Black Death and it was still the seat of one of the three claimants to the papacy, Benedict XIII, and Provence is in the watershed area of the Albigensian heresy struggles. [See above, footnote page 5.] Pangs of papal conscience, perhaps. In 1413, two years before Sigismund tried to persuade him to step down voluntarily, Benedict sought to influence the church with his claim to the sole papacy by the conversion of Spanish Jewry. In cooperation with the king of Aragon he organized a missionary attack on the Jews with threats, intimidation and civil benefits for the converts under the guise of a Christian-Jewish disputation in Tortosa. By the middle of the century the number of ‘New Christians’ or Conversos in Spain was greater than the number of professing Jews, although a high proportion of the ‘New Christians’ continued to practice Judaism in private and were known scornfully as Marranos.⁵³

It is not surprising that even before the Council of Constance, ever increasing stresses and strains were showing in Europe’s international affairs. In 1411 the Kingdom of Poland and Lithuania, which had been formed by union in 1386 to avoid the “Christianization” of Lithuania by the pope’s Teutonic Knights, challenged the knights and defeated them decisively at Tennenberg. However with competing papal machines each churning out the absurd story that the knights were selfless crusaders in a heathen land and saying nothing about financial or political implications, the sympathy of western Europe was strongly with the knights – until John Huss started preaching a few home truths.⁵⁴ It didn’t matter that release from the knightly tyranny was what the people needed, or that Poland and Lithuania had a genuine need for trade and military security to back up their victory. The overriding consideration was that if they proceeded to dissolve the states of the Teutonic Knights they would suffer diplomatic and trade isolation and, most probably, reprisals orchestrated by one or more of the three competing popes. “Peace” was therefore agreed on the basis that the Knights would relinquish only their most recently acquired province. Germany and the Holy Roman Empire held on to much of their Baltic and North Sea trade, especially grain and amber, through links between the Teutonic Knights and the Hanseatic League.

The fifteenth century dragged on. The Roman church was back on its self-appointed track with only one pope, although it was still deeply divided over the question of authority and structure. Martin V, having accepted office by authority of the conciliar general council, insisted that the decree Haec Sancta was specific to the Council of Constance and that having been elected his authority took precedence over that of the council. Dissension erupted again when his successor, Eugene IV, called a council at Basle in 1431. The council curtailed his authority in 1437 and when he responded by transferring the sittings (first to Ferrara, in 1438, and then to Florence, in 1439), the conciliarists, continuing to meet in Basle, deposed him, and elected Felix V in his place.

For the next twelve years – while relations between Rome and Constantinople reached crisis point – the church again had two competing popes, but the papists soon gained the upper hand, Felix resigned in 1449 and the conciliar cause was lost. But before he was deposed Eugene had proved that he was capable of carrying out his other papal responsibilities: he introduced restrictions to ‘correct’ the situation in Spain where Christians, Jews and Muslims were all living in harmony. He prohibited any personal contact or business dealings between Christians and Jews; the building or enlarging of synagogues and the giving of evidence against Christians by Jews, (but actions against Jews were to be heard by Christian judges, of course). In addition the segregation and identification of Jews was to be enforced; Jews and Muslims were prohibited from charging interest on loans to Christians and the failure to enforce these regulations was itself an indictable offence.

Europe gradually became more tense and the western countries felt more and more isolated. The spice route and the Red Sea route were both totally controlled by Muslim countries which saw no reason to make trade advantageous for papal Europe. The Mongols of the Golden Horde had been squabbling among themselves since the 1360s and this was interfering with trade and encouraging a powerful principality in Western Russia, based on Moscow, at the same time. Then, after Tamerlane the Turk had destroyed the Mongol capital of Sarai in the last of a series of three raids in 1395 the Horde was unable to recover fully and began to fragment. It still levied tribute from the Russian principalities and could launch punitive raids at will but it could not control the principality completely. While this meant more freedom for the princes it also meant less organization in trade across an immense area of the continent.

RECONCILIATION AT A PRICE: PAPAL PRIMACY

But then the Turks began to step up their pressure against the remnant Byzantine Empire based on Constantinople and the complications snowballed. Constantinople appealed to the west for help. The price? Church reunion with primacy of the pope of the Roman church and acceptance of the Roman version of the filioque clause of the Nicene Creed.⁵⁵ A decree of Union was signed at the Council of Basle/Ferrara/Florence in 1439, but Rome had badly misjudged the effects of its decisions again! For exactly the same reasons that the princes had welcomed the Greek Orthodox Church as an alternative to Roman Catholicism they now broke off relations with Constantinople. The idea of papal interference and absorption into the Holy Roman Empire was abhorrent. While they were the heads of their own churches they were willing to recognize an allegiance to the Byzantine Emperor. There was some sort of harmony between the authority of church and the state even though such an allegiance and authority was meaningless while they were vassal states of the Mongols. However they wanted no dealings at all with either a pope or an emperor who were constantly at loggerheads over their respective powers, to the readily proven disadvantage of the empire. Even if such a relationship were only nominal the Russian princes could not risk being the meat in the sandwich of a power struggle between the Mongols and Rome or Germany.

In addition to that political opposition to church union, the clergy in Russia objected on the same theological grounds which had led to the break with Rome in the first place and, furthermore, they feared that the Inquisition would be imposed on them if, having been sold down the Bosphorus for a few soldiers, they refused to toe the Roman line. And of course the Bosphorus itself was another factor. The traders at each end of the various trade routes which ran through it, (from the Baltic and also from the east, both north and south of the Caspian Sea), were fearful of interference and were well aware of the earlier intervention and diversion of trade when Rome was trying to get into Russia at the expense of the Eastern church.

So the Edict of Union was never put into effect and the west's military support was not provided, but several reactions had already been triggered. Relations had been so severely strained that trade began to fall off but, even more important, the fall of Constantinople was virtually assured. The Russian princes began to appoint their own metropolitans, and Greek influence in Russia, which had mainly been exercised indirectly through the clergy, began to fall away. The Romans continued to recite that 'the Holy Ghost proceeds from the Father and the Son', and the Greeks and Russians continued to recite that 'the Holy Ghost proceeds from the Father through the Son.'

The end was not long in coming but in 1451 the emperor in the east made another desperate attempt to obtain western aid by sending a special ambassador to Rome. The reigning pope, Nicholas V, replied, in writing, confirming that reunion and total submission to papal authority remained a condition of aid. He said that as schism has always been punished more severely than other crimes, the defeat of the Greek Empire, "the most miserable of all nations", by the infidel Turk would represent God's heavy judgement for the deliberate continuation of the schism. He then repeated the rigid and totally unacceptable conditions for reunion, saying that if the emperor and his people refuse this last chance, "You compel us to do that which is demanded by your welfare and our honour."⁵⁶

To rub salt in just a little the pope reminded the emperor that the decree of union had been drawn up in front of all the monarchs of Europe or their embassies. They were all witnesses to it and they all had copies to confirm that the ancient schism had finally been healed, he said. But what he apparently didn't refer to was much more significant. He had called a Holy Year or Jubilee celebrations – the first ever – to raise funds through a pilgrimage to Rome and a scheme of indulgences to support the war against the infidel on the basis that the schism had been healed and Christendom was reunited under the pope. In any case the emperor understood the papal mentality very well. He knew that Rome was still reeling under the devastating impact of the plague which swept through it as a result of the pope insisting on holding a Holy Year pilgrimage, and that the Vatican was almost empty. It is therefore very unlikely that he had held much hope that his appeal would succeed.

A HOLY YEAR INDULGENCE: THE PLAGUE

The pope had personally decided in 1448 to proclaim a Jubilee and Holy Year although members of the Curia had advised against it. They believed the risks were too great. War was still ebbing and flowing across Italy and the plague, which had broken out again in Venice the previous year, was already evident in some other centres as well. They feared that it would be carried to Rome by pilgrims. But the pope knew better of course, through his exclusive direct line from heaven, and planning went ahead. Divine intervention would prevent the plague from being carried to Rome.

Indulgences would be gained by daily visits to each of Rome's four main points of pilgrimage: St. Peter's, St. Paul's, the Lateran Basilica and St. Maria Maggiore. If the pope had really tried he could not have devised a more effective means of spreading diseases which were both contagious and highly infectious. There was an attractive provision for the nobility of Hungary, the front-line state against the Ottoman Turks, to gain their indulgences without making the pilgrimage. Provided that they left Hungary for no purpose other than to fight against those Muslim Infidels during Holy Year they would gain their indulgences by paying only half what it would have cost them to travel to Rome and make the pilgrimage round for fourteen days. To make it even easier for them, special locked boxes were placed in several cathedrals in Hungary to receive their contributions.

So the mob descended on Rome. There were millions milling around the city from the grand opening of the Jubilee celebrations on Christmas day 1449 right through January. Then the numbers fell away so much during February that the innkeepers were discontented at the poor trade. But there was a massive build up during lent as a prelude to the canonization of St. Bernadine of Sienna which was set for Whitsunday, 24th May 1450, and billed as the special attraction of Holy Year. A special lofty papal throne was built for the occasion and even the vestments to be worn by the cardinals cost 7,000 ducats. Unprecedented crowds converged on the city. Hundreds of thousands slept in the streets, in doorways, gutters, anywhere. The bridges across the Tiber were totally clogged to a standstill all day as pilgrims struggled to each of the four churches each day to gain their indulgences.

Then the plague struck. People “fell like dogs” in the streets, on the bridges and into the river. Pandemonium broke loose with hospitals, churches, convents and monasteries crammed with the sick, dying and dead. On July 15 the pope fled from Rome and moved from castle to castle in search of safe air. The papal court was virtually closed, its officials fled to other countries, and Nicholas V did not return to live in the Vatican for almost three years. At one stage he took only one secretary with him and no one who had been in Rome was allowed within seven miles of him on pain of excommunication and loss of papal preferment and favours. Only certain cardinals and their attendants were allowed audience on vital matters ⁵⁷

One such visitor must have been an emissary from Spain, because in November 1451 Nicholas approved in principle the establishment of a tribunal of the Inquisition in Castile in response to a demand from King John II. That was an extension of the saga of the Benedict’s push to convert all Spanish Jews. On January 27, 1449 an attack against taxation in Toledo had turned into an attack on wealthy Converso merchants and rebel leaders took control of the town. Tension must have stayed high for some time because on June 5, the town council adopted a statute proclaiming that Conversos and their children could not hold any public office in the town. In spite of the fact that the destruction of the Khazar Khanate had decisively severed the Jewish religion-race link and the Spanish Jews had responded to the church’s demand that they convert to Christianity they were still regarded as “racially Jews” and the statute was therefore a straight out act of racial discrimination. It was the first such act against the “New Christians.” The council’s decision made a mockery of the church’s enforced conversion program and gave the Jews strong encouragement to go through the motions of conversion and baptism while retaining their faith and private practice as Jews. Nicholas V was in a quandary. On September 24, he took the only action he realistically could, and issued a bull denouncing the Toledo Statute. “All Catholics constitute one body in Christ,” he said. Then, at the end of October Fernan Diaz circulated a memo explaining why the statute was impossible to enforce anyway. Mixed marriages between members of the Catholic aristocracy and families of Conversos were so frequent that any measures to discriminate against men of Jewish descent would affect the entire upper class.⁵⁸ The conversion program was therefore heading for failure. Force would be required to ensure that those families took their Christian obligations seriously. Thus the decision to set up an office of the Inquisition.

THE FALL ... WITHOUT DISASTER

Such was the pope’s situation and frame of mind when he replied to the Byzantine Emperor’s appeal for help a couple of weeks earlier, in October 1451. Naturally when Constantinople fell to the Turks on 29th May 1453 Christian Europe was not prepared for the event. After all, God was on the side of the Christians against the Infidel so it must have been a very dastardly assault by the Muslims to bring the city down. That reaction by the general public was a natural consequence of the doctrines, the self-assessment and the attitude towards non-Christians which the church had gone to such pains to instill, in exactly the same way that the catastrophe of Holy Year had been. The church took full advantage of it. It gave credence to the horrific stories which soon circulated, with its help, and then took further advantage of them to support the papal offer of indulgences for yet another crusade.

So barbarous were the Muslims supposed to be that the eastern states directly bordering the Turkish Empire suffered a big wave of emigration and their economies were affected by depopulation even in spite of the fact that the city-empire of Constantinople, sited on an isthmus into the Bosphorus, had been completely surrounded by Muslims for some years. Such was the power of rumour, innuendo and the pulpit. Actually, once the city's defence had been broken and bloodshed had subsided the Turkish command of the city didn't differ much from Muslim command in other countries. It bore no resemblance to the atrocities of the crusades. Some reports claim that slaves were taken, (including Cardinal Isidore), as well as prisoners and while this was probably the case a little exaggeration in such matters does wonders in a campaign to raise fear and hatred of the one who is being presented as the enemy. Apart from that, the worst that Rome could claim was that Santa Sophia was stripped of all its icons and turned into a mosque, and a crucifix was carried through the streets with a Turkish Soldier's cap on it to shouts of "Behold the God of the Christians."⁵⁹

The Greeks of Constantinople were not even required to renounce Christianity and adopt Islam. Their patriarch was simply required to recognize the Sultan in such matters that previously had been the prerogative of the emperor and to pay the usual sizable tribute for the right to organize a religion other than Islam.⁶⁰ By the reaction in Rome to this "payment for investiture" anyone could be forgiven for thinking that simony and extortionate payments for offices was not a regular practice and a prime characteristic of the papacy of the period.

The Orthodox Church in Constantinople had simply joined the other branches of Eastern Orthodoxy under Muslim rule, except for the church in Ethiopia which alone remained a Christian monarchy, but something had changed. The common bond through an imperial connection in Constantinople had been severed and the Orthodox churches were subject to three different Muslim rulers, viz. the Turkish Ottoman Sultanate, the Mamluke Sultanate of Egypt, Palestine and Syria, and the Emirate of the White Sheep Turks of Iraq and Iran. Each one was now adrift on its own, swamped by Islam, threatened by the Roman Catholic mission in Persia, its morale shattered and looking for something to cast a line to. Moscow provided the answer. The only power which could offer any real protection for the orthodox churches was now Russia and the need for survival demanded that the clergy support the princes of Moscow even though they may not have wished to be associated with the divisive oppression of the land-grabbing profiteers who had grasped for their offices as vassals of the Mongols.

Moscow was on its way to becoming the Rome of the East but it was more than a hundred years before a Synod acclaimed the Russian Tzar, Ivan IV, as the head of Orthodox Christianity throughout the universe.⁶¹ In the meantime the princes of Moscow had absorbed other principalities by either conquest or the political processes of the day and the Mongol Khanates had weakened to the point where they could no longer demand tribute from the Russians.

Western Europe on the other hand was struggling to break out of its economic inertia, dependence on two major groupings of traders (the Hanseatic League and a cluster of towns in the central Mediterranean) and the difficulties of trading with the east through a massive Muslim community which now controlled the Bosphorus routes as well as the spice route and the Red Sea route. In addition the increased suspicion between Russia and the Holy Roman Empire made meaningful cooperation in trade difficult. Russia was now virtually locked into close cooperation with the Muslim powers and the east through the Roman church's pompous, domineering and deadly attitudes. Russia was therefore in a position to develop at the expense of Europe – or at least its princes were. They had been encouraged to make their first grab for power by the negative politicking of Rome. They were being encouraged to make their second grab for power by being propped up and pushed along by the positive politicking of the orthodox churches in yet another reaction to the papal self assessment.

Western Europe was becoming desperate for goods to trade freely without the interference of other parties. The rewards would be great for anyone who could locate and control new sources of supplies or open up direct lines with the east. While the church had most to lose if Europe was pinned into the terrible situation which became apparent when Constantinople fell it also had most to gain, or at least the chance of hanging onto the power it then exercised, if its initiatives brought new hope for the princes and traders of Europe.

CONFLICT: THE STIMULUS FOR EXPANSION

So the world had reached a point of curious paradox. Through its self-misunderstanding and beastly conduct the church had brought Europe to the point where conflict and need would stimulate initiative in exploration and inventiveness in technical design of eventual benefit to the whole world. By default and not by design, in fact in spite of itself, the church was providing the stimulus so that humanity could, if its leaders chose the right course, develop material things and human relationships which could help the world along the road towards Maimonides understanding of the Messianic Age. There was nothing magical or mystical about it at all. Religion in human affairs was looking distinctly rational. It was simply a matter of action and reaction in human behaviour. It was not the only road open. It was certainly not the smoothest road available. It was simply the road which the church had determined from its misunderstanding of both the Messiah and itself. In doing so it had missed many options and opportunities.

Printing, as a means of easily reproducing the same written item time and time again from a simply carved block, had been developed in China during the 6th Century CE, before the Nestorians and Byzantine Catholics had arrived in 635, and moveable type faces came into use during the 11th century.⁶² The complications of the system of written Chinese characters would have made the extensive use of the system difficult at that stage, but certainly it was in use well before Rome's missions were readmitted by the Mongol rulers in 1289. It is therefore difficult to believe that the missionaries could have been ignorant of the existence of printed material and it then follows that they either failed to grasp its significance or the authorities in Rome failed to take up the idea.

So Europe had to wait until between 1440 and 1448 before Coster, Fust and Gutenberg developed their versions of printing presses to service the growing demands of commerce in Holland and Germany. Within a few years of the fall of Constantinople the new processes were being put to good use to speed Europe on its new course, with full advantage being taken of the simple alphabet of European language. The printing press did more to make the idea of comprehensive universal education attainable than any other single factor. Although the Catholic Church held to its view for a long time that only the eyes of the clergy were fit to read the Bible the would-be-reformers quickly took advantage of the presses, often at great risk to the printers who could be traced fairly easily, and Europe was soon flooded by the unprecedented flow of papers and booklets inciting religious reform.⁶³

But while the printers were beginning to exercise real influence as well as providing a service, other developments of immense importance were unfolding. Until the fall of Constantinople, Europe's sailors had confined themselves to the Mediterranean, the coastal waters of the Atlantic, the North Sea and the Baltic with the exception of some Hansa merchants who had traded regularly with Iceland via the port of Bergen in Norway since about the time of the crusades. They were following routes identified by Vikings while they were engaged in their voyages of reprisal against the British Isles and coastal Europe in response to the 9th century northward "Christianizing" thrusts by the Holy Roman Emperors.

After all, no self-respecting Christian would trust his luck out of sight of the Atlantic coast. In spite of the long standing evidence to the contrary, the church was still pursuing the line that the earth was flat and if he went any further he could be over the edge in a flash. Just why the church chose to pontificate on such matters of a practical scientific or geographic nature no one really knew, but it did, and it knew everything, so the world must have been flat.

As trade and politics became tougher and more tightly intertwined many adventurous characters proposed voyages of exploration to find trade routes around Africa to the east and some even dared to suggest that the world was round and that there must have been a way to the east by going west. But it was so ludicrous that no one would finance such a voyage and even if they would the men would refuse to put the ship to sea. The European powers seemed to have forgotten that the Vikings knew of Newfoundland or even the New England coast of America, that a Carthaginian named Hanno had sailed some seventy ships as far as Liberia and the Cape Verde Islands and that an Egyptian had apparently sailed around Africa, taking three years from the Gulf of Suez to the Nile, probably 600 years BCE⁶⁴ They had to start all over again.

Portugal had good reasons to lead the new spate of exploration. It desperately needed trade, it wanted to outflank the Muslim Moors in North Africa, the challenge of the Atlantic haunted every mariner who mastered its exposed coastline, and it was the youngest and weakest of the Western monarchies.⁶⁵ The Portuguese therefore struck out. In 1420 they settled Madeira and next came the Azores. By 1445 they had rediscovered and colonized the long forgotten Canary Islands and the modern colonial era had been born. Portugal was flexing its muscles to challenge the Hanseatic League, Genoa and Venice, and to offset the dominance of the Muslim Turks and Arabs over the Eastern Mediterranean. Admittedly it was only kid stakes compared with the east, but they had made a start. Rome did not miss the significance of the situation.

ROMINUS PONTIFEX: A BRIBE FOR ANOTHER CRUSADE

Within a few months of the fall of Constantinople, Pope Nicholas V, in the words of the New Advent Catholic Encyclopedia, “addressed a Bull of Crusade to the whole of Christendom. Every sort of inducement, spiritual and temporal, was held out to those who should take part in the holy war. Princes were extorted to sink their differences and to unite against the common foe. But the days of chivalry were gone: most of the nations took no notice of the appeal; some of them, such as Genoa and Venice, even solicited the friendship of the infidels.”⁶⁶ Not to be discouraged, Nicholas V was soon in touch with the King of Portugal. He believed they might have a common interest in a couple of matters arising from the fall of Constantinople. For one thing there was an urgent need to replace lost trade, to find new resources for the markets and industries of the empire, and perhaps do a bit of embargo-breaking by finding an alternative trade route to the east. For another thing there was the little matter of a final crusade against the Muslim infidels to settle which assumed new importance now that they had control of the Bosphorus and a very big slice of Eastern Europe.

The Franciscans were especially keen on the idea of a grand crusade – based on a concerted cooperative effort involving the whole of Christendom. It was believed in Rome that there was a Christian kingdom or Khanate somewhere in India which had grown out of an early mission set up by St. Thomas. The Vatican was hopeful that if direct contact could be made with the Khan he would cooperate and open an eastern front in collaboration with the Christian Negus of Abyssinia, (Ethiopia) while the European powers attended to the Mediterranean fronts. Portugal would, of course, receive recognition if the king, with the proven naval expertise of Prince Henry and his school of navigation and exploration at Sagres at his disposal, would cooperate in the plan which was set out in a papal bull Rominus Pontifex in 1454.^{67 68} But the concerted cooperative effort was definitely not forthcoming. So: Portugal was offered the first ‘recognition’ in advance. It was to be granted all lands of the unbelievers that might be discovered along the west coast of Africa. By that means a special relationship was established between the pope and Portugal. Its people would be the standard bearers for Christianity around the world and the king and the pope would share the benefits. The pope had pulled off a coup. Or so he thought.

He may have been reacting against the rejection of his crusade proposal by the other powers, but through another simple papal manoeuvre based on the church’s view of its role, its understanding of what constituted appropriate conduct and that little bull Rominus Pontifex, Nicholas had triggered another round of competition between Portugal and its neighbours, (Castile and Aragon), and indeed among all of western Europe's monarchs. But that was only a small part of the story. A papal standard bearer could hardly come from a people contaminated with a strong fifth column community of both Muslims and Jews. The whole of the Iberian Peninsula would have to be cleansed. The justification for the Spanish Inquisition had been provided.⁶⁹

Similarly, a standard bearer could not allow his standard to be sullied through the influence of any other religion wherever it might go. It had a God-given responsibility and authority to impose papal Christianity wherever it went. The countries of the New World could not escape a dose of Europe's religious bigotry and papal corruption and, naturally enough, once the church began to fragment, each new fragment would feel a responsibility to take the Gospel, as it saw it, and evangelize in competition with Rome. Other churches and other monarchs might not agree with the papal theology or methods but they had to agree that they were equally as responsible to take Christianity to the world as was Portugal, and probably more capable. Portugal had no right, in their view, to special papal consideration just because circumstances had forced it to sail before any other power.

JEALOUSY, STABILITY, CONFORMITY: THE SPANISH INQUISITION

Ferdinand, heir to the throne of Aragon, and Isabella, heir to the throne of Castile, got their heads together, married (fifteen years after the fall of Constantinople) and set about merging the two kingdoms into one, Spain, although they did not assume their thrones until 1479 and 1474 respectively. Regardless of the impact of Rominus Pontifex they were both imbued with that ghastly but ever-present concept that economic and political strength and stability could only be achieved through religious conformity. One of history's most bigoted characters, Isabella teamed up with her husband and the popes, among whom they had relatives, and together they concocted programs aimed at achieving religious conformity which were even more dehumanizing than Europe had previously experienced at its worst.

The Spanish Inquisition was authorized for both Kingdoms by a papal bull issued by Pope Sixtus IV on November 1st 1478, apparently at the urging of Ferdinand,⁷⁰ the year before Ferdinand became King of Aragon. It differed from the 'ordinary' inquisition in that it was aimed especially at nominal converts from Judaism, known as Marranos, and from Islam, known as Moriscos. The sovereigns of both kingdoms were empowered to appoint a Holy Tribunal of three bishops or other equally unsuitable persons above the age of forty with full jurisdiction over heretics and their accomplices. However some open-minded persons in the more cultured sections of the community advised against the new Inquisition. They reasoned that the attachment which the Conversos felt towards their former religion would weaken and disappear in time and that they would become fully integrated. Never the less, work began after Ferdinand assumed the throne. On September 17, 1480 there was an 'Act of Faith' by two Dominican friars commissioned for the purpose in which six men and women of Jewish extraction were burned alive in Seville for holding to the faith of their fathers.^{71 72}

The long period of Muslim rule in Spain had left such a high level of religious tolerance that it was totally unacceptable to the church. As already noted, about forty years before the Inquisition was formalized Pope Eugene IV had introduced restrictions to 'correct' the situation in Spain and the nature of his regulations was such that, in contrast to other countries of Europe, large numbers of both Jews and Muslims succumbed and accepted the formality of baptism while holding to their real faith. They had been readily accepted by the ordinary people of Christian congregations and this led to intimate dialogue on matters of faith and helped to undermine the credibility and authority of the clergy. It was like Maimonides and his Guide of the Perplexed all over again. The Judaization and Islamization of Christians was an effect of the regulations which the popes had not bargained for. Nicholas V took careful note of the status and influence which the Marranos and Moriscos had achieved and the immunity from trial for heresy which had grown around them. He instructed that no discrimination was to be made between the 'New' and 'Old' Christians in matters of heresy and that Eugene's restrictions on Jews and Muslims were to be more vigorously enforced. Muslim criers were not permitted to call the faithful to prayer by voice from tall minarets but only by muted trumpets from tresses brought down to the level of the mosques.⁷³

And so to such a pitiful fanfare the Spanish Inquisition began. All hell was let loose from 1481 as a joint act of the Crowns and the church. Hardly a family in Spain would be free of mental or physical scars from the Inquisition during the next few generations. Reports on the number of casualties in this war against humanity by the church vary. One indicates that close to 30,000 were put to death by the Holy Tribunals with some hundreds of thousands tortured.⁷⁴ Another, by a church authority, suggests merely that about seventeen thousand Marranos and Moriscos are said to have repented in double quick time and so they were let off with punishment short of death! Those who resisted usually ended up on a stake, after an appropriate trial supported by faithful witnesses and with suitable torture to help them recall the sins and heresies to which they should have been confessing.⁷⁵ Those who chose suicide avoided only the torture, and their families often got that in their place. Their bodies were exhumed and burned, and their heirs were deprived of their property, public offices and civil honours. Sometimes, like the repentant who escaped the stake, they were thereafter required to wear flame-coloured crosses which had to be open to public view. They were forbidden to wear gold or silk and many languished in sub human prison conditions for years. Then there were those who were sold into slavery. They probably enjoyed a happier fate than those who remained free.

The numbers of Jews, Muslims, Marranos and Moriscos who fled Spain in this period is not definitely known but it certainly ran into tens of thousands and has been put as high as 200,000.⁷⁶ The fortunate ones went to Muslim North Africa and the Ottoman Turkish Empire. The presence of the others in papal Europe simply increased the tensions and triggered further sectarian outbursts around them. Quite a few thought they went to safety in Portugal ...

Of course the continuing existence of a small pocket of peace, prosperity and civilized interfaith harmony in Muslim Granada was a major embarrassment to both the pope and the royal households. It had to go, and a campaign began in 1481. It combined military invasion, political bargaining with promises of a liberal peace, and a ten year campaign to convert or eliminate the Jewish and Muslim populations. The Catholic monarchs entered Granada on January 2, 1492, but some resistance must have continued because the campaign was finally declared successful in March. No Muslim administration remained in Western Europe.

All pretence about a liberal peace was dropped immediately. On March 31 in the council at Alhambra in the captured territory Ferdinand and Isabella signed a decree expelling all Jews from their entire dominions, including Sicily and Sardinia, and giving them four months to be sold up and gone. The Inquisitors took steps to prevent them selling anything to Christians and because there was no one else left to sell anything to, most of them left as paupers, their property forfeited to the crown.⁷⁷ Of the 160,000 refugees who fled, 110,000 found their way to the Muslim countries of Turkey and Morocco, an estimated 20,000 died attempting to find a new home, and most of the balance, about 30,000, settled in the Ottoman Empire. About 50,000 remained in Spain to accept baptism and take their luck as Marranos.⁷⁸ The date for final departures from Sicily was put forward to January 12, 1493, but the last Jews left Granada and the other Spanish territories in August 1492.⁷⁹

All that their Muslim rulers required of the new settlers was payment of the poll tax and acknowledgment of Islam as the superior religion. They were welcome wherever they went and the Ottoman Empire became their safe haven. Within twenty years both Istanbul (formerly Constantinople) and Salonika had Jewish communities of 20,000 persons. The Spanish and Portuguese settlers soon outnumbered the indigenous Jews who were assimilated into the culture and community of the immigrants. Ottoman Jewry underwent a gradual transformation as semi-autonomous self-sufficient Jewish communities evolved. Being beyond the clutches of the church they were able to trade freely with European traders as well as Asia and North Africa, so commerce and industry flourished. In addition there was a renewal of religious and cultural awareness, and the new Prepared Table of Hebrew Law, Shulhan Arukh, by Joseph Caro, became the authoritative code for the entire Jewish community. New and influential trends in Jewish mysticism also developed in Palestine.

A DEEP SEA BOUNTY HUNT

Just as the last of the Jews were leaving Spain to go south and east another traveler left to go west. Christopher Columbus sailed on his first voyage from Palos on August 3. A Genoese-born sailor, possibly a bankrupt Marranos, Columbus had settled in Portugal and offered his services and a plan to sail across the Atlantic to Asia. He was convinced that the world was round.^{80 81} The king listened, said no, but promptly adopted the plan using one of his own captains in an attempt which ended in mutiny in 1483. Columbus offered his services to Spain but Ferdinand and Isabella were preoccupied with getting the Muslims out of Granada. He tried England next but Henry VII wasn't interested.

Then when Granada fell Columbus got his commission and three ships from merchants at Palos who were anxious to fill the void left by the successful Muslim traders who had either been expelled or otherwise disposed of. After sailing on August 3 he sighted land on October 11. It was not Asia as he thought, but the West Indies, and he returned to Spain with gold, cotton, birds, animals and two West Indians – to be baptized of course.

In the meantime Portugal had taken advantage of the pope's encouragement and had established several settlements along the West African coast, including the resource rich Guinea and Gold Coast. The mouth of the mighty Congo was sighted in 1482. The crown then financed an expedition by Diaz in 1487 which took him around the Cape of Good Hope and the route to India and the papal grand crusade plan lay ahead at last, although it would not be chartered for another ten years. Then in 1490 the church reached one of those long awaited beacons. Portugal, acting for the pope, established a mission on the Congo. Darkest Africa had the benefit of Christianity for the first time or, more correctly, the church had the advantage of darkest Africa for the first time.

The race was on. Jealousy between Spain and Portugal increased and the question of territorial claims had to be settled. The new pope, Alexander VI, a Spanish grandee who largely owed his election to the Spanish monarchs, could not have his two most ardent allies tearing at each others throats. He may need their help because France was contemplating an invasion of Italy with encouragement from dissatisfied Puritan reformers like the Dominican Savanorola at Florence. He issued several bulls giving his noble friends in Spain exclusive rights to trade with all lands that might be discovered west of the Atlantic.

If his main aim had been to secure the papal position, Alexander's intrigue backfired in exactly the same way as virtually all of the church's previous political manoeuvring. He stirred up a hornet's nest among the other powers who, regardless of papal fantasies about the sun and the moon and claims of over-riding papal authority in the election of kings, saw no reason for him to exercise such authority. They were certainly not readily going to forfeit their rights to new territory or trade at the stroke of a Spanish papal pen. He also hardened France's resolve to invade Italy and encouraged squabbling among everyone.

In any case the territorial division didn't suit Portugal. Columbus had set sail again in 1492 with seventeen ships, 1,500 men and twelve priests to convert the native races and annex all lands discovered in the name of the Spanish crown and by authority of the pope. But before he returned to tell of his many discoveries Spain and Portugal had signed the Treaty of Tordesillas on June 6, 1494. The treaty was based on a papal bull which Alexander VI had issued a month earlier, on May 3, which fixed a demarcation line along a circle passing one hundred leagues west of the Cape Verde Islands and through the two poles. That demarcation gave the entire New World to Spain, while Africa and India went to Portugal. However under the treaty which the two powers signed, the demarcation line was modified. Portugal could have everything as far west as 370 leagues from the Cape Verde Islands. This vague point lying somewhere between the lines of longitude of 45 degrees and 50 degrees west gave it that part of Brazil between the estuaries of the Amazon and Rio Grande as well as Africa and India! ⁸²

Portugal had stolen another march on Spain. But there is always a solution to any problem, even if it takes a little time to find. Ferdinand and Isabella had always cast envious eyes towards Portugal, especially since it began to reap the benefits of its African possessions, but they dared not risk a war to ‘unify’ the peninsula. Their chance came when John II died and his young bachelor cousin Manoel assumed the throne in 1495. If their daughter Isabella were to marry Manoel union could be achieved without tears. The parties agreed to the match but Isabella put a condition on it. She would only enter Portugal if the union produced one purified Christian country free of the 100,000 refugees of all types who had been allowed to enter from Spain.

A CONDITION FOR MARRIAGE: NO JEWS OR MUSLIMS

On that basis a marriage treaty was signed on November 30, 1496 and on December 5 a royal decree was issued banishing all Jews and Muslims within ten months. But Manoel had both a heart and an economy to build as his empire expanded and he had second thoughts. He couldn’t face the consequences of reneging on the treaty so he “commuted” expulsion to forced conversions. Between April and October 1497 thousands of children were dragged screaming to the baptismal fonts. Adults were simply sprinkled, protesting, with holy water and declared Christian. Those who wanted to migrate were refused permission and kept under guard until the ten months were up. They were then told that as they had failed to leave the country they had forfeited their freedom and were to be slaves of the king unless they accepted baptism. Few refused. A few years later, in 1500, the pope offered extra encouragement for the Jews to convert. He struck a special tax on Jews to help finance a crusade against the Muslim Turks. The rationale was that the crusade would benefit everyone who lived in Christian countries, whether Christians or Jews, and the Jews should share in the costs as well as the benefits or the potential disasters. ⁸³ Then in 1507 a law was introduced establishing the same “civil equality” between New Christians and Old Christians in Portugal as other countries had experienced.

Manoel had saved a lot of people, his conscience and his crown but to do so he had made a bitter enemy of the church and Spain at a crucial time for all concerned. The ‘New Christians’ of Portugal were allowed to practice their Crypto-Judaism and Islam with relative openness and freedom until 1531 (ten years after Manoel’s death) except for occasional fanatical outbursts against them, and although the Inquisition then set about a big backlog of work it was not until 1579 that the Holy Tribunals gained the terrible power they had enjoyed in Spain.

So Spain and Portugal pressed on with their grabs for territory in the New World. With the explorers, soldiers, traders and administrators, many of whom were no better than thugs, went the priests. They were there to baptize and eliminate whatever religious or cult practices may have been present. In fact they sanctified the rape of Latin America, the destruction of the Aztec and Inca Empires and the economic and spiritual enslavement of people they previously didn’t even know existed, who certainly hadn't done them any harm and were not in a position to do so.

They were a reflection of the ever worsening sickness of the church right across Europe but fortunately the pressure for reform was building up. There were people like Jerome Savonarola, who could fill the great cathedral at Florence to overflowing with people eager to hear him on the social and religious evils of the day. It is only surprising that in view of his vitriolic attacks on the papal hierarchy and his support for the French invasion of Italy he survived until 1498 when he was hanged, and burned for good measure, in the great square of Florence – after a fair heresy trial, of course.⁸⁴

While some of the pope's supporters were celebrating the end of Savonarola and his nonsense they were unaware that some of his other supporters were celebrating the beginning of papal Christianity and influence in India. Vasco da Gama, who had sailed from Portugal in 1497 intending to make a clean sweep around the Cape of Good Hope without landing had miscued and spent Christmas Day on the beach at Natal before reaching Calicut in South India about the same time as the bonfire in Florence. He didn't find a Christian Khan either. He found Muslim traders who were not at all pleased to see him. In fact they were rather hostile. But he still managed to take home a cargo of pepper and cinnamon. On his next voyage three years later he first established a Portuguese colony on the east coast of Africa, at Mozambique, and then returned to sack Calicut in revenge for the murder of a couple of his men.

It was left to Cabral or his voyage to India to make contact with the Thomas Christians, to negotiate a trade treaty of sorts and to prepare the ground for the first Portuguese Viceroy to take up his post in 1505 and establish the framework for a trading empire. Although he lost seven of his thirteen ships on the voyage, including one commanded by Diaz, Cabral could well consider it successful. On the outward leg he had sighted and claimed Brazil for Portugal. A Spaniard, Vincente Pinzon, had landed there earlier but naturally Spain had not laid claim to it because it was on the Portuguese side of the papal gift line!

The popes, one by one, were becoming quite ecstatic as the world unfolded before their eyes. It didn't really matter that they had been wrong and that the world was round and not flat after all. There was an awful lot of it and with a bit of luck, a successful grand crusade against the Muslim infidels, and a more effective Inquisition it would very soon all be theirs! Orthodox Russia had begun to cooperate on the Jewish question with the leaders of a Judaizing sect being burned on Grand Duke Ivan's orders in 1504 and the Jews were on the run from one country to another.

TERRITORY, WEALTH AND POWER

With the New World unfolding as its empire in addition to Europe the church was outgrowing its offices. The Vatican would have to be enlarged and St. Peters would have to be rebuilt. The centre of Christendom had to have a temple to end all temples. Julius II, pope from 1503 to 1513, spent most of his time enlarging Rome, annexing more territory to the papal states and beautifying buildings. Never mind the people or the corruption we must have a magnificent institution. He commissioned Michelangelo to design a tomb for him (perpetuating an image of him as a powerful Moses) and to paint the Sistine Chapel ceiling.⁸⁵ He also commissioned plans for the reconstruction of St. Peters to provide the temple of temples and the foundations were laid on April 18th 1506.

By that stage the lone voices of reformers had turned into a steady chorus, aided by the new fangled printing presses. Among its leaders was Desiderius Erasmus, a former Augustinian canon who had left his order in good standing and become a university teacher and prolific writer. Erasmus was born the year the church was expelled from China and Ferdinand married Isabella. His first major work, 'Handbook for the Christian warrior', set out a Bible -based theology for life stripped of the heavy handed doctrinal commentaries which characterized most of the Christian writings of the period. It showed, through his barbed criticism of abuses in church life, a little of the pen-lashing the church was about to get. Its publication coincided with the sacking of Calicut by Vasco de Gama. However, although he prepared the ground with his incisive, humorous attacks on church corruption and the fallacies in some of its teaching so that Europe was in a better position to respond to the great reformers he did not engage in a frontal attack on the papacy or break with Rome.^{86 87 88}

The fun really began when Julius II was succeeded by Leo X in March 1513. Triumphal arches were specially built for a magnificent coronation procession which was more pagan than Christian. Gilt nude boys along the route must have given it a festive air, to say the least. After the procession hordes of papal guests responded to Leo's cry of "Let us enjoy the papacy since God has given it to us!" They let their hair down and wallowed through banquets, dancing, bull fights, hunting parties (each with 150 guests) and other equally edifying entertainment. It had taken a pope to introduce bull fighting to Rome 830 years after the gladiators and lions had been finally laid to rest. One seventh of the substantial treasury left by Julius towards Vatican reconstruction, whatever we may think of that as a purpose, went on the papal coronation.⁸⁹ When Leo died the Vatican was bankrupt – financially as well as morally – but that was still eight years away and well into the reformation struggle.

It was Leo X who presided over much of the Fifth Lateran Council although it had been convened by Julius II who presided over its early sessions. The tussle for control of the church in France had not been resolved by a series of abortive wars across Italy which began in 1494, and in 1511 Julius founded the Holy League to bring more pressure to bear in his favour. Louis XII responded by calling a Council at Pisa to depose the pope who, in his turn, convened the Fifth Lateran Council in a bid to gain the support of Emperor Maximilian and to annul the deposition.

That power struggle was of such importance for the church domestically (because the composition of the hierarchy had long been determined by nepotism and simony), and for the outcome of other struggles by Europe's monarchs to control their national churches that any matters before council which were not related to that struggle tended to be treated as distractions.

This was the case with evangelism in the New World. At the same time that Louis and Julius were politicking over control of the church in France, just a matter of months before Lateran V, the first bishopric west of the Atlantic was being organized at Santo Dominigo – by the Spanish crown – and the appointee, Alessandro Gerardini, attended council in December 1516.⁹⁰ While the council was still in session Portuguese ships reached Java and the Moluccas, Cortes accomplished his brutal conquest of Mexico and Portuguese traders reached China by the Indian Ocean route. But the council took no direct initiatives. In spite of all the lyrical sentiments of earlier years, and in spite of Rominus Pontifex and the role the church was trying to maintain in civil affairs by whatever means it could, the establishment of Christian Causes and evangelization in the New World were left to the monarchs concerned. Their care was for political advantage, not the people in the territories they were acquiring.

In this regard the politicking to outmanoeuvre Moscow and Constantinople in Asia Minor had been stepped up progressively and, also in December 1516, council received three envoys from the Maronites of Syria with a message of submission and homage from their Patriarch. It was dated February of the previous year, and the pope had already bestowed the necessary honours and favours on the patriarch in order to confirm the new relationship and his “mediation” in Maronite affairs in Cyprus and Venice.⁹¹ A touch of bribery had achieved much the same relationship with the Minorites. Naturally the final session of the council followed up those political initiatives with a decree requiring the powers to wage war against the Muslim Infidel and, as the church’s contribution, it ordered the levying of tithes on all papal benefices (income earning offices), throughout Christendom for three years.

TITHES, TEMPLES, INFIDELS AND INDULGENCES

Such was the extent of the council’s interest in evangelism. But on the other hand Julius had managed, in the closing days of his papacy, to initiate a doctrinal statement which was intended to justify the organized sale of indulgences to finance his pet project – the reconstruction of St. Peters. The priorities of the church came through loud and clear. Power and properties before people.

That doctrinal statement and the purpose for which it was callously introduced were both a consequence and a reflection of the church’s view of itself, its role and its God. It provided more opportunities for corruption and further distorted the Gospel message. In other words it was quite consistent with the pattern of policies which the church had been following right through the period of the Holy Roman Empire, but it had gone too far.

Then the church joined the reformers in one respect. It began paying close attention to the printing presses. Leo told the council that the presses had surpassed all expectations and were proving at some times a blessing and at other times a curse, bringing down both the favour of heaven and the distraction of heretics and their errors. Accordingly, with the support of the council, he forbade the printing of any book without the approval of the local bishop and the Inquisitor or senior curia officials in Rome on pain of excommunication and suitable penalties for any offences. He directed that every book published contrary to that ruling was to be burned. Then he set the printing presses rolling again, to produce indulgences in vast numbers. The official position was, put very simply, that a gift towards the reconstruction of St. Peters by a penitent sinner would atone for the person's sins and thereby bring remission of the punishment which otherwise would have been appropriate. The piece of paper, signed by the pope, was to be a token affirming the person's penitence. However the credibility gap between the official position and the operation of the ever-widening indulgences schemes was unbridgeable.

The more gullible, browbeaten Catholics of Central Europe started making their gifts in the superstitious hope that their piece of paper would protect them when they had to front up for judgement. The more unscrupulous began buying their indulgences as a demonstration of their piety, as a suggestion that they would go straight in future, and as a means of raising their status with the local clergy. Of course there were also those who genuinely believed that the pope had some God-given power to get a person off the hook of his or her misdeeds. They may have believed that the concept of purgatory was not, itself, a convenient mechanism which helped to deter people from joining the ranks of heretics and reformers, and helped to ensure subjection to the papal line. In spite of that enormous market potential it seems that the Vatican had not done its home work very well, again, and there was not the fantastic rush to buy indulgences which the pope looked for. This encouraged the organizers to turn to even more dubious methods of selling them.

The twenty seven year old brother of the Elector of Brandenburg, Prince Albert, coveted not just one but two archbishoprics. In 1516 he managed to make the necessary well established arrangements with the Vatican to couple the offices of Archbishop of Mainz and Archbishop of Magdeburg which happened to include the castle town of Wittenberg. However the papal fee for a 'dispensation' to formalize the holding of two such offices concurrently was quite enormous, in line with the personal benefits which were available to the office holder. To raise the fee of 40,000 ducats the prince cum archbishop(s) borrowed heavily from the Fugger of Augsburg, one of the great banking houses and, at that time, bankers to the Vatican. As security for the debt, and with papal concurrence, he undertook to proclaim the papal indulgences for rebuilding St. Peters throughout Germany. Part of the revenue collected was to go to the papal building fund and part to the bank to repay the archbishop-prince's debt. The arrangement was known only to a handful of powerful diplomats, the Vatican and its financiers.⁹²

Johann Tetzel, a Dominican, was appointed as papal sub commissary to promote the indulgences in Magdeburg and Halbertstat. Tetzel's preaching, or sales pitch, went beyond the authorized doctrine which was already being questioned by many theologians who had not previously aligned themselves with movements for reform. He preached that when a coffer rings to the coins of an indulgence a soul springs from purgatory to heaven.

The theologians were disturbed. But the competitors of the archbishop-prince of the House of Brandenburg were more upset. The archbishop and his lackey were poaching into other people's territory. Indulgences money which should have stayed at home in places like the castle church at Wittenberg (with its 17,443 holy relics) was crossing the border to support the House of Brandenburg.

Then it happened. Someone took a copy of Tetzel's instructions from the archbishop to the professor of Holy Scripture at the University of Wittenberg, thirty four year old Martin Luther. Luther, who had been teaching a simplified theology for some time, was shocked. He wrote to the prince-archbishop and the bishop of Brandenburg. When they ignored his letters he worked carefully through the ideas behind the indulgence system, drew up his 'Ninety-five theses' on the subject and sent them to the archbishops and bishops of the region. But to confirm that he was ready to defend them in public debate he nailed a copy to the door of the castle church at Wittenberg on October 30, 1517.⁹³

The Reformation had been triggered. The debate was out in the open. Theological concern and princely self interest coincided for once and with a power base to push it along, the reform movement soon engulfed Europe. The warped self-assessment of the Christian church and the practices which it adopted had finally brought on an internal challenge strong enough to trigger a reassessment which the Sanhedrin in Jerusalem, Arius at Nicaea, Muhammad at Mecca and Maimonides in Spain had each been unable to achieve.

The church's attempt to achieve an exclusive religious and political power for itself throughout the world through the establishment of the Holy Roman Empire seven hundred years earlier was at last falling apart at the seams. There was a chance that through an internal reformation the Christian Church could yet achieve the purposes for which it was established: to carry the Good News throughout the world and to provide an environment in which man could understand his relationship with God and with his fellows.

But there was an immense challenge ahead, with very big hurdles for the church to jump which it had erected itself while it tried to strengthen its own power base and mercilessly put down the challenge from Maimonides with the Inquisitions. It had completely failed to eliminate its two partners in the triangle. By means of its oppressive programs it had prevented its senior partner, the Jewish community, from establishing a political power base anywhere and had kept it on the run, but in doing so it had guaranteed that Judaism would be uniformly spread wherever European expansionism carried the church. It had also deepened the division between itself and its junior partner, the Muslim community, and forced the establishment of three massive power blocks based on religious affiliation.

There were, firstly, the power block of Christian Europe and, secondly, Muslim Asia Minor and North Africa. But then there was the block of Russian principalities whose isolation from Western Europe had been guaranteed by the politicking of the church in such a manner that it would permanently colour the relationship between them. The Christian church, in the broad sense, was permanently linked into political struggles in which each of the three blocks would be involved.

Without being aware of it the church had generated regional, political and trade conflict which helped to push Europe into its colonial land grabs in an atmosphere of intense competition and bigotry which need not have been the case. Then, because it had sunk into a foul domestic quagmire of its own making, it abdicated the New World crown which was within its reach by delegating its real responsibility – to carry the Good News to countries colonized in the rape of Africa, Latin America and Asia – to the political powers which gained the economic benefits from that rape.

However the biggest hurdles which the church had built were the barriers between its partners in the triangle and itself in terms of personal and community attitudes towards the Christian position. The Jewish community's conviction that the church was wrong and its determination to survive to carry the truth became more deeply entrenched. The Muslim community's conviction that the church was wrong and its belief that man could survive perfectly well in direct submission to God were also very firmly entrenched, together with the conviction that man does not have to oppress those around him politically and economically to be at peace with himself, with his fellows and with God.

But in the Christian camp the belief in its own superiority, the belief that its exclusive rituals and Sacraments are essential to Salvation, and the belief which follows from those, that the church is the only route to Salvation, became indelibly ingrained into the personalities of almost everyone who was subject to them. Those beliefs became a guarantee that the church would continue to resist a reassessment of its self-understanding so that as it finally takes place the church is bound to be exposed in the most searching and embarrassing manner. All its foolishness, arrogance and gross misconduct are apparent to all the world.

The coffers were ringing loud and clear with a call for reformation.

CHAPTER 10

THE ONE THAT GOT AWAY

When Julius II devised his scheme to finance his temple to end all temples ¹ Europe was bursting at the seams, relatively speaking, with about seventeen percent of the world's population competing for the productivity of seven percent of the world's land mass. That situation compounded the pressures which had built up to force Europe's crowned heads and traders to look for more territory and resources. Europe accounted for about seventy million of the world's estimated total population of somewhat more than four hundred million people.² Other major population concentrations were in China with 120 million, India with 110 million and Japan with 15 million. Although more than three quarters of the world's people were crammed into those four regions, a reasonably high degree of regional stability had developed other than in Europe. Only about ten million people could still be classed as nomadic and they lived mainly in Asiatic Russia, Central Asia and Australia.

There was no longer the migratory pressure of huge populations from North and East Asia looking for a place to settle. Similar pressures would be experienced shortly in other parts of the world, and in due course enormous pressures would again build up with the explosion of the world population and technology, but at the beginning of the sixteenth century they were certainly not anticipated. Farming, no matter how elementary, was providing a new basis for settled community life and increasing urbanization. With one notable exception, there was no great moral void which the Christian church should have felt obliged to fill to prevent serious social abuse or collapse. Of course there were points of conflict, but in most communities, systems of ethics or religion which helped to provide stable social conditions had been developed. They ranged from elementary animist religions, through highly developed systems of ethics such as Buddhism and Confucianism, and the complex culture of Hinduism, to the intense and submissive devotion to God of Islam. And, of course, in spite of – or because of – all that the Church had done for fifteen hundred years to eliminate or disperse them and to persuade the world to believe that they were of no consequence, there were the highly organized and professionally led networks of tight-knit Jewish communities which lived strictly according to their carefully documented codes of conduct in tandem with Christianity and Islam wherever they were spread.

The church failed to understand for a long time that about the same number of people were living under the influence of the third partner in the triangle of Abrahamic or Messianic faiths, Islam, as were living under the influence of Christianity. It also failed to understand the nature of the non Messianic religions and the way in which these provided firstly, a system of ethics to provide stable self-regulation within their communities and, secondly, fertile ground for a quick and deep response to the Messiah's Good News of peace, divine love and harmony – provided it was conveyed to them in that context of peace, love and harmony. The church could only see them as inferior systems without the Trinity and the Christian sacraments which it thought were required to climb out of its own creation, purgatory, and through the pearly gates at which St. Peter stood in firm control with his keys.^{3,4}

The notable exception to the general rule about the non-messianic religions was the religion of the Aztecs of Mexico. Even so, their religion had helped them to achieve a high level of social organization and discipline, and an advanced agricultural economy centred around their magnificently engineered capital, Tenochtitlan, built as an easily defended stronghold on islands in the middle of a marshy lake. To them, the gods were the forces of nature personified and to be rigidly obeyed in terms which their priests might interpret. Tribal life pivoted around the priests who were linked closely with the civil elite, who directed the intellectual life of the tribe and who held a vicelike grip on the minds of the people, inhibiting freedom of thought almost totally. The Curia and its Inquisitors should have been proud to enroll them. Their rituals and sacrifices were aimed at gaining the protection and support of the gods in war and the assurance of bountiful crops. In that respect they did not differ greatly from Christian practices like planting a cross in a battlefield and blessing the plough. However there the similarity ends.

The Aztecs believed that the gods responded best to sacrifices of human hearts and that the most valuable of these were hearts torn from living prisoners of war. To satisfy the gods, a constant supply of prisoners was needed, so naturally the Aztecs lived and battled through a steady cycle of wars. Sacrifice led to war, and war back to sacrifice.⁵ The sacrificial slaughter is said to have reached up to 20,000 prisoners per year.⁶ They were almost on a par with the Crusades, the Inquisitions, the conversion of the Scandinavians and the Flagellants. All that such practices prove is that Europe wasn't the only region that urgently needed a religious reformation. Certainly such practices were not a justification for the total destruction of a very advanced civilization which had a great deal which it could have contributed to the rest of the world. What was needed was a stop to such practices and a program of evangelism. We shall come to this matter again in due course.

In spite of the close links between the aristocracy and the church, there were many among Europe's nobility who were happy to see papal Rome get a good shake up, but their attitudes reflected a wide range of motives and experience. There were those like the Elector of Wittenberg who found themselves in conflict with the church over financial issues, or who found themselves forced into a power struggle with other members of the aristocracy.⁷ There were those who simply objected to the papal power broker role and those who wanted a complete separation of the roles of the church and state. Then there were those who objected to the corruption of the church, its rejection of basic human rights and the economic and political effects of the church's policies, while others objected for doctrinal reasons. But of course there were also those who supported the church just as it stood, complete with all the blood on its hands, and the policies and circumstances which had led relentlessly towards reformation within the church were the same ones which guaranteed a long drawn out conflict. Caught in the middle were those ordinary people who had naturally looked to the church for moral support, for whom it provided the only alternative leadership to their feudal over lords and who were overawed by the clergy and thought it impious to disobey or query them in spite of the state that the church was in.⁸ The morals and integrity of the church were supposed to be superior to those of the civil authorities and its grandiose ritual was designed to give an impression of priestly incorruptibility and of a monopoly on the direct line to God. However, the shine had begun to fade.

With increasing emphasis on regional or national political power and gradual urbanization providing a stabilizing influence through a broader community power structure, the attraction of a central Roman power as a focal point and a defensive shield was waning. Eastern Europe was being tugged from two directions as a result of the division of the church, and Western Europe resented the intrusion of papal interests in its struggles, so that no group of countries shared sufficient common interests to want to see a renewal or an extension of Roman power. They needed a church to provide community cohesion, spiritual and moral guidance, with stability resulting from submission to the lawful powers. But the concept of political stability through religious conformity was apparently unattainable and they were being attracted more and more to the idea of national churches instead of a universal church.

The end of the wars between France and England in the same year as the fall of Constantinople had combined with the rise of Spain and Portugal under papal patronage to produce completely new power groupings in the West also. During the last minute politicking in March 1452 over whether the West would help defend Constantinople against the Muslim Turks, the pope, Nicholas V, had crowned King Frederick III of Germany with the defunct crown of Lombardy while conducting his marriage, in Rome, to Eleanor of Portugal. Three days later he crowned him Emperor. Such displays of pomp and circumstance were again acceptable because the plague had subsided. A year or so later he could get no powers other than Portugal and Spain to agree to his proposal for a crusade against Muslim Turkey. Another year on and he could barely raise a defence pact with Naples, Florence, Venice and Milan. Their traders were more interested in non-aggression pacts with Turkey to protect their dwindling commercial operations with the East.^{9 10}

At the domestic level, the degeneration of the papacy, its abuse of civil and ecclesiastical law, its corruption, mania for miracles, unhealthy veneration of relics and saints, and an inescapable obsession with witchcraft had become apparent to almost everyone. The church had become a welfare haven for selected nobility, harnessed to the family interests and intrigues of the aristocracy who made up its higher echelons and staffed the cathedrals, while the lower clergy who had been attracted to the church for quite different reasons lived in poverty, misery and mental bondage.¹¹ It has been said that the church of that period was a product of Roman society during the previous few hundred years. In as much as it may be intended to justify the condition and conduct of the church that statement is completely untenable. The reverse is nearer the truth. As already noted, Rome was finished as a city of importance in 455 when Genseric finally cracked the power vacuum and sacked the city. Civil administration had been based at Ravenna for some time and the new rulers saw no point in rehabilitating Rome. The church missed its opportunities to return to Jerusalem and reorganize, to vacate Rome and either decentralize or re-establish elsewhere, or to rethink its theology and link up with Arian Christianity as a reformed church.

The hierarchy of the day was desperate to fill the power vacuum left by the collapse of the empire. It took full advantage of both the attachment which people felt towards Rome and the early Christian connection with the city which it had used to justify the idea of papal primacy. It would have lost at least some of its influence if it had been seen to be just a band of human beings shifting from one place of business to another with the ebb and flow of political fortune. Again it was saddled with the image which it chose to present to the world. It was stuck with the remnants of a decaying city which would respond to the life and influence of the body which had decided to keep it alive. It did. No 'New Jerusalem' rose on the site of old imperial Rome and the church must take full responsibility for the moral condition of the city when Luther was finally inspired to swing his hammer by the discord of the ringing coffers.

THE NADIR OF THE PAPACY

Rome had become a city in which "God's commandments and Christian justice are despised"; in which "tyranny, avarice and worldly pomp" sufficed for canon law; in which "the hellish dregs of personal vices" had reached the limit of understanding, and in which, according to Luther, the papal ravaging wolves stole and extorted money from the whole of Christendom by indulgences, bulls, letters of confession, butter letters and other confessionalia in scandal perpetrated in the Holy names of Christ and St. Peter.¹² While right and reason enjoyed some respect in Venice, Antwerp or Cairo, the popes had built an ecclesiastical market place where money bought marriage or release from vows for the clergy, legitimacy for bastards and knighthoods for the iniquitous. The kind of morality in which shameful conduct and dishonour assumed dignity flowed "like a tide into all the world"¹³ and the only theological activity the popes engaged in, apart from the canonization of a few more saints, was heresy hunting. Serious theological thinking, even if it was not totally beyond their capacity, training or experience, was a distraction from the serious business of personal power politics and the corrupt accumulation of family fortunes. Family fortunes?

It has been said that the pontificate of Alexander VI, who assumed office as pope eight days after Columbus sailed on his first trans-Atlantic voyage from Palos, represented "the absolute nadir of the papacy"¹⁴ and that the situation could get no worse. Having secured election by bribing a few cardinals¹⁵ he proceeded to abuse his office with licentious conduct, nepotism and total disregard for the spiritual responsibilities of the church; he furthered the division of the people of the New World between his friends and relatives in Spain and Portugal; he authorised the excommunication and subsequent execution of his critic Girolamo Savonarola, another leading reformer, and he arranged principalities for several of his illegitimate children, four of whom were born from adulterous relationships with women of noble standing in Rome; One of them, Cesare Borgia, was attached to the papal court as a member of the College of Notaries at the age of seven, he was appointed Bishop of Pamplona at 16, Archbishop of Valencia at 17, and Cardinal at 18 – without ever training for the priesthood. Then he resigned his cardinal's post to concentrate on corruptly acquiring a personal empire in central Italy by carving out pieces of the papal states, with papal assistance, of course... So much for celibacy, morality, honesty or a commitment to Christ and the Gospels. But to talk of a recovery in the conduct of the papacy from the demise of Alexander VI is somewhat premature.

When Pope Leo X died in 1521, there were a total of 2,150 saleable offices to be accounted for, 1,213 more than when he was elected. But all the funds raised didn't even go into the papal treasury. A considerable share was siphoned off by the princes and bankers.¹⁶ Prostitutes helped to entertain cardinals and other papal guests at licentious banquets of the greatest extravagance.¹⁷ In a scathing attack on papal morality at the closing session of the Fifth Lateran Council in March 1517, Gianfrancesco Pico called for reform and a new morality so that the clergy would provide clothes for the naked rather than costly trappings for their mules, stop spreading gold and purple in their dwellings while their churches looked like hovels and stop decorating their concubines with expensive jewelry. It was, he said, the Pope's responsibility to stem the luxury, ambition, greed, self-indulgence and corruption of the clergy, to demand restitution for squandered property, prevent the accumulation of a multiplicity of high offices by men not even worthy of the office of deacon and restore the rule of virtue.¹⁸

Even while the council was still convoked Leo was handing out offices to children. In one case a canonry was to become effective when a boy reached the age of eight and Prince Alfonso of Portugal was approved for the office of either bishop or archbishop at the age of fifteen even though the council had set twenty seven as the minimum age for such offices. Leo released Wilhelm von Enckenvoirt from the council's decree against pluralities almost before the ink was dry¹⁹ and then we find his key deal with Prince Albert of Mainz and Magdeburg had also been made in 1516, before the final session of the council. However the determination with which he was going to oppose any serious reform was signaled in July 1517, just four months after he had closed the council against strong opposition from the Emperor and reform-minded clergy. In one fell swoop, so that he could retain firm control, he more than doubled the College of Cardinals by adding thirty one of his buddies to the twenty four existing members.²⁰ Perhaps by now we should not be surprised at all this. Leo X had been born into it all in 1475 as Giovanni de Medici. His sister married one of the two illegitimate sons of Pope Innocent VIII and in the fourth year of Innocent's papacy Giovanni was made a cardinal at the age of 13. But he had to wait his turn until he was 38 to claim his papal crown with such enthusiasm.

HERESY?

Fortunately disenchantment with the papacy had already reached the point among central Europe's nobility that enforcement of the Inquisition and heresy hunting were beginning to lose their attraction. Actually the concept of heresy as it came to be applied by the church is totally insupportable if human life and dignity are seen to have any value. It entrenches an established view, it implies absolute correctness and authority in the persons or institutions who happen to control the decision making process, it violates every human right, dignity and democratic freedom, and it imposes untenable restrictions on human thinking, especially in matters of philosophy and religion. As a consequence it also imposes untenable restrictions on total human development. It is as base and debasing as the purpose for which it was devised way back at Nicaea: to serve as an instrument in the hands of Emperor Theodosius and the Trinitarian manipulators.

In fact, the early church adapted the concept of heresy to suit its self-understanding. The term is derived from a Greek expression meaning an act of choosing between alternative philosophical principles or points of view and it was in this sense that it was used within the early Christian communities as they formed around the apostles. It did not come to be used in a critical or derogatory sense to describe a variation from a generally accepted, or standardized or 'orthodox' view for probably two or three generations, when the 'letters' were being circulated.²¹ Then, because the dominant leaders of the Christian communities felt it necessary to institutionalize and to determine an orthodox teaching position, the term became used in a judgemental sense to define what was acceptable and what was not. It appears from works by Irenaeus (c. 130 – c. 200), Against Heresies, that the concepts of orthodoxy and heresy were established at the time that he was writing, although his work probably did much to consolidate them.²² Finally heresy was enshrined in Roman law to define a destabilizing and treasonable crime which justified the death penalty when the church became enmeshed in the political plots to ensure imperial stability through religious conformity at the time of the Council of Nicaea, 325. In an exercise in ghastly distortion of Christian teaching a couple of Jesus' parables were even used to help describe the crime and justify the punishment. They are the parable of the dandelion, Matthew 13: 24–30 and 36–43, and the parable of the good and bad fish, Matthew 13: 47–50.²³

By definition there can be no 'heresy' without a position of 'orthodoxy'.²⁴ If a statement of belief is to be declared a 'heresy' then it follows that there must be an officially accepted or 'orthodox' statement with which to compare and contrast it, plus an acceptable and understandable explanation of why one is right and one is so wrong. As we have seen, in the major question of the relationship between God the Father and Christ the Son the church's orthodoxy was not spontaneous and it has never been static. It was adopted after a long period of debate and contention and depended very much on those who accepted Paul's minority view gaining a dominant position. If circumstances had been different, if Jerusalem had not been sacked and its population dispersed in the early years of the Christian era, it is very likely that the Judaeo-Christian view would have prevailed and become the orthodox view. In any case, as we have seen, the process has been so fluid that sometimes, when a fanciful new idea has been dogmatized and has become accepted as part of the orthodox position the result has been either the rejection of orthodoxy in favor of the establishment of new sects or denominations by those so inclined, or further tinkering with the orthodox view to plug up the leaks and to accommodate still further variations.

It is inevitable that when the process of defining orthodoxy in a system of beliefs has begun the process is never ending and the number of definitions or determinations which must be made increases. In some cases the process of adopting and adapting an orthodox position has been quite drawn out. For example, among the wide range of controversial ideas which Origen expounded in the third century, were his ideas on the possibility of obtaining 'perfection', or release from sins, after death. He was deposed from his teaching post, exiled, then arrested, imprisoned and tortured for somewhat less controversial ideas than these, but his ideas on personal fate after death gave rise to the concept of purgatory which gradually became a general assumption in church teaching from then on, but it was not formalized as part of the church's dogmatic teaching until the sixth century.²⁵ The church then laid gradually more emphasis on it for several hundred years until it became subject to such varied interpretation and open abuse in the fifteen and sixteenth centuries that it was a major trigger of the Reformation. Thus, as already noted, one error or misconception, once adopted, must compound the pattern of existing doctrinal statements (whether they already involve errors or misconceptions or not) and future responses by individuals or groups.

On many occasions subtle differences in interpretation have led to horrific rows and a plentiful supply of nominees for the living-funeral pyres of the heresy stakes. On other occasions what has been an heretical view in one era has become an acceptable or orthodox view in another, even after some of its earlier proponents have paid for the change in advance with their lives, and vice versa. The fate of the Dominican prior Girolamo Savonarola, illustrates this. He was forbidden to preach in 1495, excommunicated in 1497, arrested and thrown into the dungeon on April 8, 1498, subjected to "torture, interrogations without pause, lying prosecutors, and falsified minutes" until it all led to his conviction as a "heretic, schismatic, and scorner of the Holy See" and his judicial murder on the pyre some seven weeks later, on May 23rd. However the Dominicans now regard him as a saint and not a heretic, and began pressing for his beatification in 1955.²⁶

In another instance, Clement of Alexandria, head of the city's Christian catechetical school prior to Origen, accepted some of the teachings of the Gnostics which had already been condemned by the dominant churchman of the late second century. The Gnostics' aim was to develop an understandable Christian philosophy and a system to live by. In his own writing Clement incorporated some of the Gnostic beliefs as well as ideas from the Greek philosophers whom he regarded as forerunners of Christianity. He taught that truth is truth wherever it is found and it is everywhere the word of God. Christ, he said, was essentially a teacher and a revealer who came to lead men, through wisdom, to become Sons of God and the Word was manifest anew in Christ. He rejected the idea of teaching authority passing through a line of bishops by divine succession, and wrote that “after the resurrection, the Lord delivered the Gnosis to James the Just and to John and Peter; they delivered it to the other apostles.” Unlike Origen he was not attacked during his lifetime for these views and from his death until the eighteenth century he was acknowledged as a saint. However when his writings were drawn to the attention of Benedict XIV, pope from 1740–1758, his name was struck from the catalogue of saints.²⁷ Fortunately today a heresy trial can lead to no greater penalties than the loss of a teaching or pastoral position, de-frocking, or excommunication.

This chequered history makes it clear that the concept of heresy – a mechanism to ensure absolute acceptance of, and obedience to, a set of principles and rules – could, at best, be justified as a test for continuing membership of a narrow sectarian institution. When it is used by the church: in its ordinary form it contradicts the Good News of the Gospel; but, at its worst, when it is imposed with the threat or the use of corporal or capital punishment or genocide, it inhibits mankind’s search for, and progress towards, an understanding of his relationship with God. And yet many Christian churches still have constitutional provision for proceedings to be taken against members in cases of heresy or breaches of doctrine. In spite of a period of relatively free thinking within the Catholic Church since World War II, the idea that “the obstinate denial or doubt, after baptism, of a truth which must be believed by divine and catholic faith”²⁸ is an offence punishable with greater severity than the sort of gross misconduct and abuse of human rights on which the pre-Reformation church built its empires is still one of the gutters in which the church’s spurious self-assessment continues to flow. The things which are to be believed by divine and catholic faith include “the word of God as it has been written or handed down by tradition, that is, in the single deposit of faith entrusted to the church, and which are at the same time proposed as divinely revealed either by the solemn magisterium of the church, or by its ordinary and universal magisterium, which is manifested by the common adherence of Christ’s faithful under the guidance of the sacred magisterium (and) All are therefore bound to shun any contrary doctrines.”²⁹

Now, four important points. First: the ordinary person in the street or the church pew seldom gets closer to the solemn magisterium (teaching authority) of the church than his or her parish priest. Second: traditional beliefs have resulted from the interaction of fact, syncretism, myth, assumption and misunderstanding of fact, all compounded by error during the development and passing on of those beliefs. Third: the distinction between the word of God, developed tradition, and what the church proposes as divinely revealed truth is so blurred that the faithful are left to assume that they each have the same status. Fourth: according to Canon number 749, “infallibility in teaching” embraces not only the Pope of the day, and the College of Bishops meeting as an Ecumenical Council, but likewise, “the Bishops, dispersed throughout the world maintaining the bond of union among themselves and with the successor of Peter, together with the same Roman Pontiff authentically teach matters of faith and morals, and are agreed that a particular teaching is definitely to be held.”

CANON LAW SAYS ...

Therefore, at the stroke of a papal pen on January 25, 1983, when Pope John Paul II promulgated the new Code of Canon Law, and ratified the work of the Pontifical Commission which had prepared it (based on the decisions of the Second Vatican Council) he perpetuated the incredible impost that the world's Catholic Christians must accept and defend a range of competing statements which have been at the centre of heresy controversies for centuries, many of which are insupportable in terms of current knowledge and rational understanding. At least, late in the twentieth century, the church has added a clause to canon 747 that "No doctrine is understood to be infallibly defined unless this is manifestly demonstrated," although it retains for itself the authority to decide whether something has been 'manifestly demonstrated.' And it has also taken a step forward with the long overdue clause added to canon 748 that "It is never lawful for anyone to force others to embrace the catholic faith against their conscience." However that canon loses a bit of its lustre through the use of the expression that once a person has found "the truth in the matters which concern God and his Church ... then by divine law they are bound, and they have the right, to embrace and keep it."

The obligation to accept, to maintain and to defend particular ideas imposed with the coercive threat of sanctions could have been justified only if the role which the church adopted was absolutely proper and if its conduct was impeccable. However if the church had met those criteria the very idea and the need for disciplinary measures would have been self-eliminating anyway. It follows that those who have pursued a policy and a program of heresy hunting backed up by a system of corporal and capital punishment at any stage since the beginning of the Christian Era must be regarded as at least as depraved as the church claims those responsible for the crucifixion of Christ to be. Furthermore, for a church to retain the punitive concept of heresy is no different to a political party retaining the right to discipline members for breaking ranks in matters of political philosophy whether of the left (Communism) or of the right (Fascism).

In modern times the church has argued that in spite of its admitted corruption it had a unifying influence right across Europe during the Middle Ages and there is no point in denying it. However any police state operation has a temporary unifying influence, especially if it eliminates all opposition and any thinkers as ruthlessly as the church did, but the costs are immense through the destruction of human spirit and retardation of personal and community development. A unifying influence on its own is therefore nothing to be proud of, nor is it a suitable criterion by which to assess the church. What is debatable is whether the church was, firstly, any more of a unifying force and, secondly, as uplifting and as fruitful in human terms as any alternative which may have been available during the Middle Ages. When we compare it with Arian Christianity, Judaism in the Khazar Khanate and Islam in Spain the comparison is indeed odious for the mainstream church.

The same comparison favours Buddhism and also Confucianism, at least until it was declared China's state religion with worship of Confucius thrown in for good measure. It then also became an instrument in the hands of politically and socially conservative forces. Even the religion of the Aztecs was unifying although certainly not uplifting. However, the web which the church had spun around itself was such that a completely new beginning was just not a real possibility. The reformers themselves were products of the institutional church, encouraged into it by virtue of the role which it promoted for itself and their acceptance of that role, trained by it and unable to stand off and view it dispassionately. Their only contact with the other partners in the triangle was in the context which the church was hell-bent on perpetuating: competition, opposition and denigration. In addition, the Turkish Muslim pressure against central Europe, through Hungary, was very effective in pushing the church and the princes together against the perceived common enemy which was at once religious and political, like the church itself.

REFORM REQUIRES A POWER BASE

Without a power base the Reformation could not have got off the ground. The long and impressive tradition of the church, its methods of indoctrination, the lack of any ordinary contact with the other partners in the triangle and the aura of mystique and authority which pervaded the church all helped to hold the people in awe of it and reluctant to move against it. All that the people wanted was spiritual guidance along the promised path to salvation. In the circumstances it was to the princes that the reformers had to turn for a power base and as they were so intimately intertwined with the church hierarchy the appeal to them had to be at least as much political and social as theological. Everyone – the reformers, the princes, the ordinary people and the church hierarchy – were all subject to a range of pressures in an environment which was changing more rapidly than during any previous period in history, but they were not in a position to understand the significance of those pressures nor the fact that the church was a factor, usually in a negative sense, in shaping them. The pressures included economic and social change with swirling population dynamics; the rise of mysticism (the search for direct personal contact with divine beings); nominalism (the simplifying of complex concepts into individual issues and the denial of the plurality of God, especially in the Trinitarian sense which required “faith” or unquestioning acceptance of the statements of an authority such as the church); humanism and natural science. Humanism was seen as more or less a reversion to the philosophy of the Greek classical period, but it was in reality an attempt to re-order the philosophical priorities of the time by focusing attention on the study of man as the pinnacle and centre of creation. Humanists held that man was exalted over the rest of creation by the power of his rationality, creativity and free-will. In natural science, people placed emphasis on the study of nature independent of consideration of God. Until that time nature had always been studied in the context of some over-arching religious or spiritual principle, and the new approach to nature led to a systematic approach to scientific investigation.

Another important factor as the Reformation broke was that although the church could be described as a great monolith, shaped like a pyramid with the pope perched at the pinnacle (above, below or alongside the Holy Roman Emperor, depending on which interpretation one accepted) the church was a very complex institution with practices, beliefs and attitudes which varied from one region or country to another. The issues which triggered movements for reform were therefore not the same in every case. Serious moves towards reform had begun about a hundred years before but they had all been ruthlessly suppressed and there was little communication between would-be reformers. Some of them were churchmen who reached their reforming position through a studied academic approach to the documents and practices of the church and who expected reason to prevail. Some were men who found themselves pushed or “called” into positions of leadership among small groups of dissidents whose concerns had been shaped by their local experience. Others were men whose decision to press for reform had been precipitated by a ‘religious experience’ which they attributed to divine intervention in their lives or direct interaction with the Holy Spirit.

In this sense the religious reformers as a group were no different to the great figures of history who had established, reformed or participated in earlier religious movements such as Arius, Zoroaster, Confucius, Muhammad, Mainonides or the boy Samuel. Clearly they were all marked by a streak of determination or they would never have tackled the tasks which they did, but some were more dogmatic in their belief that because of their particular religious experience or divine call, their interpretation of reform theology and practice was absolute and was not to be tampered with. To make matters worse every would-be reformer took his life in his hands, or his mouth, when he spoke out. Therefore, because there was no common starting point for reform, because there was no planned coordination of effort between the reformers, and because the church’s abuses of authority and the sacraments were so diverse, disagreement was bound to arise between leaders of the reformation over some of the key theological issues. It did.

Martin Luther and Ulrich Zwingli were opposed over the question of the Eucharist and transubstantiation.³⁰ Those two and Jean Calvin were all opposed to the Anabaptists led by Thomas Munzer, Jacob Hutter and Melchior Hoffman who maintained that baptism was a basis for fellowship among those who already believed and not a mystical ritual to be applied like Augustine’s salt to children willy-nilly. But to cap it off there were a few reformers who wanted to turn back the clock and start all over again, and dispute broke out in the reform camp over the doctrine of the Trinity. It was to end in a tragedy which shows Calvin, probably the most influential reform figure after Luther, in a most inglorious light. Similarly, Luther’s decision to support the princes in suppressing the Peasant’s Revolt does him little credit but it was possibly forced on him by the circumstances of the Reformation.

Because of their enormous influence, brief biographical sketches of those two key reformers – Luther and Calvin – will help to provide an understanding of the reformation process and its limitations before we continue with the ongoing evolution of the trouble in the triangle. But at this point, even before we look at Luther and Calvin, we must look at the broad pattern of the Reformation. The course of the Reformation was so drawn out, the politics, personal power play and religious intrigue were so confused and so different from one country to another that we can only pick out key points and we cannot consider every country, their various rebellions, civil wars and programs of organized religious persecution. As we have seen, religious conflict had swept back and forth across Europe and the church was in such a corrupt state that the Reformation could have erupted in any major centre such as Rome, Constantinople, Avignon, Moscow, Seville or Frankfurt instead of that out-of-the-way town of Wittenberg in Saxony, northern Germany.

However once it was triggered, pent up emotions and repressed ambitions were released in all directions and reform movements gathered strength in every country of the Holy Roman Empire. There was no clear pattern of cause and effect and no overall plan hatched in any one person's mind. There was a vague assumption among the reformers that reform would affect the whole church, world wide, but monolith or not, the Vatican was not interested in coordinated reform of any type – world-wide or isolated. This attitude of total resistance fueled the tendency towards the establishment of national churches because it meant that there had to be local trigger points before any reform would take place, irrespective of the fact that the princes and politicians generally favoured national churches so that they could exercise control, regardless of what the ordinary people may have wanted.

In Saxony the trigger was religious, as we have seen, but the movement quickly became a mixture of religion and politics. In France, Holland and Scotland the pattern was somewhat the same. In Denmark and Sweden the Reformation has been described as “more a political revolution with religious consequences than a religious revolution with political consequences”.³¹ But in England where papal influence had been relatively less overpowering³² in spite of situations such as the vassalage of King John, (see above chapter 9, p. 2R), the Reformation was primarily political and had its origins in the personal affairs of the king, Henry VIII, of many wives fame. In fact Henry's affairs of the heart affected affairs of the church and state in Europe as well as in England. His first wife, Catherine of Aragon, daughter of Ferdinand and Isabella of Spain, whom he wanted to divorce, had already been contracted in marriage to his elder brother Arthur who died before assuming the throne.³³ To enable him, as heir to the throne (his father Henry VII was still on it) to marry Catherine when he assumed the throne, Henry sought and was granted a papal dispensation by Pope Julius II, the ostentatious and worldly Giuliano della Rovere, a nephew of Pope Sixtus IV (who included him in the college of Cardinals at an early age), whose main interest was enlarging and beautifying Rome and the papal states and winning glory for himself by the use of simony, politics and force.³⁴ To enable him, as king, to divorce Catherine in order to marry Anne Boleyn in the hope that she might bear him a male heir to the throne, even though there was already a female heir from his first marriage, quite naturally also required a papal dispensation. Working through his Lord Chancellor cum much-favoured cardinal, Thomas Wolsey, Henry sought a papal dispensation on the grounds that the first dispensation was not valid and therefore, on the basis of canon law, he had not actually been married to Catherine at all. Perhaps on the basis of the personal conduct of the popes of the era he had a case. Conduct which was acceptable for a pope should surely have been good enough for a mere king. However either Wolsey or Pope Clement VII, or both were loathe to arrange a dispensation. Their official reasoning may have been based on church doctrine but there is no doubt that it had more to do with politics and personal relationships.

Emperor Charles V was a nephew of Catherine. In the early stages of the Lutheran controversy Charles had backed the pope – naturally, because he was head of the Holy Roman Empire – and sought to haul the reform princes into line. But Charles owed his position to the princes, many of whom he had bribed, and they had to stand together against the threat from the Muslims, so he progressively moved to a position of compromise which the pope had to accept for fear of pushing him all the way into the reformers' camp.³⁵ For the same reason, fear of pushing Charles into the reform camp, the pope could not annul his aunt's marriage to the king of England. But in addition the church's self-understanding and the issue of papal infallibility, which Luther and other reformers were vigorously denying, would have come under even closer scrutiny if the reigning pope either used the excuse, or admitted, that one of his recent predecessors had made a serious error of judgement in a matter of doctrine.

In 1521 Henry wrote a response to Luther's *The Pagan Servitude of the Church*³⁶ which earned him and his successors on the English throne the title 'Defender of the Faith'. It therefore appears that during the early years of his reign he had no interest in going over to the reformers. Or were he and the pope, Leo X (Giovanni de' Medici), simply currying each other's favor in 1521, one to obtain his dispensation and the other to avoid a split? In 1527, when he was still pressing for an annulment, the pope at that time, Clement VII (Giulio, another member of the de' Medici family of popes), agreed to a canonical trial to decide the preliminary issue of the consummation of Catherine's marriage to Arthur. That was possibly one aspect of a loose alliance between the pope, Henry VIII and Francis I which, it was thought, would prevent Charles from totally dominating Europe. However Charles then intervened to break that alliance and to uphold his aunt's honour and, regardless of the fact that as titular head of the Holy Roman Empire he was supposed to be the pope's chief defender, his troops in Milan marched on Rome and, stung by the fact that they were not being paid, pillaged the city. The pope was forced into virtual captive refuge, then surrendered and suffered harsh imprisonment for six months. Charles insisted that the canonical trial be held in Rome. Henry responded by dismissing Wolsey, summoning parliament in 1529 and the Convocation of the Clergy in 1530 and again in 1532. He secured, over a period of three years, recognition of himself and his successors as the head of the church in England, agreement that the convocation would submit all existing and proposed canon laws to a committee appointed by him, the annulment of his marriage to Catherine, the crowning of his new wife Anne Boleyn as (very temporary) queen, the transfer of all payments and legal rights from the pope to the crown and, finally, in 1534, the Act of Supremacy declaring the king to be the supreme head of the Church of England.

The birth of the Church of England proved a moderately bloody affair just like a minor event in the Inquisition and the birth of the Reformed Church in Europe. Anne Boleyn was beheaded after three years as queen, for adultery. The message was: the king can be an adulterer, but not the queen. Wolsey 'died' on his way to his trial for high treason, and Sir Thomas More, Bishop John Fisher of Rochester and a number of lesser clergy were beheaded for refusing to swear allegiance to the royal supremacy. Of course that was only the birth pangs. The Church in England fared no better than the church in Europe with a very rough passage for the next two generations, including: gross misdirection of resources by the crown and a well orchestrated backlash from the displaced clergy when the monasteries were compulsorily closed; confusion and conflict when Henry tried to retain the Roman liturgy in his reorganized church; and forced, repressive reversion to Roman Catholicism for five years under Queen Mary Tudor. But so much for Henry's anti-papal reorganization of the church in England. Now for a closer look at the two key reformers, Luther and Calvin.

Martin Luther was born in 1483, 26 years before Calvin, and he was the undisputed father figure of the Reformation in Germany by the time that Calvin became involved in the movement in France and Switzerland. However, although they shared a major common aim to reform or replace the papacy, and Calvin was well versed in Luther's work, they had been influenced by different circumstances and responded to different issues, and Calvin did not adopt much of Luther's theology nor his approach to church structure. (Nor, for that matter, did he adopt much of the work of previous reformers in Switzerland.) As a consequence, the two major divisions of the Reformation Church which grew out of their work were significantly different and were in competition with each other, as well as with the Church of Rome, as they and their associate churches evangelized around the world. According to their own writings they were both influenced by religious experiences and both believed that they were called through divine intervention to reform the Catholic Church, but from that point their self understandings diverged.

LUTHER: A MATTER OF DEEP CONVICTION ...

With great humility Luther wrote a preface to his Latin writings in 1545, only a year before his death, to explain why he had not wanted his consolidated writings published. He wrote that: "At first I was all alone and certainly very inept and unskilled in conducting such great affairs. For I got into these turmoils by accident and not by will or intention." ... "I did not want the labours of the ancients to be buried by my new works and the reader kept from reading them. Then, too, by God's grace a great many systematic books now exist ... with which a theologian and a bishop can be beautifully and abundantly prepared to be mighty in preaching the doctrine of piety, especially since the Holy Bible itself can now be had in nearly every language. But my books, as it happened, yes, as the lack of order in which the events transpired made it necessary, are accordingly crude and disordered chaos, which is now not easy to arrange even for me. Persuaded by these reasons, I wished that all my books were buried in perpetual oblivion, so that there might be room for better ones. ..." ³⁷ Clearly, reform was to come before personal authority and pride. Luther saw himself simply as an instrument of God's will.

In sharp contrast, an incident in 1546 in which a member of the Little Council of Geneva dared to attack Calvin as "nothing but a wicked man, a Picard who was preaching false doctrine," shows a very different self-understanding on Calvin's part. He so completely identified his own ministry with the will of God that instead of passing the insult off with contempt he declared that he would not preach again until the magistrates imposed sufficient reparation, whereupon they re-heard the case and imposed humiliating penalties on the poor man which caused concern among the citizens.³⁸ Calvin continued to dominate the clergy and the civil authorities of Geneva in that manner and six years later, in 1552, when a controversy over his teaching on predestination and the authority to impose excommunication was at its climax, he declared that he would rather be discharged from his office than have to bear the opposition he was encountering. Addressing the Magistracy in an indictment of his opponent he stated: "As for myself, noble seigneurs, being assured in my conscience that what I have taught and written did not grow in my brain, but that I hold it from God, I must maintain the same, if I do not wish to be a traitor to the truth, for which I think I have already answered enough." In effect Calvin was not debating the theology of predestination but claiming to be the absolute interpreter of God's will by divine authority. The ministers of Geneva had little option than to support Calvin's teaching and the Council buckled under his onslaught. A commission set up to finalize the matter declared "the said book of the Institutes (written by Calvin) to be well and saintly made, and its teaching to be the holy doctrine of God, and that they regard it as good and true ministry for this city; and that, now and in the future, no one may dare to speak against the said book, nor against the said doctrine."³⁹

The extremely restricted nature of the reformation over which Calvin was presiding is illustrated by the way in which, using the methods of the Inquisition, he was able to impose his personal will with such arrogance and intolerance on the young Protestant Church in Geneva. He demanded, and was credited with, at least the same level of divinely ordained infallibility which the papacy had claimed and which the balance of the reform movement was eagerly trying to dismantle. But back to some basic biography of the two great reformers.

Martin Luther's father, Hans, was a peasant who found a niche in the copper mining industry and became prosperous. His mother came from a family of some social standing. The family moved from Saxony to Mansfield while Martin was a child and his schooling began there. At age 14, in 1497, the year that Manoel's agents were dragging thousands of Jewish children screaming to the baptismal founts of Portugal, he was enrolled at the cathedral school in Magdeberg. He entered the University of Erburg at age 18, gained his bachelor of arts degree followed by his master's degree at the minimum age permitted, 22 years, then began to study law. But midway through 1505 he was almost killed by a lightning strike while returning to university and, somewhat traumatised by the experience, he invoked the name of St. Anne and vowed to enter a monastery and devote his life to the church. He entered the Augustinian Monastery at Erfurt, his personal choice, against his father's wishes. He was ordained a priest in 1507 and Hans, having become resigned to the fact of his son's decision to enter the church, attended the first mass which Martin said, even though he was certainly not completely at ease with his decision to enter the church. Martin's superior, Johann Staupitz, encouraged him to undertake further study in theology and he received his degree in Biblical Studies from the University of Wittenberg, aged 26, in 1509 the year that Jean Calvin was born at Noyon in France.

Luther continued his studies and was awarded his doctorate in 1512. In the meantime he had been required to teach Biblical studies, and although he seems to have been uncertain of himself at times, Staupitz nurtured him and selected him to be his successor as professor of Biblical Studies. In 1515 he was also given responsibility for the oversight of several Augustinian monasteries. In 1510 he had been sent to Rome as a member of a delegation to plead the cause of the Erfurt Monastery in a dispute over jurisdiction. That visit, and in particular the opulence of the Vatican, left a strong impression on him and a few years later, after what is referred to as ‘the Tower Experience’ he became aware of a new understanding of the Gospels and of faith. He developed a deep awareness of the grace and righteousness of God in a sense which the church had not previously recognized, and he began to preach that a person is saved by faith alone, not works. As a consequence of that belief he denied that the church or the priesthood had any role or authority as mediators between God and mankind. It was his preaching on that matter which prompted some one to send him a copy of Tetzell’s instructions on indulgences in 1517 and which provided the basis for his Ninety five theses.

... AND THE BACKING OF PRINCES

At that point the importance of the support which Luther received from some of the princes becomes apparent. The Archbishop of Mainz initiated ‘an examination of Luther’s orthodoxy’ – the first move towards a heresy trial – and he was summoned to Rome but the Elector of Saxony insisted that any examination take place in Ausburg. Luther refused to withdraw what he had written and, fearing for his life, fled back to Wittenberg. However his confidence received a boost the following year, 1518, by the direction from Johann Staupitz that he should further develop his ideas in his Heidelberg Theses for a debate at the annual Chapter meeting, and by the support which he received from members of the chapter. In 1519 he extended his reasoning somewhat further, denied the primacy of the pope⁴⁰ and questioned the authority of church councils in relation to the interpretation of scripture, then, as he gained more recognition and authority he wrote a series of papers, three of which, published in 1520, are known as ‘The Reformation Treatises’. In the first, An Appeal to the Ruling Class of German Nationality, he invited the German princes to take steps to reform the church themselves. The second, The Pagan Servitude of the Church, concerned the concept of transubstantiation and the denial of communion in both kinds to the laity. And in the third, The Freedom of a Christian, he expanded on his belief that faith frees Christians from the obligation to do good works. From that point on, regardless of Luther’s fate, the emergence of a reformed church was inevitable, partly because of the increased support from the princes which followed Duke Frederick’s installation as Deputy pending the election of Charles as successor to Maximilian.

Princes or no princes, the church had had enough. Luther was censured and in June 1520 his works were condemned in the bull Exsurge Domine. The following January he was excommunicated but he was given one more chance to recant at the Diet of Worms in April. He refused and was rescued by being taken into safe custody at Wartburg.⁴¹ When it appeared safe he returned to Wittenberg the next year, 1522, largely in an effort to stop the destruction of alters which was occurring as people vented their anger against the papacy, but he also set out his views on ecclesiastical reform, discontinued the conduct of private masses, confession and fasts in the city, declared that the Monastic life was no higher calling than others, ended the requirement for celibacy, and discarded his clerical dress. The impact of that declaration was prompt and enormous. The monastic system across Germany collapsed as monks, nuns and others in service deserted their monasteries to return to civilian life, and the church and the reformers struggled to cope with the tasks of counselling and resettling large numbers of former religious, and re-stating their understanding of religious vocation. A very significant sidelight was that in 1524 Luther married one of the former nuns who had deserted her post. However, regrettably, some of the displaced clerics interpreted the new freedom of a Christian in a way which Luther did not anticipate and urged the peasants to seek greater freedom from their economic distress by violent means through the Peasants' Revolt. With the support of some townspeople and knights they circulated Twelve Articles demanding, among other things, the abolition of serfdom and certain taxes and the right to elect their own pastors. Luther's dependence on the support of the princes to press on with the Reformation then put him in an invidious position. He was conscious of his own family's peasant origins, he was in sympathy with them and he tried to mediate between the peasants and the landlords, but he was antagonized by the brutality which some of the rebels resorted to and he knew that he owed his own survival and the Reformation to the princes. He therefore sided with the princes and in 1525 he published a pamphlet calling for the extermination of the rebels. The rebellion was then put down ruthlessly.

NATIONAL CHURCHES AND DIVISIONS

At this point the parent Church of Rome seems to have recognized that the formation of reformed churches could not be prevented, even if it still hoped to suppress them, and in 1526 the Diet of Speyer caught up with history and established the right under canon law of the princes to establish national churches. No doubt Rome's expectation was that offering the princes legitimacy in what they were doing would encourage some of them to retain their links with Rome rather than establishing totally independent organizations and that, in either case, there would be sufficient goodwill to enable military alliances to be maintained against the heinous Muslim Infidels. Perhaps the power brokers of the Vatican also thought that they might be able to quarantine the movement for reform and restrict it to Germany, but if they did they were too late. The movement had already taken root in other countries. However the circumstances in each country were different and the stimulus was not necessarily the same, so the reformers and theologians each did their own thing and even if they had read the works of Luther, his colleagues and some of the earlier would-be-reformers who had already graced the stakes, they produced their own proposals for church structure and their own theology and doctrines, framed within their particular local community and political situations. Thus the reformation was fragmented and uncoordinated and, partly as a consequence of the Vatican's devious manipulation as well, disagreements developed between the reformers.

Even with the best will and intentions the pattern of the reformed church was therefore bound to resemble the pattern of the parent church, Judaism, Islam and other major religious movements: regional or ethnic orientation with doctrinal differences. A conference, known as the Colloquy of Marburg, was arranged by the Landgrave, Philip of Hesse, in 1529 in an effort to develop unity, or at least closer coordination, between the German and Swiss reformers and to overcome some of the disagreements. Luther was accompanied by his Wittenberg colleague Professor Philipp Melanchthon (Schwarzerd) and the Swiss party included the founder of the Swiss Reform Movement, Ulrich Zwingli, John Oecolampadius, a German preacher who had reluctantly become involved in the Reformed Church in Basle in 1522, and Martin Bucer, also a German, who had adopted Lutheranism in 1523, was excommunicated, moved to Switzerland and became the leader of the Swiss Reformed Churches after Zwingli was killed in a battle between the Protestants of Zurich and the Catholic cantons only two years after the colloquy.

The group reached agreement on 14 of the 15 points listed for discussion but Zwingli and Luther could not agree on the remaining one: the nature of the Eucharist. Luther 'dug his heels in' over the words "This is my body", saying he was not prepared to argue over whether Jesus was using the word 'is' in a symbolic or an absolute sense.⁴² While he rejected the Roman concept of transubstantiation he could not bring himself to accept Zwingli's view that the use of bread in the Eucharist was to symbolize Christ's bodily sacrifice. The German Lutheran group of churches and the Swiss Reformed Church therefore went their own ways and the following year, 1530, the Lutheran Confession of faith was adopted by the Diet of Augsburg and presented to Emperor Charles V. There was widespread support for Zwingli's interpretation of the Eucharist but Luther would neither adopt that Zwinglian view in order to secure the Reformation nor agree to any further theological accommodation with Rome to settle the dispute. In the short term he therefore had to turn increasingly to the civil authorities and the princes – to call up favours in a sense after he had helped them to suppress the Peasants' Rebellion – in order to gain doctrinal unity. In the long term his decision to reject Zwingli's interpretation was one of the great tragedies of the Reformation. Little had changed since the days of Constantine. People looked for political stability through theological conformity.

CALVIN: A YOUTH OF PRIVILEGE AND TENSION

At the time of the Marburg Colloquy Jean Calvin was still a more or less faithful Roman Catholic, vacillating between the study of theology and law, financed by appointments under two benefices, one as a chaplain and one as a curate, which had been arranged by his father, Gerard, from his position of privilege within the church. Gerard Calvin (or Cauvin), who is said to have been an artisan or a boatman as a young man, was probably born about 1460 because he is reported to have been appointed as one of the town's registrars in 1481. This means that he was close to 50 when Jean was born the second son in a family of four sons and two daughters.

He had progressed as a public and church official of moderate importance, becoming solicitor to the episcopal offices, a fiscal agent, secretary to the bishop, and finally procurator to the cathedral chapter, and he enjoyed the distinction of being appointed a citizen. He is thought to have married Jeanne Lefranc, a young bourgeoisie, about 1498 when he must have been close to 40 and after mothering six children she died while Jean was still a child.

Jean attended the college of the Capettes in Noyon for a few years, then when he was twelve, in the year that Luther was excommunicated, he was appointed to the first of the two benefices from which his continued study appears to have been funded: a chaplaincy at the Cathedral of Noyon. When he was fourteen he was sent to Paris to school in company with three young men from the extended family of the local ruler, Charles de Hangest, and the next few years had a strong influence in the development of his aristocratic bearing and his view of the role of the crown in religious affairs. On arriving in Paris, Calvin was tutored privately at first before attending the very progressive College de la Marche for a short time and then the terrifying and ultra-orthodox College de Montaigu which was the centre of anti-Lutheran teaching.

It is said that his father harboured strong ambitions for all his children but especially for Jean who he hoped would enter the clergy. Whether that hope came before the negotiation of the benefices and was a part of the bargaining process on the part of his father, or whether the benefices led to the hope is uncertain. Similarly it is not known what commitments Gerard had to enter into with the bishop and/or the chapter to procure those benefices, but two things are certain. First: the benefices entailed some form of direct personal obligations for Gerard and indirect or moral obligations for Jean, either to his father or to the bishop. Second: because of that 'special relationship' between his father, himself and the church Jean would have carried certain preconceptions about the church when he finally reached the point of entering the clergy. His elder brother also became a priest, before he did. Jean's appointment to a second and concurrent benefice, a curacy at a parish church, was arranged while he was studying philosophy and theology, still at the College de Montaigu, aged eighteen, in 1527, one year before he completed his Master of Arts degree. Then problems soon began to surface.

In his capacity as an official of the cathedral chapter, Gerard Calvin was responsible for the winding up of an estate. His management came under scrutiny and when he was not able to satisfactorily account for the proceeds of the estate he came under attack from the chapter and was subsequently excommunicated. At the point of the attack against his father, Jean Calvin resigned the first of his benefices, the chaplaincy in Noyon, but retained the curacy elsewhere, and in 1529 he undertook studies in law, first at the University of Orleans but later in the year at Bourges. In his own explanation of that change he later wrote that from his childhood his father had intended him for theology but later, considering that the study of law "commonly enriched those who followed it", he incontinently changed his mind and "I was withdrawn from the study of philosophy and put to the study of the law, to which I strove to devote myself faithfully in obedience to my father (until) God, in his hidden providence, at last made me turn in another direction." However one of Calvin's biographers (and a family connection), A. Lefranc, wrote that as a result of Gerard's dispute with the chapter he "caused his son to abandon theology because he was no longer assured of the support of the church dignitaries of Noyon, upon whom he had been counting to provide Jean with a first-class appointment.”⁴³ When Gerard fell ill in 1531, Jean left Bourges in haste and teamed with his elder brother Charles, the priest, and argued a case with the chapter in a bid to have their father’s excommunication reversed before he died. They failed, and Charles was also excommunicated. For reasons unexplained Calvin resumed his chaplaincy benefice and returned to Paris to study humanist philosophy, freedom of action, and Hebrew and Hellenic studies, at a different centre. Then, after seeing his first book (on Humanism) published with a very mixed response, Jean again changed direction and returned to Orleans in 1532 to complete his law degree.

Regardless of the conclusions which may be drawn from the evidence of his father’s conduct, his inconsistent approach to his personal benefices, and the bitter row between him, Charles and the chapter, Jean Calvin maintained that throughout that period he had been “obstinately addicted to the superstitions of the papacy”⁴⁴ and that his conversion was a spontaneous reaction to a religious experience some time in 1533. He had attended a session of the general chapter at Noyon on August 23 at which a procession against the plague had been arranged but he does not appear to have taken a reform stand at that meeting. However after being associated with a pro-reform sermon by his friend and university rector Nicolas Cop on All Saints’ Day, November 1, he went into hiding and was associated with the reform movement from then on. In May 1534 he surrendered both of his ecclesiastical benefices and his open association with the reform movement soon made it dangerous for him to stay in France. He chose Basle, Switzerland, as the centre at which to study and write.

MUNICIPAL SUPPORT FOR RIGID INSTITUTES

In between visits to Basle, Italy, Paris and Geneva, Calvin worked on The Institutes of the Christian Religion in 1535, at the age of 26, and it was ready for the printer in 1536. At the same time, and with an imperious touch of ‘holier than thou’ he began to attack the ‘Nicodemites’ or waverers among the clergy who favoured reform but retained their links with Rome to avoid the loss of ecclesiastical benefices. He then set out for Strasbourg to link up with reformers there, but he had to travel via Geneva to avoid the war between Francis I and the Emperor, Charles V, and while he was there he was invited by Guillaume Farel to stay as Reader in Holy Scripture and to assist with the organization of the Reformed Church. The citizens of Geneva had recently asserted their independence from the Catholic Duke of Savoy and many were eager to join the reformers. He was also asked to assist in sorting out some problems in Lausanne. He began working on a plan for a completely new church organization, the main elements of which were: membership of the church for the laity based on recognized adherence to its rules; a confession of faith which would be obligatory for everyone who wished to remain in the city; the power of excommunication to be wielded by the church consistory; the singing of psalms in the order of worship; education in a catechism as a requirement for membership; and rigid ordinances of marriage. However when the articles were adopted by the City Magistrates in March 1537, (the year that Calvin’s brother Charles died, still under excommunication), a wave of dissent swept through Geneva at the rigidity of the discipline which he was trying to impose and the retention of the power of excommunication, and this resulted in the councils of the city demanding some changes to the plan. It also led to the Catholics and other opponents of the plan mounting a campaign against Calvin and six months later they gained control of the councils at the 1538 elections.

In the meantime an opponent of some of the reforms, Caroli, identified some aspects of Calvin's Institutes and the Summary by his collaborator, Farel, as anti-Trinitarian or heretical of true Christianity and he accused them of complicity with Arianism. Recognizing the acute danger which they faced Calvin chose not to debate the issue of the Trinity but to mount a vigorous defence. However he refused to sign the creeds of the Apostles, Nicaea and Athanasius which he had been asked to do to establish his Trinitarian credentials. The dispute was referred first to arbitrators in Bern and then to the Synods of both Bern and Lausanne in May and June 1537. Although the two defendants won their case and Caroli thereupon rejected the reform movement and returned to the Catholic Church, the dispute ran on. It divided Geneva, took on other aspects, and turned into a struggle for control of the city between the civil authorities and the church. The net result was that Calvin, Farel and another minister were relieved of their posts and ordered to leave the city within three days. They made their way to Bern and were received favourably at first, but when church and state politics threatened relations between Bern, Geneva and Zurich, and raised the distinct possibility of the region reverting to Roman Catholicism, their position in Switzerland appeared untenable. Calvin went to Strasbourg where he was given responsibility for ministry to refugees, his reputation was soon restored and, among many other things, he worked towards the revised or 'Strasbourg Edition' of his Institutes of the Christian Religion which was published in 1539. It was much larger than the original, contained more theology, and was much more dogmatic in tone.

Gradually order was restored in Geneva but the organization of the Reformed Church was at risk and in October 1540 Calvin was invited to return. He did not do so until September 1541 when the authorities of Bern, Geneva, Zurich, Basle and Strasbourg had each agreed that his return was in the interests of peace and stability throughout the Republic of Geneva. Immediately he arrived he demanded the setting up of a commission of pastors and advisers, his revised Ordinances were adopted only two months after he returned and he very quickly had Geneva organized into a theocratic city-state. His victory in enforcing a system of excommunication and discipline which carried the hallmark of the Inquisition had serious consequences for the Reformed Church, suppressing freedom of theological thought just as dramatically as it had in the parent Roman Church. Life in Geneva became, for some, excessively Puritanical. Restrictions were placed on theatre performances; inns were declared strictly for travelers and local residents were banned from visiting them; and parents were censured for the use of non-Biblical names (1546). The 'Power of the Keys' was vested in the church, authorizing pastors to visit every home once a year to assess whether the ordinances were being acted on satisfactorily and to take appropriate action if they were not (1550).⁴⁵

At the level of parish church life in Geneva, the recitation of a catechism was required for membership and participation in communion, and parents were obliged to ensure that their children attended Sunday School. Although other serious issues are raised by such a system of compulsion in religious belief, especially when it is linked to a system of discipline and excommunication, these were major achievements at the time. They helped to broaden the base of lay understanding and initiative beyond the scope of the mass and the homily and to break the repressive grip which the clergy could maintain when its members could demonstrate exclusive knowledge in matters biblical and religious. A system of four ministries was introduced, with pastors, teachers, elders and deacons. Celibacy had already been rejected by the Reformed Churches and Calvin, who saw marriage basically in terms of relief from domestic chores to enable a man to concentrate on the things which mattered, had married the widow of an Anabaptist minister before his return to Geneva.

Such was his personal authority and his inability to accept personal criticism that Calvin sacked a friend, the highly regarded director of the school, over a minor theological matter about which they disagreed. He unfrocked one clergyman, humiliated many others, and one poor citizen, Gruet, who openly opposed the disciplinary power of the church consistory was tortured and then beheaded (1547), basically on Calvin's insistence. All this – and the death of Servetus – in spite of the fact that prior to his conversion Calvin is supposed to have spoken against the use of excessive force in disciplining reformers and other dissidents. Although he achieved a system of interlocking church and state authority in Geneva, Calvin had to acknowledge the superior authority of the civil magistracy and it has been suggested that the state gained more authority than he wanted to concede.⁴⁶ However, after the basic relationship had been established, Calvin accepted an invitation to help draft the civil code for councils as well.

The level of controversy and conflict during the 1540s was so great that Calvin was never out of the spotlight for very long and it is impossible to consider all of the incidents but another, concerning relations between the church consistory, the council and the magistrates, occurred in 1548 (after his supporters had lost control of the council) and Calvin feared that it could lead to his expulsion from Geneva for the second time. It did not. Council simply told him to do his duty better in future. Calvin knew that it was vital to have maximum common ground between the major reform groups if they were either to achieve recognition and security or to swing the whole church to their views. The councilors knew that too, and they also realized that in Calvin they had one of the few persons strong enough to achieve it. He therefore continued to work hard to bring the French, German and other reform groups to his particular understanding of common ground. Unfortunately the disagreement with the Lutherans over the Eucharist was so deep little progress could be made. However after years of discussions there was finally a breakthrough with the Zwinglians and in 1549 a 26-clause agreement on the sacraments known as the Consensus Tigurinus was signed.

THE TRINITY: A CHALLENGE FUMLED

Calvin remained the focal point for the powerful reform movement in Geneva and by 1555 he was also the undisputed master of the city. In that powerful position, and having shown deep-seated reservations about the divinity of Christ when he wrote some of his earlier works, even though he did not directly write against the Doctrine of the Trinity, Calvin could have grasped the real challenge of the Reformation, gone back to basics and urged the church to start all over again. However he was essentially a pragmatic reformer and at the critical time when he came under attack from Caroli he knew that the only useful reformer was a live reformer. As a result, after he had survived the attacks against him as an Arian sympathizer in 1537, Calvin moved further and further into line with the traditional Trinitarian dogma, and unquestioning, almost servile, support for it became a vital plank in his reform platform.⁴⁷

It is impossible to assess the consequences of Calvin's change of attitude towards the divinity of Christ because he cannot be considered in isolation from all the concurrent factors in Reformation Europe. However we can be sure that if the question of the Trinity had been confronted and resolved then, in the sixteenth century, we would now be looking at history from a very different perspective. As it was, the issue was consigned to the stake in good Inquisition fashion with the full support and encouragement of not only Calvin but people like Luther's right hand man, Professor Philipp Melanchthon, and the major part of the reform movement.⁴⁸

Among those calling for a thorough reconsideration of the Trinitarian issue was the physician to the archbishop of Vienna, Michael Servetus. At first he campaigned using papers published secretly because of the danger of speaking openly on the subject. Then, in order to have his major work published in 1553, (sixteen years after Calvin had survived the attacks on him and changed direction), he sought discussions with Calvin but was rebuffed, so he published that secretly too. After a copy reached Calvin certain incriminating correspondence between the two fell into wrong hands. Calvin referred the matter to the Catholic Church and this led to Servetus being arrested in Vienne, charged with heresy and condemned to burn. He escaped and planned to make his way to Italy via Geneva. However he was arrested in Geneva and clashed vigorously with Calvin. Incensed at having been dragged directly into the matter Calvin pressed for the death sentence in his most intolerant and dictatorial manner. Servetus was tried for the second time on October 26th 1553 and burned at the stake the next day. It made no difference that he was the discoverer of the mechanism of blood circulation in the body. He was a heretic. Calvin thereupon wrote his Defence of the Orthodox Faith concerning the Holy Trinity in which he not only defended his own attitude at the trial of Servetus but also the long-standing Augustinian principle of repressing heresy by the secular sword.⁴⁹

So much for Calvin's pre-conversion views and his first edition of the Institutes which got him into trouble at the hands of Caroli. It is interesting to ponder at what point the personal infallibility on which he insisted took effect! The issue then subsided for some time as the Roman Catholic Church and the reformers locked in battle over the issues which more directly concerned people and which did not involve such deep reassessment of the nature of God and the role of the church. But inevitably it came up again and a confession of faith was devised in 1558 as a means of pinpointing troublemakers. One who refused to sign it was Valentin Gentilis. He was taken before Calvin, got the message about how to stay alive, retracted his views, made an act of submission and personally burned his books. However after being released and fleeing Geneva he took up the anti Trinitarian case again. He survived for a time but after being arrested repeatedly he was finally hanged at Bern in 1566.⁵⁰

By the time the issue of the Trinity reached the stage of a major controversy again the Reformation was an established fact. Calvin had become the dominant influence in the organizing of Reformed Churches in Switzerland, France, the Low Countries, Northern Germany and Scotland. His achievements were monumental. He had played a major part in laying the foundations for both the organization and the theology of Reformed Churches around the world. He made a major contribution to the development of modern Biblical exegesis, or the explanation of texts in a contemporary setting. He lifted religious education to a completely new level for both the clergy and adherents, and a few years before he died he established an academy of theology in Geneva which catered for study at both secondary and tertiary levels. He has been described as the greatest theologian in Christendom since Augustine⁵¹ but his achievements – and those of other reformers as well – fell far short of the demands of the circumstances. The Christian church was in fragments and the Reformed fragments were in no position to offset the crises in human affairs which the parent church had thrust upon the world. They had taken some very tentative steps, but they had a long way to go.

REPRESSION PROMPTS FURTHER DIVISION

The suppression of debate on the Trinitarian issue during the critical early years of the Reformation had simply led to the establishment of additional denominations which were rejected by the mainstream denominations. Unfortunately the issue left deep scars on the reform movement which was shown to be little more humane and only a little more visionary than the pre-Reformation church. There was an unhealthy desire in some reform quarters to demonstrate that the Reform leaders could enforce “doctrinal purity” just as effectively as the pre-Reformation church and as a result hundreds of heretics and Anabaptists died at the hands of the reformers just as if they had stayed and rattled their pens and pencils inside the Roman church. Calvin believed, together with the Romans and most of the reformers, that the Christian church was the exclusive body of Christ, that as long as the reform communities each acknowledged the same Lord and protected scriptural doctrine there was nothing to prevent them uniting and assuming – or asserting – their proper role as ‘the church’.⁵² This meant that the church’s existing view of itself prevailed yet again and in those vital years of the Reformation the most important casualty was, as before, man’s ability to know God through Christ the Messiah.

POPULAR SUPPORT FOR REFORM 'UNEXPECTED'

So much for our brief biographies of Luther and Calvin.⁵³ When we look back over those critical years during which the Reformation took root and pick up the threads of the trouble in the triangle, it is apparent that when Luther was placed under a papal ban in 1518 because he refused to quietly withdraw his ninety-five theses the possibility of a major eruption in the church seemed very remote. The Vatican was so confident in its spurious self-understanding and in the amount of force which it could bring to bear that it did not expect such a minor administrative and financial matter to rock the boat for long. Leo X is said to have passed the matter off only a few months before the ban as “a monkish quarrel”.⁵⁴ The Vatican authorities were therefore surprised when the ordinary German laity flocked to support the professor in his stand against papal authority. Neither did they expect Luther’s objections to indulgences to be deflected by that papal ban into a full scale attack on the papacy but in view of the popular support for the man and the political climate of the time they were reluctant to take strong direct action against him. A public debate at Leipzig was accepted as a suitable way to defuse the issue and to bring Luther back into line. But it didn’t and the doctor of theology, whose parents had wanted him to take law after he had completed a master of arts degree rather than enter an Augustinian monastery, found himself being hailed as the leader of the anti-papal reform movement.

Public reaction and pressure had begun to shape events rather than cold official logic. Luther was cast into a role he neither sought nor wanted.⁵⁵ But he was fortunate because time was on his side. Dissent and disillusionment within the church and conflicting commercial and political interests were making it more difficult than ever for it to raise the war against the Muslims which the Lateran Council had decreed. If it was going to be able to raise that war at all, or even protect its own vital interests, the absolute minimum requirement was some sort of accord with, and between, the German princes. If the Vatican acted to get rid of Luther by the easy Inquisition method, Germany would be lost to the Roman cause and Islam would be on the rampage through central Europe, with the Ottoman Empire able to dictate its own terms.

A papal emissary, Charles von Miltitz, went to Germany with a dual purpose in January 1519. Firstly he was to bestow the papal honour of the Golden Rose on Elector Frederick and thereby persuade him to make war against the Muslims. Secondly he was to haul Luther into line. But being a capable diplomat and sensing the feeling of the German people, von Miltitz reversed the order. He left the Golden Rose in safekeeping at the Fugger bank and interviewed Luther before fronting Frederick. He knew that even with an army he couldn’t get the professor to Rome by force. All he was able to do was persuade Luther to write a courteous letter to the pope in which he retracted nothing.⁵⁶ Muhammad had not succeeded in forcing the Christian church to rethink its theology during his lifetime but at long last his successors were indirectly forcing a situation in which the church had to accept internal criticism. It is reasonable to believe that if it had not been for that situation, coupled with the attack on papal corruption by Pico at the Lateran Council, Luther would have already suffered the fate of boat rockers before him. Because of the political situation, criticism was possible in Germany which would not have been tolerated anywhere else and printers, ignoring the Lateran decree, spread reports of the affair and reform leaflets far and wide.

The pulse of events was still leisurely until Rome issued the bull Exserge Domine on 15th June 1520 condemning many of Luther's theses, threatening excommunication and requiring his books to be burned. It was not until six months later that Luther defiantly burned a copy of it along with books of canon law and papal documents at Wittenberg. At first his supporters were subdued but the mood changed, they gathered courage and more books to add to the bonfire. But on January 3rd 1521, when Luther's excommunication was confirmed, the chips were down. The Luther affair held centre stage in European politics. The emperor, Charles V, called the Diet at Worms. Luther refused to recant and was banned from the Holy Roman Empire. Taken into hiding at Wartburg he recuperated from the strain of the previous four years, wrote, began translating the Bible into German and waited. With reforms very slow in coming he incited a more direct attack on the church with his own program of ecclesiastical reforms but, as we have noted, it backfired with the peasant revolts and he didn't know how to handle what he had started. He sided with the princes in crushing the revolts ruthlessly and Germany was not only divided against the pope, it was divided against itself. Civil war was looming.

THE OPTIONS: THE PRINCES AND LUTHER, OR THE TURKS

Out of a protest against the activities of the pope, the emperor and the Catholic princes which a minority of reform princes issued at the Diet of Speyer in 1529 grew the Protestant League of about seven Electoral regions or principalities with some twenty major cities. Religious reform, politics and trade were caught up in the crisis just as inseparably as they had been in the days of Pompey and on an even grander scale. Princely support for the reformers against the Catholics went hand in hand with reform support for the princes against the emperor. There lay the vital power base for the Reformation, because of the way that the church was organized on a regional basis. But the emperor, Charles V was in a curious fix indeed. To defend his imperial power he had to defend the papacy, even though his family connections on thrones all over Europe fell on both sides of the Reformation fence and Leo had actually opposed his election as emperor in 1519. As King of Spain he was pressing ahead with Spanish imperialism and the rape of Latin America, enjoying the papal patronage as joint standard bearer for Christ – and the pope. But as King of Spain he was also at war with France and its ally the pope. At the same time France was fostering friendly relations with Turkey and supporting its move into Hungary, partly to spite Charles and partly because it desperately needed access to eastern trade.

The pope would have had a fit if he had seen a Turkish admiral celebrating the Muslim fast of Ramadan in the streets of Toulon while he, the pope, was urging Charles V's brother, Ferdinand, in Austria to intervene in Hungary against the Turks and to silence Luther at the same time. That issue had come to a head in 1526, (the year of the Diet of Speyer and three years before the Protestant League was born), when the Turks had humbled Hungary with a decisive victory at Mohacs in which the King of Bohemia and Hungary was killed. Ferdinand felt that he was therefore in a position to ignore the question of Luther because the Muslim menace could be shown to be real rather than hypothetical and, in addition, he could lay a reasonable legal claim to Hungary on ancestral grounds. He thereupon followed the example of his brother, Charles, who had paid bribes totaling 850,000 ducats ⁵⁷to make sure he was elected emperor in preference to Francis of France, and bought the support of barons in Bohemia, Moravia and Silesia to secure his claims to the Hungarian throne. ⁵⁸ However the Hungarian barons and the Turks to whom they then owed allegiance didn't like the idea at all and the fight was on. The Turks invaded Austria in 1529, (the year of the Marburg Colloquy and Henry VIII's break with the pope), and again in 1532, (the year before Calvin's conversion), to teach Ferdinand to keep his fingers out of Hungary, but eventually a compromise was reached and the tattered country was split down the middle: half for Ferdinand and half for the Ottoman Empire.

In spite of the methods he had used, Germany's princes were rather impressed by the way Ferdinand had stood up to the Sultan and helped to save Central Europe and Christendom from the Muslim Infidel and he was installed as Holy Roman Emperor when Charles V abdicated in 1556. He wasn't the last titular head of the Holy Roman Empire but in reality it was dying in his hands, slain by the combined pressures of the Reformation and Islam, represented by the Ottoman Empire. Before Ferdinand inherited it in 1556 Charles had been forced by the Muslim threat to reach a truce with the Lutherans, and Ferdinand, (acting for Charles), and Rome had likewise reluctantly agreed that the German princes could organize their own national churches. They were already doing it anyway and it dramatically boosted his prospects of getting the coveted imperial crown. The Teutonic Knights had broken with Rome, become a principality under Poland and the Grand Master had adopted Lutheranism. Reform fever, with or without political anti-papery had swept Europe and reformed churches were firmly established in Switzerland, France and England.

The period of two generations, or about 50 years, which we can date from Luther's formal excommunication in 1521 was a period of such upheaval and violence that the conduct of Europe's affairs bears little resemblance to a search for the ultimate route to salvation via the Gospel of Jesus Christ which the whole ghastly episode was supposed to be. We cannot consider all of the political and military conflicts of the period nor the host of other reformers and counter-reformers whose work contributed to setting the competing fragments of the church on their new courses. But there was hardly a region where reformers were not battering down the barriers, printing Bibles and taking great risks to try to get the church back on the rails or to replace it with new ones. Attacks by Luther on the monastic system brought interesting complications, especially in Germany. They didn't only weaken the grip of the teaching and policing orders, they led to a mass exodus from monasteries which left the community to absorb and rehabilitate large numbers of disenchanted people who had been more accustomed to meditation than work and who had to work out completely new relationships with the people around them. And the parent church, after much political intrigue, had at last moved towards putting its house in order.

DEMANDS FOR REFORM STILL DENIED

For many years the Vatican opposed moves to hold another general council of the church to put its affairs in order, in spite of the fact that Charles V pressed repeatedly for such a council to meet in Germany. The popes and cardinals feared that a general council outside their control, especially if it were chaired by someone other than the pope and away from Rome, would lead to a transformation of Catholicism with the See of Rome being swept into insignificance.⁵⁹ The first pope to accept the need for a council was Pope Paul III. He summoned a council in 1537 but had to postpone it repeatedly due to opposition and stalling tactics by those around him. A man of some strange contradictions, on one hand in a burst of the customary nepotism he appointed a 14 year old nephew as a cardinal, but on the other hand he appointed nine cardinals as a commission to bring proposals for reform. They included the very enlightened Contarini whom he elevated from lay diplomat to cardinal and, as a step towards a council, he authorised him to convene a conference with Protestants at Ratisbon in 1541. Agreement was reached on the question of justification by faith, but leaders on both sides of the divide, including Luther, became suspicious and no consensus could be reached on the question of transubstantiation. Ratisbon was therefore a dead issue. Worse still, any chance of reconciliation appeared impossible the next year when the pope was persuaded by the conservative Cardinal Caraffa, who later became Pope Paul IV, to set up a powerful new Roman Inquisition into Heresy. Caraffa was one of six cardinals appointed Inquisitors-General with authority to imprison on suspicion, confiscate property and execute the guilty. Among rules which he laid down was one: 'No man is to lower himself by showing toleration towards any sort of heretic, least of all a Calvinist.'⁶⁰ The pope reserved the power of pardon to himself.

Eventually Paul III was able to convene a council at Trent in 1545, after Emperor Charles and the French king had signed a peace agreement in 1544 and Francis had pledged, secretly, to support the emperor's plans for the council. But when it met for the first time it soon became very clear that the pope and the emperor had quite different priorities for the work of the council. Their row became very public. The emperor pressed for an end to abuses and corruption in the church and concessions to the Lutherans which would bring peace in Germany. The pope wanted questions of doctrine dealt with first. It was therefore agreed that discipline and doctrine would be considered in parallel, but in fact this did not happen and the first 'session', 1545–48, dealt mainly with doctrinal matters in the absence of any representatives of the Lutherans present and this deepened divisions and hardened the positions which the two sides took.

Unfortunately Martin Luther died in 1546 and that was a signal for the emperor as well as the cardinals to try to reverse the Reformation in Germany and the cardinals managed to use stalling tactics so that the council became a long drawn out affair. It met on and off for eighteen years, (seven years into Ferdinand's reign after he succeeded Charles as emperor), and it did little of consequence until the final sessions. During that time three popes out of the five who held office during the period presided at some stage, (Paul III, Julius III and Pius IV), and the mood changed more often than the popes. Two years after Luther's death, with religious wars having already broken out and Charles having turned against the Reformers, the Diet of Augsburg adopted a harsh Interim formula as a basis for permitted operations by Protestant Churches until the council reached a final settlement. However seven years later, in 1555, with Ferdinand about to assume office as emperor, that formula gave way to the Peace of Augsburg in which it was agreed that both Catholicism and Lutheranism would be recognized, provided that in each land the subject people would follow the religion of their rulers. It was a very interesting variation on the old theme: political stability through religious conformity.

In the meantime the Vatican had moved quickly and decisively to destroy or to undermine Protestantism wherever it appeared and to proselytize with great vigour through the Order of Jesuits which had been established in Spain in 1534, eleven years before the Council of Trent began. The church's policy was 'admit nothing and destroy before you reform'. A few changes to regulations governing things like plural office holding had already been made at the Lateran Council in response to pressure from people like Pico, and the Vatican went through the motions of eliminating the worst abuses of the indulgences system, but that had been little more than an exercise in window-dressing. (See note above, Fifth Lateran Council and Pope Leo.)

TRENT, PAUL IV AND THIRTY YEARS OF TERROR

Nothing had really changed. During the middle years of the Council of Trent, 1551–52, Pope Paul IV (Caraffa), choleric and impulsive – elected at the age of 79 – actually stepped up the Inquisition to unprecedented levels of terror, saying that if his own father was a heretic he would gather the wood to burn him with his own hands.⁶¹ He published the first index of prohibited books and bigots all over Italy had some wonderful bonfires. In Venice 10,000 books were burned in one afternoon. And of course he could not forget the Jews even if he was pre-occupied with the Reformation. He ordered that all Jews in Italy were to wear a yellow hat and live in a ghetto with only one gate, and 12,000 books were burned at the great Hebrew school at Cremona.⁶²

Other records of the period confirm that the morals and conduct of the popes had not changed and such a papal mentality was a guarantee for even more determined reformation movements and the recipe for more and more violence. A massacre at Vassy in 1562 became the signal for religious wars to erupt and tear the soul out of France as well as Germany. Seven hundred and fifty years of spiritual starvation and human repression under the Holy Roman Empire had reached its climax. Pent up feelings and aspirations exploded like fireworks, shooting ideas in all directions like seeds to fall on fertile ground, burst with the flood of events and reaching up for truth and salvation. Every community produced its own groups which fervently believed, from reading the Gospels in their own language for the first time, that they had found the absolute truth and the final answer. They were eager to share it with the world and to talk down everyone else, especially the parent church. Turmoil and the fragmentation of the church with Christian action groups and new denominations springing up everywhere was a natural consequence.

The situation in France also put great pressure back onto the Vatican which feared that the success of the Huguenots would lead to a French National Council and that the effects would spill over into Germany and elsewhere. The Council of Trent was therefore reconvened for a third and final session, 1562–63, six years after Charles had abdicated in favor of Ferdinand. The confrontational approach of the earlier sessions (when decisions were made to prop up existing Catholic usage and to repudiate anything which was tainted with reform) gave way to the need to recover lost ground, and debate on a number of doctrinal issues took on a new sense of urgency. Although no doctrinal concessions were made to the reformers a number of changes were made to religious orders, the appointment of bishops and matrimonial regulations. The revision of the Catechism, the Breviary and the Vulgate Bible were authorised and the conduct of the hierarchy came under scrutiny as Charles V had wanted at the beginning. Regulations were tightened and new systems of clerical discipline were adopted.

The implementation of most of the council's decisions fell to Pope Pius V, (Michele Ghislieri, the Grand Inquisitor under Paul IV), who was elected in 1565 and he set about his task with great vigour. He set about ensuring an educated clergy, adopted a Calvinistic approach to Sunday School, restrained the issue of indulgences, imposed penalties for simony, blasphemy, sodomy and concubinage, cleaned up prostitution in Rome, clamped down on the extravagance of the hierarchy, and issued a decree to abolish bull-fights – but the Spanish bishops were scared to publish it. However he maintained the Inquisition with equal vigour, decorating the Duke of Alva for his good work in pursuing a reign of terror in the Netherlands; encouraged the slaughter of Huguenot prisoners in France and Spain; and aggravated the religious wars in England as well by excommunicating Queen Elizabeth. Well ... at least he made a start towards cleaning up the mess.

Calvin, who died a few months after the close of the Council of Trent, was quite correct when he insisted that coordination and union were very important, but under the circumstances of the day they were simply not achievable and it was pointless trying to impose them by the methods of the Inquisition. The Reformation had been worthwhile and a fresh breeze was lifting the spirits and aspirations of ordinary people right across Europe. But while the efforts and sacrifices of the church's internal auditors had achieved a great deal they had not achieved the near impossible. The church's self-image and its doctrine of the Trinity had both survived another challenge. The so-called "counterreformation" instituted through the Council of Trent was in reality a hole plugging rearguard action designed to justify the status quo with a facelift. Regrettably there were no longer basically two 'Bodies of Christ' trying to impose their wills, one from Rome and one from Moscow. There were many, and they were in conflict both on a doctrinal and a regional basis. In France the papal Medici family-inspired massacre at Vassy foreshadowed the slaughter of the Protestant Huguenot minority in Paris ten years later, in 1572, when tens of thousands of people were hunted out and cut down in a matter of weeks. The Edict of Nantes in 1598 was supposed to restore peace and prosperity to the country by granting freedom of worship for the Huguenots and subsidies to support their troops as well as their clergy but the bull was short-lived and the edict was revoked in 1685.

The Spanish Inquisition was exported to the low countries of Belgium and Holland, then under Spanish rule, as an insurance against Protestantism taking hold there, but it still did. England found itself swapping religion as often as it swapped monarchs and Ireland found itself a pawn in Pope Gregory XIII's intrigue to bring down Queen Elizabeth, thereby getting a royal backlash through persecution of the Catholic population. Gregory then compounded the problem by authorizing an assassination attempt against Elizabeth⁶³ and relations across the Irish Sea took on permanent overtones of religious as well as political and economic conflict. From 1618, just one hundred years after Luther had swung his defiant hammer, and after a respite because of the deals done to get common cause against the Muslims in Hungary, Germany found itself facing thirty years of civil war between the Catholic and Protestant states.

But the Thirty Years War didn't remain a German domestic affair for long. Half of Europe chose to become embroiled in what Fisher describes as "a catastrophe which plunged a large area of central Europe into an abyss of barbarism and misery" and left Germany suffering "social depression consequent upon the devastations of a war waged with a ferocity to which history offers few parallels."⁶⁴ In a war which was supposed to demonstrate which was the proper route to salvation, Catholic or Protestant, entire villages died out, moral restraints broke down in wild bursts of profligacy with starvation, marauding and even cannibalism. The war was triggered by a bid by the emperor, Ferdinand II, to impose his view that there was still only one route to salvation, the Catholic route, and to eliminate any Protestant presence from Germany. Trained as a Jesuit and embittered by Jesuit teaching, Ferdinand chose to interpret the Treaty of Ausburg (approving churches according to the princes' will) as giving him, the supreme prince, the right to determine the church for his entire domain. He began his campaign immediately he gained the throne and thereby incited the Protestants to rebellion but when he issued his Edict of Restitution in 1629, requiring Protestant Churches to surrender to the Catholic Church all properties appropriated since 1552, all hell let loose.

In Fisher's words: "Few men so honest, pious, and consistent have brought upon the world so great and avalanche of misery or have ensured for the intellect of a people so long a period of theological constraint." Other crowned heads and their people who chose to enter the conflict did so as much to settle old scores and to gain a bit of territorial advantage as to help resolve the route to salvation. Sweden, France, Denmark, the Netherlands, Austria, Poland, Hungary, Spain, Portugal, Transylvania and some of the Papal States were in the thick of it, as well as Germany, Prussia, Bohemia, and Saxony of course, with both the English and the Turks being party to the politicking. When some form of sanity finally prevailed and a settlement was reached with the Peace of Westphalia in 1648 there was a return to the religious relationships within Germany which had been set down at Ausburg a hundred years before, except that the Calvinists were admitted to the club as well as the Catholics and the Lutherans. There were also a number of territorial adjustments, including the ceding of Alsace to France. The northern provinces remained Protestant but Bohemia and the Austrian dominions became subject to rigid control by the Jesuits. One thing which certainly was not achieved was religious tolerance or understanding. Hard line sectarianism and intolerance were exported to wherever the massive flow of religious refugees settled around the world.

The growth of Anabaptist groups also illustrates the turmoil and fragmentation which the church was going through. The rite of Baptism has always been one of the church's two foremost sacraments, the other being the Eucharist or communion, and on that basis alone any abuse of the rite or change in teaching about it was important. However, infant baptism as it was preached and practiced in association with the rites of penance, indulgences and unction in the pre-Reformation church, embodied everything which was questionable in the church's image of itself as both the body of Christ on earth and the exclusive path to salvation. In view of the authority it claimed to exercise on that basis, a challenge to the church's teaching on baptism was therefore the nearest thing to a challenge to the church's view of itself short of an outright attack on the doctrine of the Trinity. Of the rash of Anabaptist groups which sprang up across Europe about six major ones survived and the rest either merged or faded away.⁶⁵ Their range of teaching on baptism defies a brief description but at one extreme there were those who saw it simply as the basis of Christian fellowship while at the other extreme there were those who outdid Augustine, taught that only the baptized were fit to rule the universe and introduced secondary rituals which brought their sects into disrepute.

Such was the life of Europe and the state of its Christianity as its monarchs, traders, churchmen and other rogues set out to colonize and exploit the people and the resources of the world which had suddenly opened up all around them. The Reformation had been triggered at the right time but unfortunately it was only partly effective. It had been triggered by the consequences of the church's doctrines and its view of itself but in turn they were the very things which prevented it from being fully effective.

However, while the Reformation had been triggered by the consequences of the church's self-understanding it had only been made possible by the presence and the influence of its junior partner in the triangle: Islam. Few people gave much thought to the fact that the reformers only survived because of the threat to the papacy and its role which the Ottoman Empire posed. The popes' reliance on the princes of the Holy Roman Empire for, firstly, protection in the event that the Muslims might again break through Europe's military barrier and, secondly, support for another push against the Muslims in one final crusade to eliminate them, made it impossible for the popes to move against Luther and his colleagues without the agreement of the princes. They could not get that support for the very same reason that the Reformation had been triggered: the church's conduct because of its self-understanding. Muhammad's successors had become a factor in the process of Reformation which he had not been able to persuade the church to undertake – or to impose on it – nine hundred years earlier.

Certainly the Holy Roman Empire was tottering on its last legs and the links between church and state were being broken, even if slowly and somewhat painfully. It was not possible for competing sections of a deeply divided church to either retain or to develop the same relationships with civil and political bodies which the pre-Reformation church had enjoyed. But equally certainly, the church which was being swept by the current of events out into the New World had essentially the same view of itself and essentially the same doctrines as the church which had proclaimed Rominus Pontifex. It was just a little less tarnished and a great deal more divided. In resisting a reassessment from within, the popes and their cohorts had guaranteed the fragmentation of the Christian church and the extension of its division and bigotry throughout the world. They had also guaranteed a far bigger and more critical audience while the inevitable event takes place. The Reformation had been hooked, but it was a case of 'the one that got away'. It was already fairly clear that the impact of the Reformation would not be sufficient to result in the total rethink of the church's theology which was necessary. But one by one the pieces which make up the jigsaw puzzle of the trouble in the triangle were falling into place. It would only be a matter of time ...

CHAPTER 11

FOLLOW THE LEADERS

As Christian Europe struggled to break out from the self-imposed blockade of the Muslim empire, still spreading from the eastern Mediterranean, the church was being swept along by the swirling current of events in which it – the church itself – had been one of the leading forces. The secrets of the big round world were secrets no more. It was full of unknown people who had to be saved. The church knew nothing about them, their cultures or from what evil mysteries they had to be saved, but it was determined to save them by applying its exclusive sacraments and by the use of force if it was so inspired through its exclusive, divinely ordained, absolute and infallible wisdom. But because of the mess which it was in it ~~delegated~~ relegated its responsibility to the political forces of the states of the Holy Roman Empire with which it had a queer love hate relationship and with which it was locked in a power struggle. Thus, from the very beginning of the European colonial era, when Columbus took twelve priests on his first voyage to found a settlement, the Roman church¹ rode into the New World with, and on the back of, Europe's political and commercial interests in a manner such that it guaranteed that Christianity would be chained to Western interests and influences whether they were good or bad.

The church gloated over every European success, getting numerically fat by either force of arms, coercion or simply the cargo cult reaction that he who brings the goodies must be protected by the right gods. It all boiled down to 'might is right' whether it was military or economic. And all of Europe, including the church itself, was duped by the line of reasoning which went round and round in a vicious circle: "We are taking Christianity to the 'backward people' and we are being rewarded for it, therefore the church is right and it is our responsibility to boost the church and convert the natives." The trio of Alexander, Isabella and Columbus had come just twenty five years before Leo, Charles and Luther. But unfortunately that was long enough for the pre-Reformation church at its worst to get its self-image and its methods well and truly set over much of the New World before the reform movements were well enough established to have any leavening influence.

The conduct of Isabella's Spaniards in their first New World colony in 1493 set a despicable precedent for what was to follow. Very few people in Europe knew what was happening west of the Atlantic and the privileged few who did were generally quite content to reap the big short-term benefits which they took for granted as their papal due and, in any case, what was good enough for Europe was surely good enough for the rest of the world.

THE PATH TO SALVATION

On the island of Hispaniola, Columbus laid out a rectangular city plan, established a Spanish-style municipal system among the one thousand five hundred people in his party and ‘assigned’ a group of West Indians to each settler. Mass baptisms were organized, of course, because the natives had to be ‘saved’. But the West Indians didn’t like what went with being saved. They didn’t like their women being seized as playthings for the Spaniards or becoming forced labour for their ‘saviours’. They rebelled. So they were slaughtered. So disgraceful was the conduct of the colony that Columbus and his brother were arrested and shorn of their authority as governors in 1498 by a Commissioner sent to investigate. Some effort was made to improve the situation when the next convoy of 2,500 settlers arrived from Spain in 1502 although the pattern had been well established. It was to be little different as colonies were set up progressively in other islands of the Caribbean, including Cuba, and the populations were cut to ribbons by a combination of deliberate slaughter and epidemics of European diseases.

The situation became so bad that a Dominican priest, Antonio de Montesinos, was moved to preach on Christmas Day 1511 (the year the bishopric had been established) against the abuses by his fellows. But as well as recording European conduct at the time his sermon also shows clearly how the church saw itself and its partners in the triangle at that stage.

“Tell me”, he demanded, “by what right or justice do you keep these Indians in such cruel and horrible servitude? — Why do you keep them so oppressed and weary, not giving them enough to eat, nor taking care of them in their illnesses? For with the excessive work you demand of them, they fall ill and die, or rather you kill them with your desire to extract and acquire gold every day — Are these not men? Have they not rational souls? Are you not bound to love them as you love yourselves? Be certain that in such a state as this, you can no more be saved than the Moors or Turks.” ²

EXPLORATION AND EXPLOITATION

Then along came the Conquistadores. Exploration gave way to exploitation, if it had not already, when Balboa and Del Cano returned from their epic voyages. Balboa crossed the isthmus of Panama to see the Pacific in 1513 and Del Cano completed Magellan’s fateful attempt to circle the globe via Cape Horn and the Philippines in 1523. Their tales of gold and gems stored in the mountains of Peru, Colombia and Mexico triggered a plundering stampede under both royal and papal patronage and the rape of Latin America was soon in full swing. The royal patronage was direct while the papal patronage was indirect, authority having been delegated to the King of Spain for the control of the Catholic Church in both Spain and Spanish America. Catholic missionaries, usually Dominicans or Franciscans until the Jesuits were well established, accompanied every expedition to bless and name each city, build churches and begin the mass baptisms.

Gold in large quantities in South America was exactly what Spain, Portugal, the pope and his holy empire wanted to hear about. The principality of Moscow had been gaining strength at a great rate ever since the fall of Constantinople and its interdependence with the Greek Orthodox Church was helping them both. Ivan III was frighteningly power and land hungry and a real threat to the Baltic Teutonic princes, Lithuania and Poland. About 1471 he had begun the conquest of the vital trading city state of Novgorod through which the Hanseatic League linked into Russia and the east. Brute force won the day for him in 1477 but in 1484, wanting to avoid any chance of an alliance against him by Novgorod, Poland or the Teutonic princes, he occupied the city and transported some 7,000 people to Moscow. Ten years later, while the pope was dividing the new world between Spain and Portugal, Ivan shut down the League's depot in Novgorod, arrested its members, and confiscated their goods. The effect on the great trading and finance houses of the League was catastrophic. They had not recovered to any extent before the Conquistadores left to pay their respects to the brave new world, so that was Spain's big chance to fill the void.³

GENOCIDE? NOT QUITE ...

It was Hernan Cortes, described as a farsighted, courageous, well educated and charming Spanish gentleman, who made contact with the Aztecs in 1520. He usurped command of a Spanish garrison, destroyed the magnificent city of Tenochtitlan, decimated the Amerindian population and put the rest to work to build Mexico City on the site of their former capital. ⁴ Today the descendants of those few poor souls can stand, (together with the tourists), and marvel at the engineering and city building skills of their ancestors depicted by the remnants and models on display at the Museum of Anthropology. A second model in Mexico City's Independence Square lies between what remains of the foundations of the great Aztec temple (rediscovered after World War II) and the enormous sinking, tilting gilded cathedral with tens of tonnes of ill-gotten gold adorning countless statues in towering shrines and naves which stands as a lurid reminder of the wanton greed, perverse extravagance and licentious arrogance of a church which had drowned any understanding of its proper role and responsibilities in a mire of self-aggrandisement and the lost hopes and aspirations of an entire nation. The total elimination of that civilization and the subjugation of its remnant community in such abject circumstances cannot be justified on the grounds that Christianity had to supplant the human-sacrificial Aztec religion. It was a simple case of unrestrained lust and greed taking full advantage of superior fire power. A touch of restraint, a little more evangelism and a lot less lust and the world would be culturally richer today. Cortes was rewarded with appointment as Governor and Captain-General of the 'New Spain' by Charles V in 1522, the year that Luther published his German language New Testament from his protective custody in the castle of Wartburg.

The condition of Europe and the papacy and the personal and national greed of the power-hungry Charles V are thrust into even sharper focus by the circumstances at the time that two illiterate scoundrels were appointed to similar posts in Peru six years later. The Muslim Turks were in full control of Hungary following their invasion in 1514. They had gained control of central Hungary in spite of the pope when a movement originally set up to resist them turned into a peasant insurrection against their Catholic feudal lords and was brutally suppressed – together with the fruits of their Renaissance of the late fifteenth century which was expunged. In Rome an army of Spanish and German rabble under the command of Cardinal Pompeo Colonna, a loyal friend of the Emperor, had just released Pope Clement VII, another member of the Medici family of popes, from imprisonment in the Castel S. Angelo. His conflict with the emperor had led to his being bottled up there for seven months while he begged, borrowed and melted down papal tiaras and gold chalices to buy his way out. During that time the occupying rabble – Roman Catholic at that – had sacked the Vatican and desecrated it more violently than the Vandals under Genseric a thousand years earlier. Thousands had been tortured to death, the Sistine Chapel and St. Peter's had been used as stables and holy relics had been sold to mobs looting the burning city.⁵

The two scoundrels, Francisco Pizarro and Diego de Almagro, neither of whom could sign his name, had just led a party of ruffians from Panama South along the coast of Colombia and Ecuador to the Peruvian border where they learned of a wealthy civilization in the mountainous country further inland. Pizarro headed for Spain where Charles V, ever eager to capitalize on the 850,000 ducats it had cost him to gain the imperial crown, granted royal patronage to an expedition and appointed Pizarro Governor and Captain-General of Peru, a country whose people no European had ever met and in which no European had travelled beyond the border coast. Almagro got the governorship of the border town of Tumbes. Another civilization was about to be destroyed, but naturally the church would be there to sanctify the destruction.

SLAUGHTER AND DESTRUCTION? CERTAINLY!

It was not until 1532, four years after being commissioned by Charles, that Pizarro made contact with Atahualpa, the Inca ruler, but then the ghastly deed was done quite efficiently. A chaplain lectured him on the authority of the pope and the supremacy of the King of Spain, then, at an agreed signal, Pizarro and his Christian mob fell upon the Incas, slaughtering thousands and taking Atahualpa prisoner. He would get his freedom, he was assured, in return for a room full of gold. Enough priceless treasures to perpetuate forever the skills of Inca goldsmiths in the art museums of the world, were melted down to transport as solid bars, one fifth being Charles V's share of the loot. Atahualpa was rewarded with salvation for his cooperation. After being accused of treason to justify the deed he was condemned to death, baptized of course, and executed by strangling. At the end of 1533, just as the pope, the emperor's family and Henry VIII were politicking over marriage and divorce towards the separation of the Church of England from Rome, Pizarro stripped the Inca capital of its gold completely.^{6 7} He lies at rest, perhaps, in a glass coffin in Lima's splendid cathedral.

The story was much the same in many parts of the New World and gradually competition from other European governments, manipulation by the church and its missionaries and abuses of human rights which were more like slavery than forced labour, turned the colonization of South America into one of history's great tragedies.

SLAVERY RETURNS TO AFRICA AND EUROPE

On the other hand the Portuguese in their African adventures had made actual slavery in Europe a fact again after a break of a thousand years or so. The mark of real Christian progress. We shall come to it shortly. First, the background.

When the papal standard bearers began to penetrate the great continent of Africa from the west coast and the east coast instead of from the Mediterranean coast (from which they had twice been expelled, first by Arian Christianity and later by Islam) they were somewhat shaken to find that Islam was there long before them. It was living reasonably smoothly alongside tribal animist religions in a number of regions, having been introduced through commerce and not conquest, except in its initial push along the Mediterranean and in one or two particular cases. Community and social systems were much more highly developed than Europeans either recognized or were prepared to admit. Kings and tribal chiefs in many areas depended heavily on Muslims for guidance in matters of justice and social order even when they were only a small minority.⁸

Even before Muhammad had left Mecca for the safety of Medina the first Islamic settlement had been established in Africa when a party of migrants crossed the Red Sea to Ethiopia. Islam had reached Cairo in 641, Tripoli in 647 and Tangier in 711 before crossing to Spain, and Europe seemed content to think that it had gone no further. The church was certainly not keen to either recognize the extent of its junior partner's spread and influence or to encourage discussion of it. Islam was to be denigrated and defeated, not encouraged. From 652, only sixteen years after the debacle at the River Yarmuk, the Nubian Christians had a treaty of non-interference with the Caliphate which is now regarded as a tributary relationship and the Arabs traded corn and oil for Nubian slaves.⁹ Then the steady spread of Islam from the Mediterranean began.

By the time the Holy Roman Empire was established Muslims were evangelizing in Ethiopia, Somalia and the island of Lanizar, and before the crusades they had established communities along the coast of Kenya and Tanganyika. The big breakthrough came about the time that Olga and Vladimir were being politicked into adopting some form of Christianity for their young Russian principality. The Trans-Saharan trade route was established from Morocco to the Niger Valley and the King of Gao adopted Islam in 1010. He was followed by leaders in Ghana (1076), Mali and the King of Kanem-Bornu in 1086. Trade and evangelism began in Mauritania, Nigeria and Senegal about the same time and Islam had almost reached the Gulf of Guinea by the overland route. Farther east it reached Uganda via the Nile about the same time.

¹⁰

A CIRCLE OF ENLIGHTENMENT

Islam in the Sudan was helping to establish another link in the chain of more enlightened communities encircling the unholy Holy Roman Empire but the church was not capable of understanding what was happening around it. Its homemade blinkers were painfully tight. The circle had started with the immense semicircle of Muslim communities which stretched, when at its greatest extent, from the Black Sea south through Asia Minor, west along the Mediterranean coast then northward again into central France. Then, next, joining it to the northeast, came the Jewish Khazar Khanate and just as that was being destroyed two more links appeared to the west and south. One was the group of new Muslim States of the Sudan which also provided more depth to the existing chain as weak spots appeared on the Mediterranean coast. The Norman conquest of England in 1066 provided the other quite unexpected link. It was another backlash against the church's military expansion into non-Christian Scandinavia and therefore can be compared with the adoption of Greek Orthodox Christianity by the young Russian principalities under Vladimir only 69 years earlier.

When the Holy Roman Empire finally succeeded in subduing the Danes, Swedes and Norsemen it triggered several waves of exploration, emigration and counter invasions to the British Isles, the coast of France, Iceland, Greenland and North America as already noted. At the same time Rome thought it had eliminated the Norse religion for good and always when it was banned in 1030.¹¹ But not everyone was keen to toe the papal line even if they had gone through the ritual of baptism. One such person was William the Conqueror. His Danish forebears had carved a piece out of the Frankish kingdom at Normandy in one of those retaliatory raids against the Holy Roman Empire four generations earlier. For one reason or another William had been promised the crown of England. It doesn't really matter whether it was through inheritance, marriage or personal pact, all of which have been suggested, but he decided a promise was a promise and crossed the channel in force to make it good. He was in constant conflict with the church and it could even be that it was the church which had put barriers, like his illegitimacy, in the way of his gaining the crown. In spite of the church he transformed England into an independent, secular, nationalistic state. It was the first well organized state to rise from the rubble of the old Roman empire.¹² It was a link in the chain of enlightened communities closing in around the Holy Roman Empire.

But the Vatican didn't give in easily and although William's successors continued his policies his son, William II, tried further reducing the power of the church with a touch of extortion and began a running battle with Archbishop Anselm. This drew Henry I into the so-called "lay investiture" power struggle between the French kings and the popes.¹³ Royal efforts to improve justice and administration and to further curb the power of the church went hand in hand until, several kings and the murder of Thomas Becket later, the church had got itself back into allegiance with sufficient barons through the devious work of Archbishop Langton to force King John to sign the Magna Carta in 1215. Often billed as a great victory for the people, the real winners in the event were the church and the barons. The “rights” of the church were reaffirmed and the baronial system was reinforced against interference by the monarchs.¹⁴

Unfortunately, while that was going on in England, nomadic Arabs had begun to settle the agricultural areas from Tunisia to Morocco, pushed out by religious conflict further east and, being unaccustomed to farming practice, they wrecked the land. The economy and the region have never fully recovered.¹⁵ But then, also during the crusade period, came the Muslim conquest of Christian Nubia by Arabs from Egypt. It probably involved an element of retaliation as well as expansionism but, whatever the motives were, it opened up trade both within the immense northern half of the continent and between that region and the Arab countries, and the rulers of the city states of Kano and Katsina in Hausaland (northern Nigeria) also adopted Islam as a consequence of increased contact with it.¹⁶

So great was the impact of Islam in the Western Sudan that in 1324 King Mansa Musa of Mali made the first pilgrimage by a Sudanese sovereign to Mecca. That was the year that Pope John XXII instituted the Feast of the Trinity and it was right at the height of that struggle between the popes and the princes of Europe for overriding authority. King Mansa Musa took with him an entourage of 80,000 people and such masses of gold to distribute as gifts that the economy of Egypt took more than a decade to recover from the inflationary pressure of his generosity as his party moved through to Arabia. He persuaded a number of Muslim scholars, jurists and architects to return with him to Mali and African civilization had very soon reached a level of cultural achievement which Europe prefers to ignore or make believe was a product of later Christian influence. Muslim teachers established Qur’anic schools for reading, writing and comprehension and the University of Timbuktu, built by the Arab architect es-Saheli, attracted professors and students from right across North Africa and the Middle East.¹⁷ Although the majority of the population held to their traditional religions and rites and although no attempt was made to forcibly convert them, Muslim ethics and law became the standards of the Sudan. Muslim judges, teachers, doctors and other advisers dominated the courts of the rulers and mosques were built in all main centres.

Mali remained important for a couple of centuries but gradually the neighbouring kingdom of Songhai assumed the dominant role. Askia the Great became king in 1493 just as Spain and Portugal were haggling over papal lines of demarcation and Morocco was struggling with the task of absorbing the Moors, Berbers and Jews fleeing as refugees from Ferdinand and Isabella’s priestly thugs in Granada. Two years later he made his first pilgrimage to Mecca, recruited additional scholars, jurists and Muslim advisers and built Timbuktu into an even greater centre of learning than it had been under Mali. Having been appointed Khalifa for all of the Western Sudan while he was in Mecca, Askia at first tried to impose Islamic law exclusively throughout the region but when friction developed he modified his approach, balancing the interests and role of Islam and the traditional religions.¹⁸

ENTER THE PAPAL STANDARD BEARERS ...

Such was the Africa which the Portuguese standard bearers were “given” by the pope. It didn’t take them long to start tearing it apart, aided by Spanish pressure along the Mediterranean coast. The trade routes from the Sudan to Granada via Morocco, Algeria and Tunis had linked Europe into a major gold supply system with a varied two-way trade involving metals, cloth, jewelry, kola nuts, salt, shells, skins and ivory. In addition there was a steady trade in slaves from the Sudan to the Arab countries and Turkey via Tripoli and Benghazi.¹⁹ At least that was the case until Ferdinand and Isabella stepped in and began their war of attrition against Granada in 1481. Morocco’s trading position was undermined badly when Granada’s main port, Malaga, was captured six years later. As part of their cooperation with the popes in a crusade against Islam, the Spanish then picked off each of the North African ports from the Straits of Gibraltar to Tripoli over a period of fifteen years. However, as they were unable to control the hinterland they only succeeded in weakening the Arab and African positions without greatly strengthening their own.

... FOLLOWED BY THE TURKS

Then it was the Turks turn and they had little trouble relieving Spain of most of its North African possessions to expand the Ottoman Empire to its greatest extent. Morocco remained as the sole Muslim state on the shoulder of Africa which was able to resist being absorbed into the sprawling Ottoman Empire. But it had two Spanish forts cut out of its Mediterranean coast, two Portuguese possessions cut out of its Atlantic coast and Portugal was establishing trade and diplomatic relations with its trading partners in the Western Sudan as well by means of a series of west coast and Guinea Coast possessions. Its position was therefore precarious, but worse was to come. In 1578 King Sebastian led a full scale Portuguese invasion of Morocco. The defenders under the Sharif of Marrakesh gave battle and the result was a catastrophe for Portugal. Sebastian was killed in the rout and this gave Philip of Spain the justification to absorb (or “unite with”) Portugal in the way Isabella and Ferdinand had planned. Portugal did not regain its independence until 1643 when the French and the Dutch became a military distraction, because of religious oppression, coincidentally with its own revolt.²⁰

Although Morocco had pushed back the invasion the cost had been great and the pressure from Spain increased. Its position became untenable. It was completely blockaded and had to break out somewhere. In 1591 it made a push across the Sahara to absorb the Songhai Kingdom and the rich gold fields of the Sudan. Unfortunately the main result was the destruction of the most advanced state in Africa and all that had been achieved in three hundred years of enlightened administration. However we cannot lay the blame on Morocco. That rests fairly and squarely on Christendom which, through the bigotry and misunderstanding of itself and its role had done it again. Its crusading zeal had indirectly destroyed another civilization.^{21 22}

On the other side of the continent the situation was not so immediately critical but more groundwork was being laid for the twentieth century’s trouble in the triangle. Omani Arabs had established trading posts along the East African coast progressively ever since the Byzantine Empire had joined battles for control of their Persian Gulf and Red Sea trade routes in a prelude to the evolution of Islam and the rise of Arab nationalism. It was they who then carried Islam southward along the African Coast. Their trading posts had grown gradually into Arab controlled city-states and, especially where they were trading in slaves, there was a degree of friction as they and the Africans struggled for control of the hinterland. However the rivalry had been buffered by their ethnic, cultural and historical relationships. Then along came Vasco de Gama on his second voyage to India in 1502. The 'colony' which he established was actually the Arab city-state of Kilwa (Tanganyika) where he forced the Sultan to acknowledge the sovereignty of Portugal and to pay an annual tribute or have his town burned to the ground. Zanzibar got the same treatment a year later, then in 1505 a fleet of over twenty ships left Spain with orders to take control of the whole of the Indian Ocean trade routes by establishing a series of forts. Kilwa had defaulted on its tribute payments so it was an automatic choice. Then came a long series of ports including Mozambique and Mombasa which proved a very reluctant victim. Strong opposition from combined forces of Arabs, Swahili townspeople and inland Africans was crushed in 1505 and the town was looted and burned.

There was a repeat performance in 1528 and the Turks eventually intervened to help in 1585 and 1587, but the resistance of East Africa's most powerful city-state had been crushed and the citadel named Fort Jesus was built in 1593. A remarkable backhanded compliment to the Messiah with the Gospel of peace and goodwill, it was an affront and a provocation to every person whose view of the church and the Messiah didn't correspond with that of the church so that the small African states revolted and turned out the Portuguese with the aid of the Imam of Oman and his navy in 1698, just a century later. By that stage the quick naval successes of Portugal's first fifteen years east of the Cape had been reversed. Turned out of its Persian Gulf fortress of Hormuz by the Persians and from the East Indies by the British and Dutch, it had to concentrate on exploiting Indian trade through its enclave of Goa, and East African trade through its remaining southeast coast possessions.

Along the central east coast an Omani dynasty established slowly over the next century. Initially it was the representative of the imam, but eventually, in 1746, it declared itself independent and ruled a sovereign state from Mombasa. However that didn't suit Oman because East Africa had gradually become an area of vital interest for it and as Britain increased its interests in the Persian Gulf Imam Sayyid Said did some deals with the British and as a result he was eventually able to bring Mombasa under direct Omani control again in 1837. He was now controlling a split empire with the tail tending to wag the dog, so he took a leaf out of the lessons according to Constantine (who had shifted from Rome to Constantinople for similar reasons) and shifted his official residence from Muscat to the island of Zanzibar in 1840. Assuming the title of Sultan he dominated the East African coast between Cape Delgado and Mogadiscio and Islam took on an expanded role in the region.²³ But that is jumping ahead again.

TO INDIA!

In the meantime, while Portugal had held to its proud course as papal standard bearer, providing the means and support for Catholic missions in India and further east, a great deal of conflict was building up between missions based on competition between religious orders and their differing royal patronage. When Cabral had made contact with the Christian community of South India it numbered about 100,000 persons. It lived in harmony with the Hindu population and followed Nestorian teaching under the guidance of the Nestorian Patriarchy in Persia with which it had only occasional contact.²⁴ It had apparently recovered from the Franciscan disruption of two hundred years earlier, (see chapter 12, page 15L), and it was all set to become the pawn in another ecclesiastical and political power struggle. The church in Persia was torn into factions which either wanted to retain their Nestorian independence, become attached to Moscow or become attached to Rome and they were each eager to control the offspring church in South India. But the Portuguese didn't like any of those alternatives. They were the official representatives of the pope and they would control the church. A Portuguese bishopric was established at Goa and the church and state were soon both trading on the latent friction between Hindu and Muslim communities, from which the Nestorian Christians had stayed clear, in an effort to extend their power. The poor Hindu fisherfolk belonging to the Bharathas caste along the Coromandel Coast were among those offered protection from the Muslims and baptism, (or maybe baptism and protection from the Muslims), as a means by which Portugal and the church both got a toe hold on the eastern side of the subcontinent. In 1536 about 10,000 were baptized en masse and then left, in effect, at the whim of the traders and a gun boat or two.

It was to such communities that Francis Xavier, one of the original Jesuits, went when he arrived in India in 1542 with the joint roles of Apostolic Nuncio and special representative of the King of Portugal to step up and put some order into evangelism, to Catholicize and to introduce elementary education. Regrettably he put heavy emphasis on creeds, Pater Nosters and Ave Marias at the expense of an understanding of the Messiah and the Gospel message about how to live with each other²⁵ and his influence must be seen alongside two other religious influences of the same period.

In 1525, seventeen years before Xavier arrived at Goa and at the same time that both Luther and the pope were busy putting down the Peasants' Revolt, a onetime chieftain of the Muslim Turkoman province of Samarkand, Baber, who had been pushed over the Hindu Kush to Afghanistan, gathered an army, defeated the Sultan of Delhi and assumed the title Emperor of Hindustan. The dynasty which he established lasted for six generations and carried Islam over almost all of the Indian subcontinent before it fell to the British. In 1556, just as Charles V was abdicating as emperor in Europe, Baber's grandson, Akbar, became emperor and extended Mogul control southwards to include central India. A man of quite unusual vision, Akbar determined that his empire would not be racially aligned. It would not be Mongol, Aryan, Rajput, Dravidian or anything else in particular. It would be Indian without discrimination. Similarly, although he was a devout Muslim and knew that a religious consensus helps to cement people into a nation, Akbar recognized that narrow sectarianism of the sort which earlier rulers had imposed in the Indus Valley was destructive. He had noted the fidelity, devotion and nobleness of spirit of the Hindu princes around him, he saw no reason to compel religious conformity and he became more and more wedded to the principle of religious toleration. He established schools according to both Muslim and Hindu tradition and introduced a court cult with rituals adopted from each faith and which he thought ought to have been acceptable to all the religions within his empire, but they did not survive for long after him. He substituted the basic creed that "There is one God and the emperor is His regent" in place of the Muslim "There is one God and Muhammad is His prophet" and the papal claim that there is one God (in the Trinity) and the pope is Christ's vicar.^{26 27}

RIVAL STANDARD BEARERS

During Akbar's reign only a few of the Christian settlements were within the Mogul empire and neither the church nor Portugal showed any inclination to share his views on religious tolerance. The year that Akbar assumed the throne a bishop, Mar Joseph, appointed by the patriarch of the pro-Roman faction of the church in Persia, arrived in India. Somewhat displeased, the Portuguese detained him in a Monastery for eighteen months and he was not released until the bishopric of Goa had been elevated to an archbishopric so that he was outranked. When he was allowed to go south to Travencore he was constantly harassed. Twice he was shipped off to Europe to stand trial for heresy, but he was one of the lucky ones: he was cleared both times.²⁸ . Another bishop, Mar Abraham, sent to India by one of the other competing Eastern patriarchs, fared somewhat better. He managed to keep out of the clutches of the Portuguese for most of the time and held a strong independent community together until he died in 1597. But immediately he was out of the way the Jesuits stepped in and began a process of manipulation towards "uniting" the two groups which was completed by devious means when a new archbishop arrived a few years later.

On the interfaith front the church appeared to be expert at promoting friction between Muslim and Hindu communities to score points and to draw in the numbers for mass baptisms. In fact it was equally expert at generating friction within a community in which only cooperating and/or competing orders of the Roman Catholic Church were present. This became a very serious problem, especially in Japan. Jesuits, with their Spanish connection, and Franciscans with their Portuguese patronage, sank to public slanging matches, abuse of each other's practices and competition for both government recognition and the souls of the heathens. But it was only a curtain raiser compared with the friction which would build up once the reformed churches began to send missionaries into the field as well.

In 1622, just a hundred and one years after Luther had finally been excommunicated and well over a century since the Kings of Spain and Portugal accepted responsibility for organizing the church overseas, the Vatican finally decided that it should be responsible for organizing Christian mission work and not the political rulers of the states of Europe. Its motives were mixed but in establishing the Sacred Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith (the Propaganda) it at least took a step in the right direction. The Vatican had been jolted into realizing that the world was a big place; that there were a lot of people to whom the Gospel had to be taken; that the political powers were not the proper bodies for the job; that the other world faiths were actively evangelizing; and that the Protestant Churches, being firmly established and not likely to dissolve into thin air, might get in first if Rome didn't. It also knew quite well that inter-order friction had developed, that differing doctrinal emphases were being preached and that the church would have to include clergy appointed from indigenous people if Christianity was to be more than an item of colonial trapping.

But as so often happens, the cake didn't look quite as good as the picture in the cookery book. The Propaganda became yet another instrument of repression working closely with the Inquisition in Europe and because of opposition from the two papal standard bearers and civil and mission officials in the field it did little outside Europe until the Spanish and Portuguese empires began to crumble.²⁹ But at the time that the Propaganda was set up those empires had not crumbled and the slave trade, a hallmark and a legacy of the church's involvement in the European colonial era, was in full swing. The church, sugar and European slave traders had all arrived in Africa together.

SUGAR AND SLAVES

The unoccupied island of Sao Tome in the Gulf of Guinea was sighted by Portuguese opportunists while they were setting up posts to collect and ship gold from the Gold Coast and they assessed it as suitable for sugar cane cropping. Sugar had been introduced to Palestine, Syria and Egypt via the delta of the Tigris from its natural habitat in India by Arab traders. The Crusaders then took it to Sicily and the Iberian Peninsula and Prince Henry arranged for it to be grown by Portuguese settlers on Madeira. But sugar cropping was labour intensive and Portuguese growers found difficulty competing against the preferred product from Egypt. So when plans were made to establish a settlement on Sao Tome and to open a Catholic mission on the Congo in 1490 the action was a bit like that in a shunting yard. Settlers and their cane were dropped at the island. Priests were escorted on to the Congo to set up Christ's kingdom, and the first slaves of the new era were shipped offshore to set up the settlers' kingdom.³⁰ The rush had started. The Spanish planted sugar in the Canary Islands the following year and it was from there that Columbus took it to the Caribbean only two years later.³¹ The crop was successful but the settlers were not. The settlement failed due to the lack of labour and when it was re-established African slaves were there to do the hard work.³²

Everywhere the Portuguese and Spanish went, sugar and slaves went too. By 1583 there were over one hundred sugar mills in Portuguese Brazil producing 2,700 tons of sugar for the tables of Europe between them. It was to Brazil that the first trans Atlantic shipment of African slaves was taken in 1510. Before that the gold mine and plantation operators had tried Europeans as slaves but they proved unmanageable and decidedly homicidal so they soon turned to both Amerindians, who were being pacified and baptized by the church, and Africans who were even more peaceable.^{33 34} However in the early stages of the slave trade the emphasis was on slaves for the markets of Europe and not the New World. An estimated 35,000 people had been 'exported', mainly to Portugal, Spain, Italy and Sicily before 1500.³⁵ Europe's collective consciences were therefore well-conditioned to the concept of the trade before its sheer greed for the resources of the Americas triggered the Atlantic flood. But the church, which ought to have taken strong action against it, had worked itself into such a corner that it was totally incapable of opposing the sordid business. It clearly lacked both the moral standards and the interest to do anything about it and in any case it had chained itself economically and politically to those who operated the trade. There were many who were scared to rock the boat because the tattered fabric of the institution would tear straight down the middle if it took a stand on the issue.

The situation was remarkably similar to that which followed the Black Death when the church was incapable of applying moral judgements to economic policy and fell down on the side of human oppression. It did the same with the new era of slavery. It is doing the same with abuses of the capitalism of today. In each case the church's view of itself and its role and the need to maintain the institution have been the root of the problem. There were occasional churchmen who spoke out against slavery but the vast majority either supported it and could misquote scripture to justify their stand or were simply apathetic. Somewhat surprisingly Pope Leo X, of banquets, bare boys and bullfighting fame (chapter 12, page 25R) declared in a bull in 1514 that not only the Christian religion but nature (also) cries out against slavery and the slave trade.³⁶ Somewhat less surprisingly, little notice was taken of it in the atmosphere of the Lateran Council just three years before Luther swung his hammer.

THE BENEFITS OF BAPTISM ...

The attitude of the church is better illustrated by its practices. Among the duties of the bishop of Luanda, Angola, was the mass baptism of shiploads of slaves as they left with a one way ticket to paradise. He would sit in an ivory chair on the quayside baptizing bound slaves as they were rowed beneath him on their way to the ships. On the other hand, later English clergy declined to baptize slaves on the basis that it was wrong to keep a Christian soul in slavery.³⁷ There is no end to the interpretations of baptism, the church and the role of the clergy which can be drawn from such situations. For one thing, the church was saying quite clearly that it could arbitrarily determine who would get to heaven and who would not. That ties in with the indulgences controversy, too. Again it was being consistent, saying “your earthly physical condition is none of our concern” and guaranteeing that social reform would become the province of political movements. However it was also saying that black Africans were not worth saving and that if it chose to do anything for them a touch of its magic would compensate for a lifetime of degradation, broken spirit, cruelty and probably an early death. This was indeed its most important response.

By being associated with the slave trade in the way that it was the church did more to consolidate racialism than murderous marauding Conquistadores, sophisticated English business gentlemen or grasping governments could have done in all history if the church had stood against them. It guaranteed that wherever European Christianity went racialism would rear its ugly head. As the slave trade became more profitable, as Portugal strengthened its grip in Africa and as the traders became more confident the church waded deeper and deeper into the mire. One of its most common justifications for its involvement was that both Jews and Muslims were already in it up to their necks in league with African traders and rulers. What a wonderful compliment to its senior and junior partners in the triangle that the Christian church had to follow their examples. If the best it could do was emulate them or use the actions of their adherents to justify its own actions or those of its adherents then it was damning itself and its own attitudes and it should have reversed its efforts to eliminate its partners. In fact it not only emulated them, it outbid them on a grand scale.

Slavery under the Roman Empire and again under its European Christian successors of the second slave trade era was generally far more barbaric than bonded service east of Suez. Actually slavery and the slave trade east of Suez had not stopped when it finally ground to a halt (or perhaps more correctly when it evolved into the feudal serf system under the combined pressures of the church and an ailing economy) in the Roman Empire. This means that the slavery in which Jewish and Muslim traders were involved in East Africa and the Sudan was a continuation of the horrific slave system which predated all three of the faiths. It had been modified by the ebb and flow of each force of invaders, including the Mongols, the Turks and the Crusaders and it had also been influenced by the teachings of both Judaism and Islam.

However the constructive influence which Christianity might have exerted had been inhibited by the actions of the church itself and the influence of its major effort, the crusades, had been distinctly counterproductive. The church must therefore accept a large share of the blame for the continuation of slavery east of Suez, and any defence of its position during the colonial era on the basis of competition with an existing market force is sheer fabrication to camouflage hypocrisy. Jewish community and social law had evolved when the conditions of slaves were harsh indeed. It imposed responsibilities on masters and ensured rights for their slaves which are remarkably enlightened in view of conditions in the surrounding empires.³⁸ There is every reason to believe that Jews involved in the modern slave trade in Europe, North Africa and Asia Minor adopted a similarly enlightened attitude. They had gained sufficient experience of the trade at very close quarters over a long period to know a lot about it. East of Suez, only a small proportion of bonded servants were bought for direct income earning manual labour in situations such as plantations, for dock gangs, as pearl divers and as merchant crewmen. The majority were used in non-income-earning or service situations such as guards and mercenary soldiers, domestic and personal servants and as concubines. Their conditions were relatively easy and they were usually treated sympathetically as human beings.

In sharp contrast, slaves under Roman rule, and again under the modern European powers, were essentially income-producing and saleable chattels. They did the heavy manual labour, the demeaning and dirty tasks, had few rights, often could not marry, were seldom allowed to earn a personal income, suffered intense privation and were expendable if their work output was below expected levels. A plantation, mine or factory owner could own many hundreds of his fellow human beings and as they were not only valueless but a cost to feed when they were too old or weak to work they seldom reached that stage. Although only the fittest men and women were shipped after a close physical examination, naked of course, death rates on the voyage from Africa to America reached 26 percent and were typically 13 percent. Infant mortality among babies born in slavery was as high as 50 percent.³⁹

The scale of the trade east of Suez never approached the scale of the trade to the west and Arab slave traders usually bought their slaves by negotiation at their coastal stations from African or Swahili (Afro-Arab) traders who brought caravans of Africans from inland carrying gold, ivory and other goods for sale and then sold the carriers as well as the goods. The pattern only changed to large scale inland raiding some years after the expulsion of the Portuguese from the central east coast when the Omani Sultan moved to Zanzibar to protect his interests and began competing directly with the European powers which had begun to exploit the “labour resources” of east as well as west Africa because of the political intrigue between them.⁴⁰

... AND THE BENEFITS OF BONDAGE

Under non-European masters there was a marked tendency for bonded servants to become their personal confidants and to rise to positions of authority and great responsibility in contrast to the servile roles reserved for slaves by Europeans. This contrast and anomalies within the eastern system had showed up from time to time but they were thrust into sharp relief soon after the dynasty of the Abbasids was established in 750. (chapter 10, page 11R) In order to support the idea which they were promoting that they were predestined to lead Islam, the Abbasid caliphs felt obliged to demonstrate in some way that they were different from or set apart from the people of the world. No one was of equal rank to the Abbasids while everyone apart from them was equal. They therefore adopted the policy of marrying only slaves and not a single Abbasid caliph was born the son of a free mother after 800.^{41 42}

The motivation behind that policy was more than suspect. It was not supportable either in terms of Muhammad’s teaching or the logic of human relationships. However the policy itself had an immense influence. It obviously raised the status of slaves and led to further improvements in their conditions and opportunities. It also strengthened intensely the established Muslim beliefs in the personal equality of all men before God and the absolute right and obligation for all men to approach God directly without any intermediaries and, as already noted, those beliefs and the traditional forms of Christian ministry, sacraments and rites were just not compatible. But even more important, even though the policy gave validity to the slave trade, those Muslim beliefs negated any supposed basis for racism and therefore made it much simpler for four out of five people to know God through Islam than through the Christian church with its deeply entrenched racial prejudices.

Strangely enough it was under the Abbasid caliphate that the use of African slave labour for sugar cultivation became an issue and not under the Portuguese at Sao Tome. Sugar cane had been grown in small quantities along the Tigris for about 400 years but the government now decided on a labour intensive scheme to desalinate and denitrify large plantations, and large communities of African slaves were established. The area near Basra, was part of that which had formed the short-lived Jewish kingdom of Mahoza 350 years earlier. There was still a large Jewish population in the region and it was the centre of a Karaite sect which preached what was, to orthodox Jews, the heresy that the Talmud was unnecessary and that the Bible had sufficient guidance for every man. A schism developed within Judaism as its fundamentalist teachings, rejection of Rabbinical traditions as a source of authority and its stoic, almost primitive, approach to life spread across Asia Minor, along the Mediterranean to Spain and into eastern Europe and the Russian principalities. Its overall impact was to stimulate a renewal within Rabbinical Judaism which was more effective than the later Reformation within Christianity.^{43 44} However its local influence was also very important. It coupled with the rousing leadership of an African slave overseer to inspire an uprising by the sugar slaves against the weak government authorities in the region. The inexperienced but highly disciplined slaves organized a state and held it together for fourteen years. The army, which also had large contingents of slaves, was not at all keen to put down the uprising, even after the shock of a massacre in Basra in 871 and a punitive expedition near Baghdad in 879. Similarly the caliph, al Mu'tamid, was not keen to put them down by force because of his Abbasid philosophy.

When the slave state was eventually overthrown in 833 the economic structure of the region was not greatly altered and the rebel slaves were integrated into the caliph's army instead of being forced to return to cane field drainage work.⁴⁵ Two other notable armies during this period also included contingents of slaves. In Egypt the army of Ibn Tulun was made up largely of Greek, Sudanese, Berber and Turkish slaves.⁴⁶ In Spain the army included Berber, Christian Spanish and European slave troops but it was largely in action against European Christians of the Holy Roman Empire, and the Muslim government also recruited Christians and Jews into its civil service in the normal manner.⁴⁷ The presence of those slave troops was therefore arguably more disruptive than elsewhere.

When the Ghurids, who had adopted Islam, invaded India it was a Turkish slave, Aibak, who commanded the army which captured Delhi in 1193 and during the years that followed a number of autonomous "slave rulers" governed states as far east as Bengal.⁴⁸ Then in 1250,

(just when Pope Innocent IV was busy introducing the rack for the correction of heretics in Christian Europe, having just excommunicated his emperor and having persuaded Louis IX to lead his crusade), a slave – and a woman at that – became ruler of Egypt in her own right. She was Shajar ad Durr. Born a slave, she became wife of the Ayyubid Sultan of Syria and Egypt, then regent-empress for her son while he regained Damietta from Louis' crusaders. Named ruler by the palace guard of Turkish slave-officers, she married one of them, General Aibak, and finally met a violent death in a palace power struggle. On her death another of the Turkish slave officers assumed the role of Sultan as the first of a series of "slave rulers" of the Mamluk Sultanate.⁴⁹

Such was the environment in which slavery existed east of Suez, the treatment of slaves and the opportunities for them when Europe set out to make its fortune from them. The impact of Judaism and Islam on the philosophy and conduct of the slave trade which had continued without a break from the days of Ebla and Abraham and through the days of Severus and the slaves he carted off to Rome from Jerusalem, was quite apparent. Such also was the situation in which the mainstream of the church could have exerted a strong influence if it had not botched up every opportunity which came its way because of its view of itself and the doctrinal and political barriers which it had built around itself. Now, as it rode into the New World on the shoulders of its colonial collaborators, if the best it could do was emulate its partners in the triangle or use the actions of their adherents to justify its own actions and those of its adherents then it was damning itself and its own attitudes. It should have reversed its efforts to eliminate them on the simple basis that if a thing is good enough to emulate it is too good to destroy. In fact it did not emulate them. It outbid them in a very negative manner.

Slavery under the Christian successors of the depraved Roman Empire in the second slave trade era was generally far more barbaric than under their partners in the triangle to the east of Suez. The consequences of that trade and the church's involvement in it were to build up gradually to become a hidden legacy as the trouble in the triangle reaches its twentieth century climax. Europeans often invoked the church's teaching that "your sins shall find you out" as a lever to keep Christianized slaves, freedmen and indentured labourers in docile subjection. They didn't know that they would become the best illustration of their own teaching. They were following their leaders. But their leaders had lost touch with the others up front.

CHAPTER 12

LET'S MAKE A NEW START

For eight hundred years the rigid bonds of the church's self-understanding had restrained European man's reach for salvation. It had restricted his capacity to think freely and his capacity to develop, and it had prevented him from living in neighbourly love and harmony. But by the middle of the sixteenth century those bonds had been subjected to severe stress. Contact and conflict between the church and its partners in the triangle which it so heartily despised, coupled with political and economic developments across the land mass of Europe and Asia, and the internal audit of the Reformation, had tugged, twisted and loosened those bonds so that people were gaining a bit more freedom to breathe and flex their muscles. However although there were signs of hope, the bonds were still holding and the effective power of the church had not yet been broken.

RENAISSANCE!

Yes. There were signs of hope in escape from the tyranny which was Europe. The first signs were evident during the pre-Renaissance period in Italy which writers variously trace from as early as the poet Dante, when there was a revival of interest in classic literature in the late thirteenth century, or from Petrarch whom some regard as the first humanist, early in the fourteenth century. The stimulus for that development was provided indirectly by the church and the powers of the Holy Roman Empire through their failure to provide a stable and unifying framework for the organization of spiritual and material life during the period when there was a rise in importance of city-states and national monarchies, the development of national languages, and the breakup of old feudal structures. Those failures and the stirring of Renaissance were much more apparent by the end of the fourteenth century when influential scholars sloughed off their dependence on the church's teaching system and took bold new initiatives in the arts and architecture, philosophy and even science. The trend was probably recognized, but it was certainly encouraged, by Pope Nicholas V – the same one who issued the infamous Bull of Crusade, Pontifex Maximus – when he set up a library in the Vatican and sponsored the translation of Greek classics. However the coincidence of those two actions suggests that his motive was the reinforcement of the church's dominance rather than stimulation of a trend which would subsequently undermine that dominance.

Stimulated by the fall of Constantinople and the movement of Christian scholars from the east to Rome as refugees, or into self-imposed exile, the Renaissance as we understand it was about to burst and impact in Germany and other European states. So: as the Renaissance was bursting, the era of exploration and colonization also burst, followed by the Reformation and three major thrusts of human endeavour went forward in parallel. Each influenced and contributed to the others, and as it happened people who had had a gut full of the church and were not prepared to kowtow to it any longer, could pick up their bits and pieces and move across to the New World with their family and friends who felt the same way. And that is exactly what oppressed Europeans did in droves, especially when the Church of Rome's bid to reverse the expanding Protestant movements in the so-called "Counter Reformation" really got underway from the mid 1500s. That pressure, which continued until well after the end of the Thirty Years War a hundred years later, guaranteed that there would be a steady stream of people of vigorous Protestant faith flowing out from the clutches of the corrupt and repressive churches and states which they feared and despised towards the unknown where they could fashion a new environment and a new life.

Those emigrants, or religious refugees, would be side by side with the papal standard bearers of Spain and Portugal, so that friction was to be expected as they confronted each other's religious doctrines, practices and personal philosophies. They would be side by side with the greedy traders, princes and explorers whose main interests were exploitation of the resources of "new" lands and routes to the east around the so-called Turkish/Arab trade barrier so that they could challenge whatever abuses might occur. They would be side by side with the bigoted papal emissaries and the junior partners in the triangle against whom the Vatican was still planning to launch yet another crusade. In due course they would also be side by side with fleet after fleet of European society's outcasts, shipped off as convicts to minimize the pressure for prison, law and social reform, mainly in England. They would have plenty of opportunities to practice what they preached about human relations.

That steady stream of people faced immense challenges but they set out in high spirits, very conscious of their role and responsibilities and making a lot of noise about putting their trust in God. Their situation and their motives have been neatly summed up by the Librarian of Congress:

The Pilgrim Fathers did not by any means see the New World as that revolutionary opportunity to new-fashion society. On the contrary, they were escaping in order to old-fashion it to the perfect Biblical model. They aimed not at making history, but at fulfilling theology.¹

They would certainly not lack opportunities. Settlement of the great bulk of North America had been surprisingly slow after the headlong rush of the Spanish into the region of the Caribbean and the Gulf of Mexico ran out of steam. One reason was that the kings, princes and popes of Europe were still intent on redrawing the map of their continent to the disadvantage of everyone except themselves. They alternately secured and denied religious and political freedom and office for groups and principalities which moved in and out of favour. But another reason was that North America was not an attractive proposition. The entire continent north of the Gulf of Mexico was virtually uninhabited. There were a mere one million people in an area more than four times as great as the whole of western Europe.² There had been very little direct contact with them, they didn't build towns and the Atlantic coast was not very welcoming. That meant there was no one to plunder. There were not even communities to trade with legitimately. Any crop production or raw materials had to be found and won the hard way and there wasn't even a docile population to put to work to do it! Men had to be mad to go there or, at least, be the victims of circumstance. The circumstances were not propitious.

COPERNICUS: A CHALLENGE TO CREDIBILITY

Europe's headlong rush for spoils which had been stimulated by the fall of Constantinople in 1453 and the promulgation of Rominus Pontifex immediately afterwards had provided a most uninspiring start – in fact a totally degrading and depraved start – for European settlement in the bold new world. As the rush got underway the world was still spinning- perhaps reeling – from the impact of a challenge to the authority of the papacy which Nicolaus Copernicus had triggered. The trouble began when the brilliant young Pole, then only 26 years old, became professor of astronomy at Rome University. He had actually studied both law and medicine. He became uneasy when he found that he had to teach the belief (which had not been questioned for 1,350 years) that the universe revolved around the earth which was the centre piece of creation over which the popes ruled, on behalf of God, of course. His own observations led him to believe that the sun was the centre of the universe and that the earth revolved around that.³ But it was 1499. The criminal pope from Spain, Alexander VI, “a slave to his vices to the last”, whose affairs have been noted several times already, was in the middle of carving up the brave new world and commanding Michelangelo to adorn the Vatican in a manner fit for a universal pope rather than for “the most humiliating pontificate in the whole history of the church.”⁴ He was greatly encouraged by the wealth which Columbus had discovered and which he and his bothers were intent on exploiting in Hispaniola with ruthless repression, excessive use of the noose, and the enslavement of the indigenous people either for work in the placer mines or for export to Europe. He expected to reap some of the benefits to finance his self-aggrandisement. He must have known that the Spanish Chief Justice had responded to reports of atrocities and the appeals of the people of Hispaniola and was on his way to the colony where Columbus and his brothers were arrested for return to Spain in chains. But Alexander VI and his loyal royals in Spain were all so impressed by Columbus' further reports, liberally laced with biblical illusions to the Earthly Paradise, close to nearby realms of gold which he was sure he could locate, that they soon released him to undertake another voyage.

In those circumstances Copernicus realized that to teach his own theory would seriously test the credibility of the papal position and that it could turn people back towards the sun worship of the pre-Christian era. He must also have realized the personal danger that it would place him in. He left his teaching post, returned home, took part time posts as canon at Frauenburg

Cathedral and physician to the bishop (his uncle) while he continued his investigations. He confirmed his earlier belief and prepared a summary of his work which, we are told, received the approbation of the pope at the time, Clement VII.⁵ But as it was then 1531 and the Protestant princes, the Emperor and the Vatican were trying to tear each other apart and stave off the Infidels at the same time, the paper was not published. It was eventually published just before he died in 1543. The controversy which he had feared was not long in breaking.

Publication of the paper coincided with, and drew attention to, another effect of the Reformation which was just beginning to show up. The church had always kept a very tight rein on the six universities established in Europe up to the Reformation as well as on advanced studies undertaken through its monastic system. Any deviation from the church's doctrinal or dogmatic teaching was just not permitted. Once the pope ruled on any subject, that was the end of the debate and, like a modern TV quiz program, no correspondence (or research) was to be entered into. But now a few thinkers began to get a little bolder. If reform theologians were game to question the correctness and even the authority of the pope why shouldn't physicists, astronomers and other scientists? After all if the church based its claims to ultimate authority even partly on scientific assumptions which were not correct, then what other assumptions which the church insisted on may also be found to be incorrect? And if its assumptions were incorrect, what did that say about its self-understanding and the doctrines which it had developed and on which its self-understanding and claims to authority were based? That challenge had to be suppressed!

THE PAPAL RESPONSE: THE SOCIETY OF JESUS ...

A new teaching and missionary order had been established in 1534 in the heat of the Reformation controversy by Ignatius Loyola a wealthy knight of the Spanish Basque province of Guipúzcoa who had served the duke of Nájera and been injured in the defence of the citadel of Pamplona against the French in 1521. It soon became the pope's means of suppressing dissent and ensuring conformity to established doctrine and dogma. Initially small, a group of only six companions, it based its conduct on The Book of Spiritual Exercises which Loyola had written, and adopted a program of poverty, chastity and pilgrimage or, roughly, missionary endeavour. However in 1537 the six offered their services directly to the pope, Paul III. He subsequently approved the Spiritual Exercises, which were markedly different from normal Catholic practice for religious orders, and a constitution for the Society of Jesus which included a special vow of obedience to the pope, which Loyola regarded as "the cause and principal foundation" of his society, and which had a highly disciplined hierarchical structure. It took effect in 1540. Known as the Jesuits, its members thereupon became, for practical purposes, the pope's private army, committed to imposing whatever may be the pope's whim from time to time. That was generally a campaign to undermine the Reformation, to strengthen the Catholic position through the Counter Reformation, to retain its strong links with the self-perpetuating civil powers, and to beat the Reformed and Protestant churches to establish missions and to evangelize the world beyond Europe. With virtually limitless resources at Loyola's disposal, the order flourished and expanded at a great rate. Within twenty two years the society was operating in twelve provinces with more than a thousand members: three in Italy, three in Spain, two in Germany, one in France, one in Portugal, and two beyond Europe, in India and Brazil. But with quite unusual autonomy it was widely feared and distrusted and the theology and practices which it sought to impose were opposed from within the Catholic Church as well as by Protestant and Reformed churches. A hundred years later it was in deep trouble.

Other issues linked to the reform movement continued to arise as well. During the years which followed Luther's challenge to the church, radical reformers had been urging changes not only to liturgy and theology but to the patterns of government, relations between church and state, and the rights of peasants. Those issues could not be separated. They were intimately interwoven. The radicals wanted concrete liberties for peasants under game and forest laws and changes to the system of tithes or taxes on all rural production which, officially, financed the church, its clergy, and elementary welfare services. However some of the tithes were appropriated for personal and commercial purposes which had nothing to do with the church, and political unrest increased.

In 1523, six years after the '95 theses,' Luther was in a bind. He had thought only in terms of the theology involved when he issued his challenge. In emphasizing the sole authority of God, and the direct relationship between the individual and God through the medium of conscience, he and other Reformers had dissolved at one stroke the complex web of religiously sanctified duties and obligations that bound together the ranks of the feudal hierarchy. At the same time, by sanctifying work as a religious duty, they had given an impetus to the industrious middle classes who had only ever fitted uneasily into the feudal order. In effect the Reformation had pulled the rug out from under the feudal social order and now he could see that the radical teachings could provoke revolution. But he had no intention of changing the relationships between the power of the church and the princes or the economic system which they jointly controlled, and he published a paper, "Of Earthly Government." He firmly asserted the duty of a Christian prince and the place of secular government within God's ordinances for mankind; distinguished between the two realms of spiritual and temporal government, through which the one rule of God is administered; and stressed the duty of civil obedience and the sinfulness of rebellion against lawful authority.

Two years later, in 1525, when a prominent radical reformer, Thomas Muntzer, helped lead a peasants' revolt against the princes, Luther held to his stated position. He published a statement sympathizing with the just grievances of the peasants, criticizing the princes, denouncing such social evils as usury, repudiating the notion of a 'Christian rebellion,' and noting that the worldly kingdom could not exist without inequality of persons. He then declined to act as a mediator between the opposing groups and when the revolt erupted, with some prospects of success, Luther feared imminent political chaos. Acting in league with the princes who provided his security and his power base, he wrote yet another article which was trenchantly critical of the "Murdering and Thieving Hordes of Peasants." His consistency cannot be disputed, but while he retained the support of the princes he lost the confidence of the peasants. Many of them moved into the camp of the Anabaptists and they continued pressing for economic and social change through other means. Change came gradually and with it came steady growth in the development of local enterprises and the requirement for more small commercial loans. This kept the question of usury in the public eye and in 1545, fearing a backlash from the strengthening reform movements, the English government introduced a fixed legal maximum rate of interest on loans. Other countries soon followed with similar laws. They were, in part, recognition that the lender of money on fixed interest did not share the risks of a venture being financed with the person who provided the initiative and the labour, but it was also a reaction to the growing influence of the reformers. Social upheaval could not be allowed to spill across international boundaries.

... AND AN 'EDUCATIONAL ACHIEVEMENT'

Then there was another issue related to authority, who was fit to exercise it, and doctrinal purity. It was the issue of who was fit to teach and maintain the faith and all its appendages, and, therefore, to administer the sacraments which went with them. The faith may have originated in Asia Minor and Jesus may not have been a European, but that did not give anyone other than a European under authority of the Roman pope the right or the capacity to teach it. Surely the Creed of St. Athanasius made that clear. So: in 1555 the first Council of Mexico, acting faithfully on the excellent examples set for it by its king back home, prohibited any person not of European race from being admitted to religious orders. Apologists for the church try to present that ruling as a matter of educational achievement and not racism but their case is thin indeed. It was 35 years since the destruction of the Aztec civilization and its remarkable capital Tenochtitlan, and surely that was time enough to provide formal education for a handful of the baptized local people to the doubtful levels required to satisfy admission to the clerical orders of the day. But even if every young Aztec had refused to accept Spanish education in the "four R's", ('retched Romish religion added to "readin', 'ritin' and 'rithmetic") so that the council's action could be given a thin veneer of respectability, the events of the next twenty years or so completely expose the motives of the church and the king.

That prohibition was issued in the year that Philip, king of Spain, decreed death for any layman who dared to read the Bible for himself and, seemingly concerned for the welfare of Holland's heretics and Protestants, sent his leading general, Alva, to help them to conform to his wishes eleven years later. The violence with which Alva responded to his master's voice left Holland without either civil liberties or rebels.⁶ They had fled to Germany and England where a handful later took a trip on the Mayflower.⁷

ELIZABETH: THE POLITICS OF FAITH

Elizabeth found it opportune to approve the Thirty Nine Articles of Faith^{8 9} in 1563 as a means of resolving the Anglo-Roman dispute which Henry VIII had precipitated by his affairs of the heart (see chapter 13) and, when she learned that an English ship was slave running for the first time she rejected slavery on moral and religious grounds with the words: "If any African were carried away without his free consent it would be detestable and call down the vengeance of Heaven upon the undertaking." However she then very promptly bought shares in the second expedition for which she provided a ship and from which she pocketed the proceeds with gratification, all in a matter of months in 1563/64. Morality was not to interfere with profitability.^{10 11} If her attitudes and actions were anomalous they were no worse than those of the popes and Philip of Spain. While Elizabeth was approving the Thirty Nine Articles, Pope Pius IV, the former Inquisitor General and licentious father of at least three illegitimate children,¹² was presiding over the final session of the Council of Trent which confirmed that celibacy was obligatory for the clergy. Holy Orders were to remain "an invalidating impediment to marriage"¹³ but not, it would seem, to sexual excesses.

In Britain, Elizabeth had strengthened her position somewhat since she promulgated the Thirty Nine Articles and she reacted to the papal intrigue against her and to being excommunicated in 1570 by tightening penal measures against Roman Catholics progressively from that time. In his bull of excommunication against Elizabeth, Pius V had not only repeated but embellished the spurious self-portrait of his predecessors and called on Spain and France to enforce it by war against Protestant Britain in the manner of a crusade against the Muslim Infidels. He made the claims of the first Abbasid Caliph, Abu'l'Abbas, which had begun the fragmentation of Islam (see chapters 10 and 11) read like the writings of an amateur. The only bright spot was that he said that he had been entrusted with the government of the one Holy Catholic and Apostolic Church, rather than claiming that it was his by delegation.

He that reigns in the highest, to whom has been given all power in heaven and earth, entrusted the government of the one Holy Catholic and Apostolic Church (outside which there is no salvation) to one man alone on the earth, namely to Peter, the chief of the Apostles, and to Peter's successor, the Roman pontiff, in fullness of power. This one man he has set up as chief over all nations and all kingdoms, to pluck up, destroy, scatter, dispose, plant and build ... (from) ... this supreme throne of justice.¹⁴ [Emphasis added.]

Britain was moving relentlessly towards its own civil war, the threat of a Spanish invasion, and the consequent execution of Mary Stuart who, as a logical alternative to the queen, provided a rallying point for Catholics. It was not simply another case of politics. The situation was symptomatic of the fact that the church had fashioned itself as an institution, and as a substitute for God, on the basis of earlier misunderstandings, and the more it sought to justify its position and its teachings the greater the degree of credulity was required of its believers. It had acted within the framework of humanity's freewill and its capacity to make decisions and choices, but it had not recognized the limits of its own corporate ability to comprehend the consequences of the decisions and concepts which it sought to impose on the world. It had gone too far. People had gained the unrestricted use of the printing press so that they could build on the ideas of other people, and there was relative ease of movement so that they could communicate directly with each other. Therefore once its civil power and its links with political power began to weaken and once people could work and think within their expanded parameters, the substitute would be exposed for what it was. A sham. And every scientific development would extend the process. After Copernicus it was irreversible. The evidence and the forces were building up for yet another challenge, but even the reformers were not conscious of it. They were flushed with the successes they had achieved and they were becoming more secure as separate entities, (or so they thought); but their minority situation, their ethics and the political situation eliminated the option of a frontal assault.

MARY: A NEW OATH

The church was not ready to make a fresh start. It was pressing on regardless. In 1449 Nicholas V had directed that all members of the University of Paris take an oath to defend the doctrine of the immaculate conception in connection, one assumes, with his pre-plague preparations for his abortive Holy Year. Other universities soon toed the papal line too. That was just 50 years before Copernicus came along to trigger tougher resistance within Europe's universities to the mind-crushing interference of the church. In the meantime, in 1476, the status of the cult of Mary and the doctrine of the immaculate conception had been strengthened and perpetuated by the institution of a mass, and a feast had also been added to the calendar. But as the Reformation picked up steam so did debate on Mary's role and the doctrine of immaculate conception. This was especially so in France and England. Then in 1571, shortly after he issued the bull of excommunication against Elizabeth, Pius V instituted the Feast of the Rosary to commemorate the victory of a bawdy Christian navy, crusading with Philip of Spain, over the Muslims at Lepanto. That victory, he said, was due to the rosaries recited that day by the Roman confraternities.¹⁵ Similarly, when the weakened Teutonic Knights defaulted and joined the Lutheran princes after the absorption of Novgorod by Moscow and the collapse of the Hanseatic League the Jesuits had assumed their trading mantle in the East and Latin America. Surely they were being blessed by divine intervention on the strength of Mary's intercession. They soon became the dominant bullion brokers and profiteers between Japan and China when they gained control of Nagasaki, also in 1571. But it would be only 16 years before they were expelled from Japan, dragging all other missions down with them.

Leading Mariologists such as the French Cardinal Berulle were determined that the Puritan reformers and the Jansenists would not appear to have an exclusive appeal through their rigorous moral servitude which was gaining recognition. They responded by declaring themselves slaves of the blessed virgin, taking vows of subservience to the mere person whose authority, they said, was even greater than that of God. They said that while God had only created the universe Mary had produced its author. To demonstrate their slavery they chained their necks and wrists. By 1621 their conduct and influence had become so depraved that even the Holy Office of the Inquisition was moved to act against them, even if in a somewhat half-hearted manner. It banned their vow of subservience, although it still permitted reference to the concept of implied bondage in private devotions.¹⁶ The development of such debasing ideas and practices should hardly surprise us in view of the church's attitude towards itself and God and the way it had not only allowed but actively imposed the cult of Mary.

But it was not only Rome which was stuck with a crisis of self-understanding. In 1572 Thomas Cartwright, a Cambridge professor of divinity, was dismissed for publishing his Puritanical views on the need for total separation of the church and state in England and elsewhere. He fled to the continent and remained there until it was safe to return to England in 1585. The efforts of people like him to eliminate the office of bishop and to introduce a Presbyterian style of church government were causing friction between the House of Lords, in which the bishops sat, and the House of Commons. But it was not until thirty-five years later that James I imposed the ultimate anti-Catholic oath of allegiance after the Jesuit-inspired gunpowder plot against him and parliament. Another eight years on and a general ban on Roman Catholicism was imposed right across Scandinavia. Protestant princes in England and Germany were conspiring to launch another war against the Vatican; China and Japan were both trying to expel their papal missions and the Holy Roman Empire was disintegrating piecemeal. It was like a manmade satellite plummeting earthwards through the atmosphere, sloughing off bits and pieces, its human designers having to abort its mission through their errors after every effort to hold it in its manmade heavenly course. Stripped of some of its burden, its operators have managed to keep it aloft in a modified orbit, but today the world still waits for the big bang while its designers still refuse to admit any errors in their basic design. And talking of satellites, one of the people who contributed to the debates and could be credited with encouraging the turmoil was Giordano Bruno, who was born five years after Copernicus died. Bruno joined the Dominican order at the age of 14, read philosophy and took up Copernicus' theory, criticized the church's official position and was censured. In 1576 he fled to England and wrote extensively. When he returned to the Continent in 1592 it didn't take the Inquisition long to nab him and press accusations of pantheism. It was exactly what Copernicus had feared would happen. When Bruno refused to recant he was held in confinement for eight years before being invited to make his short walk to the stake in 1600.

GREGORY'S CHANGE OF DIRECTION

In the meantime, also in 1576, Pope Gregory XIII had finally overruled the Council of Mexico's long standing decision and permitted the ordination of half-castes and the illegitimate sons of European men and Amerindian women in view of the lack of priests who knew the Indian language. Then, two years later, Philip, most upset, and exercising his fully delegated authority for the conduct of the Catholic Church in his realms, countermanded the papal decision with his personal directive that holy orders were not to be conferred on those mestizos. It was a simple extension of the debate over baptism of African slaves. Philip wasn't only jealously guarding his authority for the conduct of the church. He was hell-bent on preserving Spain's exclusive papal right to the entire north American continent. Nine years earlier, in 1565, when a French expedition tried to establish a settlement in Carolina (largely prompted by France's religious civil war) Philip had first done battle with the French fleet and then indignantly established a Spanish settlement further south, at St. Augustine in Florida, with the first Catholic Church in what was to become the United States of America. But he had not only upset the English, Dutch and French. He was in real trouble at home too. Only three years later he reinforced the Inquisition in Spain with bitter intensity and imposed a total ban on all Moorish customs and literature. His and his forbears' bigotry was beginning to reap its rewards. His religious, economic and political policies combined to bring on a rapid decline in Spain's stature and fortunes (which was already apparent before his joust with the pope) as well as putting pressure on reformers and Puritans to flee to the New World.

It is hardly uplifting to note that, in the midst of such turmoil, the first serious attempt to establish an English settlement in North America was the unsuccessful one in 1584 by Walter Raleigh to grow a highly profitable narcotic which the health authorities of the world are now doing their best to discourage. There were any number of food crops which Europe needed more, but Raleigh was knighted by Elizabeth I for his trouble, of course. However it would be another 34 years before the first Negro slaves were landed by a Dutch vessel to do all the hard yakka for the handful of Englishmen at their 12-year old Protestant settlement of Jamestown, Virginia, in 1620. The 'Mayflower' dropped anchor off New Plymouth the same year with the first party of Puritan Pilgrims from Congregational Separatist communities in England and Holland. The Negroes were "required" to help the Virginians grow that crop – tobacco – which was entirely new to Europe.

BACON'S INTERVENTION

By the time they arrived there were a number of other luminaries bringing pressure to bear for change and social and economic renewal. Among them was Sir Francis Bacon, later Viscount St. Alban and Baron of Verulam, a barrister and lecturer in law who came to prominence in England in 1589 when he wrote a 'Letter of Advice' to Queen Elizabeth I and published 'An Advertisement Touching the Controversies of the Church of England.' Such an audacious bid to interfere in the affairs of state and church brought him prominence as thinker in a new age of Enlightenment in which the impregnable intellectual and political edifice of European Christianity was being challenged by the combination of three complex movements, but it brought him into disgrace with the establishment and curtailed his advancement in law and politics for a few years. However, not to be suppressed for long, Bacon continued to write and when Elizabeth died in 1603 he was soon ushered into the Commons, appointed a commissioner for the purposes of uniting England and Scotland, and his influence in redirecting English legal and civil development was outstanding. In quick succession between 1605 and 1614 he published Advancement of Learning, The Wisdom of the Ancients, Essays and The New Atlantis. He held a series of cabinet posts, rising to Lord Chancellor in 1618.

HUMANISM, PREDESTINATION AND ARMINIUS

Just at that time debate within the Reformed churches over the relationship between humanism and the Christian understanding of predestination and divine control of the affairs of humanity was reaching a very distracting peak, and the Synod of the Assembly of the Dutch reformed Church was convened by the States-General at Dort, in the Netherlands, in 1619. Its purpose was to settle the Arminian Controversy. Professor Jacobus Arminius of Leyden had had the audacity to query the Calvinist Doctrine of Predestination and to insist that Divine Sovereignty was compatible with human free will. This contradicted the notion that the human population was divided by God into two schools: the elect and the reprobate damned for whom there could be no salvation. He had logic on his side. To argue otherwise was to argue that there were limits on God's power of creativity which the Calvinists, without realizing it, were doing. But he went further. He argued that Christ died to lead all humanity towards salvation and not only the elect. That raised questions about a number of other concepts being debated within the church and it led inevitably to the position which the church had been in ever since it sought to enshrine its understanding of Jesus of Nazareth in doctrinal statements. Every idea had to be condemned and eliminated which did not conform to the majority decision of a council of theologians or church politicians.

There was certainly inconsistency between the two basic concepts under discussion; the prescribed predestination of Calvinism and the free will of Humanism. Put simply, in common understanding, if human fate was predestined, then human effort was of little consequence. The debate was, of course, far from that simple. Humanists placed emphasis on the supreme value, importance and centrality of humanity in the universe. They were suspicious of scientific endeavour and tended to be indifferent to religious imperatives, although the majority made firm avowals of Christian faith. It could still be a serious disadvantage if one chose not to do so. Heretics were still being burned at the stake in France and there were plenty of people elsewhere who were eager to demonstrate that the stake was certainly not a museum piece. The Humanists put new emphasis on personal responsibility and on a person's capacity to determine his or her own responses and performance, and therefore on their place in society and the social order. This was in large measure a result of the reawakening of interest in the classic philosophers who had been submerged by the torrent of Christian doctrine and dogma – in particular, Plato. The Humanist philosophy, like Christianity, had many streams and interpreters, but overall it was a moral and literary movement rather than a narrow philosophical movement. Similarly the Reformers were far from unanimous in what they understood by pre-destination. Furthermore the limits of their debate were constrained by the imperative that they must stay within Trinitarian belief. Stray beyond that, and you were gone! There was a clear danger that as a person enquired into Humanism and into the secular realm, he or she would stray away from faith. Not from belief in God. Just from faith as prescribed by the church. But because there could be no discussion about the fundamentals of faith, it was very difficult to recognize that the morality and basic understanding of Humanism did not preclude either belief in God as creator or the concept of divine intervention and circumstantial predestination.

Although Calvin had made the doctrine of predestination a cornerstone of his system he had never sought to spell out the consequences of predestination. The concept was so complex that few people had. In fact Calvin was in sympathy with the basic ideas of humanism, his understanding of predestination was very similar to that of both Luther and Thomas Aquinas, and it was not of central importance to his theology. But he stated it very emphatically. It was a great mystery, to be approached with fear and trembling in the context of faith, and he saw it as a comforting doctrine which said, simply, that salvation would be taken care of by a loving and utterly reliable God. Now, because it was subject to much debate and Calvin had made acceptance of it a cornerstone of his system, the people steering the Synod of Dort decided that it was time to spell out a corollary of predestination. They passed five articles asserting unconditional election, a limited atonement, the total depravity of man, the irresistibility of grace, and the final perseverance of the saints. Then, as with so many of the church's early synods, they had to kill the debate by getting rid of the trouble makers.

About two hundred clergy were deprived of their posts and recognition. Some were persecuted. Many were banished. They moved to other splinter denominations and from their new posts they exerted considerable influence on the development of later Protestant theology. But the mainstream Calvinist Reform churches were locked into doctrinaire support for the concept of predestination. It followed, to the ordinary mind, that if one was predestined by an external decree of God to either salvation or damnation, then one was also predestined to one's status. With status comes either power, authority and money, or the lack of power, authority and money. Calvin's teachings had had the effect of legitimizing both usury and wealth, and this had proved especially attractive to the rising merchant and manufacturing classes both in Geneva and elsewhere. That was a very sobering thought for the majority, but the princes and the bureaucrats loved it! Just don't argue. Get on and accept life as it is. Boat-rocking had to stop. Any basis for criticism or reform of the communal and economic structure of society was undermined. The Reformed Churches were anchored to a conservative position in matters political, economic and social. This was essentially the same position that Luther had reached at the time of the peasant's revolt. And this was a fundamental influence which later led Max Weber to write that Capitalism was linked to the Protestant Ethic. In retrospect, the Synod of Dort had ensured that the twin streams of humanism and natural science would become more closely intertwined, and that a more reasoned or analytical approach to philosophy and religion would follow.

On the fringe of the theological debate at that time there was also another development which owed its origins to the Renaissance: the rise of Rosicrucianism following the publication of the Fama Fraternitatis (Account of the Brotherhood) in 1614. Some writers contend that the growth of the sect, which still has lodges in Britain, the United States, Australia and possibly other countries, resulted from the anonymous publication of writings which sought to satirize Christianity by introducing alchemy and the investigation of esoteric matters.¹⁷ Others regard it as a serious attempt to relate Christian teachings to elements of occultism drawing on philosophers and the religious experience of the Middle East and North Africa prior to the rise of Christianity.¹⁸ However such developments were a direct consequence of the confusion which was caused by the decision of the early church to enshrine its beliefs in doctrine and dogma which could only lead to continuing dispute – complicated by the return to the study of ancient philosophers during the Renaissance.

A SPATE OF DEEP THINKERS ...

Europe was enjoying the benefit of a spate on deep thinkers in the same mould as Bacon, Bruno and Copernicus, and while they did not all challenge the church directly, they challenged and gradually brought change to the relationships between church and state and enabled a rash of changes within the amorphous Christian gel. Together they were establishing the basic intellectual framework and impetus for the modern era. Their key theme was 'Reason', around which a set of sub-themes involving science, society and progress were interwoven within a framework of belief that all men were equal by nature: equal in moral worth and the rational potential to recognize truth unfettered by the church's doctrines. Individuals, they believed, could come to sure knowledge of nature and morality. Reason, they believed, could furnish a science of man, including a science of morality, in the same way that it furnished a science of nature. In due course the fruits of science, both natural and human, would bring material and moral betterment of human societies, and the eighteenth century would see an explosion of activity in the natural, human and political sciences which would be reflected in some aspects of the American constitution. The new thinkers were a cosmopolitan lot, with some moving for the abolition of privileges and patronage, as well as local traditions and customs, especially where these affected the consistency of the law. Some (very few) were even democrats, and advocated the redistribution of wealth, although most of them saw freedom as a matter of being left alone by governments under the rule of law. They nevertheless expected governments to legislate for the general welfare and to promote the rational reform of society, and were quite happy for 'Enlightened despots' to do the job. Above all they believed that good laws would create a virtuous and prosperous citizenry, and that the intellectual enlightenment of society would lead to progress.

Among them was the father of modern philosophy, Rene Descartes, a Catholic who had enjoyed a very wide education in a vigorously anti-Protestant environment. He had even wider interests, including music, the classics and science, and he was expected to enter either the law or military service before a career in politics. But he came under the influence of a Rosicrucian colleague and shared many of the movement's goals and habits. He advocated religious tolerance, objected to the expulsion of the Jews in 1615, glorified reason and openly questioned some of the prevailing scientific and theological assumptions.

To save his skin Descartes fled to Holland, built on the work of Bacon with whom he shared a dynamic interest in new scientific, mathematical and philosophical approaches, and wrote a series of works which led Europe's academic communities to think in new dimensions. His crowning achievement was Principles of Philosophy, published in 1644. He saw philosophy as theoretical enquiry towards practical consequences, saying that philosophy was a tree which had metaphysics as its root, a trunk of physics and branches of morals, medicine and mechanics. And he wrote extensively on a new approach to each of them. But worse, from the church's point of view: Descartes explored the relationship and the interaction between the human mind and body, and discussed external stimuli, responses of the mind, and reactions of the body. He argued that people can be conditioned by experience to have specific emotional responses, but he supported the concept of free will and the mind's ability to control the body. He scored no friends among the Calvinists or the Jansenists with his claim that grace is not necessary for salvation and that human beings are virtuous and able to achieve salvation when they do their best to find and to act upon truth. He believed that humans could, through their will and ability to reason, find truth and therefore reach salvation, and in taking that position he left no room for Catholic belief in saintly intercession or the priestly rites of indulgences.

Along side Descartes we can briefly note a few other key figures. The mathematician, physicist and philosopher Blaise Pascal laid the foundation for the modern theory of probabilities, formulated Pascal's Law of Pressure, and constructed a calculating device which operated by counting integers and was, in a sense, the first digital calculator. Thomas Hobbes, a political theorist and liberal philosopher, wrote extensively on the law, citizenship, the social contract, democracy, monarchy and the church as state between 1640 and 1658. Benedict (or Baruch) Spinoza, of Jewish heritage, whose forebears had been compelled by the Inquisition to adopt Christianity on pain of death was a philosopher of Rationalism. His main works were published between 1655 and 1677, but quite early he found himself in trouble with both the Jewish authorities and the Christian church. Gottfried Wilhelm Leibniz, whose fields included politics, philosophy, mathematics and metaphysics, published systems of calculus and theory of dynamics between 1676 and 1714... and there was a host of others of similar status. The Age of Enlightenment was sweeping Europe and the Church of Rome was losing its capacity to restrict thinking to the doctrinal and dogmatic parameters which it set, but it was not giving up without a fight!

... AND GALILEO'S TELESCOPE

Among the illustrious contemporaries of Giordano Bruno was the Italian mathematician, astronomer and physicist Galileo Galilei who developed experimental techniques in hydraulics, discovered four satellites around Jupiter by means of his newfangled telescope and proved a new principle about the velocity of falling objects. But his new principle also contradicted what the church was teaching and in spite of his experimental proof he was first forced to revert to the "proper" teaching and, later, to leave his teaching post at the University of Pisa. He took up a new post at Padua about the time that Bruno was thrown into gaol and he also took up the work of Copernicus as he developed his telescope and peered deeper into the universe. That was also too much for the Holy office of the Inquisition. In 1616 he was instructed by Pope Paul V to drop his studies, and the paper by Copernicus was banned. But Galileo couldn't keep quiet.

When he published his own findings in 1632 his book was banned along with that of Copernicus and, like Bruno, he enjoyed the hospitality of the Inquisition in Rome for a while. It was probably his fame as a scientist which saved him. Galileo was not required to take a walk to the stake. He was simply forced to publicly recant and was held a house prisoner for the rest of his days.

It was the same old story. The vicious circle of the main stream church's view of itself, of God and the Messiah was dragging it deeper and deeper into the depths of conceit, arrogance and the gross misuse of authority to perpetuate the ideas and things which it had determined and which it was intent on clinging to. In spite of the Reformation it was doing all it could to inhibit freedom of thought and human development in order to avoid the inevitable: an in-depth rethink. In doing so it was naturally tending to turn thinkers against belief in God the Creator, the ultimate authority throughout creation, as well as against itself.

A TORRENT OF NEW CONFESSIONS

As fragmentation had run its course in Islam so it did in Christianity. The lay investiture power struggle between popes and kings had already dragged on for a depressingly long time but after the Thirty Nine Articles and the papal excommunication of Elizabeth the tide in the affairs of man turned into a raging torrent as group after group published its articles of faith. Dissenters or non-conformists made a mockery of the efforts of kings and parliaments to maintain political stability through religious conformity and Europe and the British Isles were wracked by religious or civil wars which brought with them the beginnings of economic and cultural revolutions, distinctly coloured by Puritan or Calvinistic philosophies and a rise in the influence of the laity as well.

In England the Puritanical Oliver Cromwell saw it as his divinely inspired purpose to wage a religious civil war against Charles I who was taking the Church of England back to a pre-Reformation position in major matters of theology. The war erupted in 1642. Cromwell defeated Charles I; was instrumental in his execution; disestablished the Church of England and sought to replace it with a Presbyterian system; put down rebellion in Ireland, defeated the Scots, and installed a Lord Protector in place of parliament. The reversal was only a few years coming. The Westminster Confession (1643–49) came first. It provided the base for a Presbyterian movement around the world with heavy emphasis on lay and corporate decision making. It flowed from John Knox' direction of a reform movement in Scotland more radical than that in any other country in Europe.¹⁹ Today some of its clauses may sound little better than the pre-Reformation statements which were so offensive to non-Christian non-European man, and in particular to the other partners in the Triangle, but seen in perspective they were a remarkable advance. Fortunately it has only been a "subordinate standard" for most reformed churches since early this century but it would be better confined to the archives for historical study only.²⁰ The self-contradictory task of getting the majority of mankind to obey the Gospel, which European man had certainly not been doing, while they accepted predestination to sin, dishonour and wrath ought to have exposed such doctrine for the stupidity of its lack of logic, at least before it was ratified by parliament, even if the divines who drafted it were hoodwinked by their own prior indoctrination.

Charles II's Toleration Act of 1649 was little more than the English version of the German Peace of Augsburg of 1555 which had recognized a splinter group, Lutheranism, as well as the church of the state or empire, Catholicism, on the basis of 'one state, one church' according to the decision of the German princes, but not by personal choice of the people. The Act of Toleration gave conditional freedom of worship to dissenters or non-conforming splinter groups from the state church, (the Church of England), such as the Baptists, Congregationalists and Quakers who had pressed for it, but it did not apply to either Roman Catholics or Unitarians. There was certainly no suggestion that it should apply to non-Christians such as Jews or Muslims. It was another reflection of the church's Trinitarian self-understanding and yet another bid to achieve political stability through religious manipulation and the partial isolation of the British Isles from the religious wars of Europe. It was a severely limited form of toleration which did little more than demonstrate that the Reformation was incomplete and smooth the way for the establishment of many more splinter groups or denominations. It certainly was not a bid for reconciliation (acceptance of the major division of the Western Church and the establishment of friendly relations between those warring divisions) or the introduction of freedom of worship.

In quick succession came the Baptist Confessions of Faith (1646/77); the Savoy Declaration of Faith and Order by the Independents of Congregationalism (1658) and the Chief Principles of the Society of Friends (1678). Of these groups it was perhaps the Society of Friends, better known as the Quakers, who came nearest to a complete renewal in religious thinking and showed the level of courage which was necessary even then, 160 years after Luther, if a real rethink was going to be achieved. The Society, which today maintains a low profile while it plays a dynamic part in world peace and reconciliation movements, formed around the teaching of George Fox in England about 1647. It rejected the notion of priestly authority and intercession and had no priests or salaried ministers. It regarded consecrated buildings as irrelevant, believed that a personal recognition of the presence of the Divine (the Inner Light) and a commitment to accept and to act on Christ's teaching was vital. In addition its members believed that baptism and communion were very personal and spiritual occasions not to be given the status of formal rituals, and they therefore rejected the concept of sacraments. They paid the usual price at the hands of both Catholics and other reformers. About 15,000 Quakers were thrown into prison, two hundred were transported and sold as slaves and many died either in prison or from mob violence between 1647 and 1689 when parliament passed the Toleration Act.^{21 22} They have been described as a group whose emergence was a feature of the final falling apart of the Augustinian system of authoritarian orthodoxy,²³ but it may be more appropriate to credit them with a significant role in bringing down the system, especially considering that the English Toleration Act was rather inaptly named.

Each of these new non-conformist movements, or the reactions against them, brought a fresh wave of emigration to North America as their dedicated members sought to escape such persecution and as the king of Spain lost his capacity to prevent the flow of migrants. Quakers led by William Penn established Pennsylvania. French Protestants succeeded in setting up home in Carolina. Lutherans from Sweden found a refuge in Delaware. Rhode Island was settled as a free religious community by Baptists. New York began as a Dutch Reformed trading settlement with the name New Amsterdam. German Lutheran exiles helped swell New Amsterdam and Pennsylvania. New Plymouth (Congregational) and Jamestown, Virginia (English Protestant) have already been mentioned. When Dutch Reformed authorities in New Amsterdam refused permission for the first German Lutheran pastor to minister to his flock he was forced to return to Germany. Quakers were persecuted, at least in the early stages, almost as much as back in England, and the Jesuits were causing trouble and getting into trouble wherever they went with their anti-reformation exercises. Then it was the turn of Catholics to flee Europe as Protestants began to turn the tide on the Continent and French Catholics settled Quebec.

CHURCH AND STATE: A BID TO BREAK THE BONDS

In France Cardinal Jules Mazarin, who had shown greater tolerance towards the Huguenots than most of his colleagues and who was working towards complete separation of the church from the state, became Chief Minister in the government of Louis XIII in 1642 – the year of Cromwell's civil war in England. He continued to control the government under Louis XIV and relations between the Vatican and France reached an all-time low. In the Vatican's view Mazarin was leading his country "towards the dangerous goal of absolutism."²⁴ He insisted that God acts alone with absolute finality in the matter of salvation, he would not agree that either Mary or the church had any authority in the matter at all and he insisted that the state therefore had to accept absolute responsibility in all civil affairs. Their common cause in the issue led Mazarin and Cromwell to sign a pact of non-aggression between France and England. They combined to end Spain's domination of New World trade and they thus ended the farce of the papal line of territorial demarcation.

Part of Mazarin's concern was the power and influence of the Jesuits, and he was certainly not alone. Prominent among those working within the Catholic Church to clip the wings of the Jesuits was Blaise Pascal, the short-lived mathematician, scientist and philosopher already referred to, who was attracted to the harsh and morally rigorous sect of Jansenists. The group was really a part of the Counter-Reformation in the true sense, but it was declared heretical by successive popes, beginning with Innocent X in 1653, only seven years after Pascal had become associated with them. A great-great-grandson, through illegitimacy, of Pope Alexander VI, Innocent X presided over another of those periods of sheer degradation which had been the hallmark of the papacy for so long. It appears that his revolting sister-in-law (who eventually left his corpse to rot for some days before it was wretchedly buried) had been the chief intriguer of his reign and had a hand in the outlawing of the Jansenists. They counted among their number the scholar Pasquier Quesnel who was naive enough to think he could get away with moralizing against the papacy in writing, and the forerunners of the anti-papal Old Catholic Church of Utrecht as well as Pascal.

PASCAL'S MIXED INFLUENCE

Unfortunately Pascal's influence was not uniformly uplifting. His piecemeal defence of the Christian faith which was published by the Jansenists in 1670, eight years after Pascal's death, included many passages with heavily anti-Semitic overtones along the well trodden Christian path and they were later taken as justification for intensified purges against Europe's Jews. He wrote that the Jewish people are of remarkable antiquity, extending continuously from (their) origin to the present day; that they still exist, despite the efforts of so many powerful kings who have tried a hundred times to wipe them out; that they have always been preserved and that their preservation was foretold; and that "extending from the earliest to the most recent times their history includes in its range that of all our histories." He also wrote that "The law by which this people is governed is at once the oldest law in the world, the most perfect, and the only one which has been continuously observed in any state... And it is easy to judge how perfect it is just by reading it, when it can be seen to have provided for everything with such wisdom, equity and judgement that the oldest Greeks and Roman lawgivers, having some inkling of it, borrowed from it their chief laws."²⁵

Beautiful stuff. But then he followed with a statement that "they" pass on "lovingly and faithfully" Moses' call to heaven and earth to "witness against them" for being ungrateful to God; that God "rejected all the other things" and that "the Jews will be punished like strangers by God if they offend him."²⁶ Did Pascal develop this theme from the Qur'anic Night Journey, or did he pick it up from other Christian writers? He can be assumed to have read the Night Journey in the course of his research to defend Christianity because he was as trenchantly antagonistic to the Muslim 'infidels' as he was to the Jews. He finds the law which these "separated and peculiar people" ... "boast of receiving from God" admirable and that they are "unshakable in their conduct."²⁷ He saw the Jews as heralds of the Messiah and suggested that if they had taken these spiritual promises to their hearts and remained free from corruption until the coming of the Messiah, their testimony would have had no validity, because they would have been on his side. Then later in the same passage, and in contradiction to his own reasoning, he wrote that "there was thus no reason for falling into error and only a people as carnal as the Jews could possibly go wrong."²⁸ Pascal's twisted reasoning and his prejudice reach their climax with one of his "proofs of Jesus Christ." He wrote:

It is amazing and peculiarly remarkable to see the Jewish people survive for so many years and see them always wretched, but it is necessary as a proof of Christ that they should survive to prove him and be wretched, since they crucified him. And although it is contradictory to be wretched and to survive, they still survive, despite their wretchedness.²⁹

The mob loved it. If it didn't exactly incite them to expand their blood bath against the Jews at least it gave them a justification for continuing what they were already doing, and three hundred years later his words would be used again with devastating effectiveness. The same sentiment, expressed in a way that showed much coincidence with Pascal's writing, was expressed quite graphically in a series of papal encyclicals and newspaper articles emanating from the Vatican during the 1930s when more heat than light was being generated in the debate on the Jewish Question as the world plunged towards the Second World War. It was, quite clearly, in direct contradiction of Pope Pius XI's efforts in the final year of his pontificate to lead the Catholic Church to a change of heart on the Jewish Question.

In the meantime refugees from the church's intolerance, greedy traders and ordinary immigrants were all helping to shape a new nation so powerful that it could swing the policies and practices of almost the whole world in any direction it wished, virtually single-handed and at will. Their situation was in sharp contrast to the plight of Europe's Jews which would become steadily more wretched. While Elizabeth I was signing her Thirty Nine Articles in England, Ivan IV (the Terrible) was signing his order that every Jew in Russia who refused baptism was to be thrown into the river, and in Italy several provinces from Naples to Genoa were executing their own special programs of expulsions or forced conversions. Perhaps they were trying to emulate the Knights of St. John who had set up Jewish slave camps on Malta, complete with Synagogues, some thirty or forty years earlier.³⁰ The senior partner in the triangle was being rejected, scorned and scourged on all sides.

THE OTTOMAN EMPIRE: TEMPORARY RELIEF

Well, not quite on all sides. The Muslim Turks were actively encouraging Europe's Jews to set up home in the Ottoman Empire. As the Spanish were driven out of North Africa, Jews moved in and set up vineyards, notably in Tunisia, and merchants and physicians settled across Asia Minor. At the same time Jewish immigration into the Ottoman Empire began as a trickle, stepped up in the 1600s when about 100,000 Jews settled in Rumania and Bulgaria, and continued so that by 1900, when the Empire had been pushed back to only one third of its area, 500,000 Jews still called it home. As a direct consequence of the church's attitude and conduct, and the policies of the Christian powers in the unholy amorphous Christian gel, those immigrants and their successors were providing a communal population pool which would become the target of a carefully orchestrated program of genocide which is, progressively, determining the course of the world. They were caught in the action of the trouble in the triangle and the communities of all three parallel streams of faith were involved in that action concurrently. They were to become pawns in the parody of Hitler's Mein Kampf. They were to witness the fulfilment of the Night Journey. They were to die in the Holocaust.

FRANCE AND COLONIAL POWERS GAMES

But back to France in the years of the Counter Reformation. When Mazarin died in 1661 Louis XIV declined to appoint another prime minister. He declared: "I am the State"³¹, and began a campaign as "the most Christian king"³² to clip the papal wings. The pope, Alexander VII, tried to deflect the issue by banning any attack on the doctrine of immaculate conception and therefore any attack on Mary's authority – and that of the church – in the little matter of personal salvation. At the same time he condemned both Jansenism and the Jesuit's (im)moral theory of probabilism which had prompted an attack on the society by Pascal. That theory held, in essence, that if a personal action is not specifically declared wrong by canon law then it is acceptable. The judge's decision was to be final. The trouble was that The Judge had not made the decision. It was only the impostor and he hadn't had the last word. Louis annexed the papal state of Avignon and, with an attack on the Vatican itself by a French-inspired alliance a real probability, Alexander was forced to make more political concessions. But while the pope may have been down he was not out for the count. He and his successors were still capable of making and undermining alliances and by then the whole world was their plaything and not simply Europe.

In 1680, as part of the campaign to undermine Holland, which had gone vigorously Protestant in reaction to Philip of Spain's tyranny, (and in spite of a peace treaty having been signed between France and Holland two years before), the Jesuits in Thailand manipulated the king through his court to have all commercial connections between Thailand and Holland severed. They then arranged for French troops to "protect" the Thai king by garrisoning Bangkok and Mergui against the Dutch. The plans of both the Vatican and France, which happened to coincide, to dominate the whole of Indo-China were beginning to take effect. The situation was little different anywhere in the New World. The countries of Europe talk defensively, now, of their common heritage of race, religion and culture in an effort to justify economic and political pacts aimed at defying and denying the aspirations of Africa and Asia. But in the 1680s they were clutching at each other's throats on the same grounds as they competed to exploit the same regions.

The Dutch and the British were the players in Indonesia; the Dutch and Portuguese in Brazil; the Spanish and French joined them in North America; they were all in for the spoils in the Caribbean; and it was mainly the British, Dutch and Portuguese in the Indian Ocean. Later they would be joined by Italy, Germany, Russia and the United States of America but that was still some way off. Italy was fragmented and had not achieved a territorial identity separate from the Vatican. Germany was fragmented too and it was also landlocked by warring friends and enemies so that it had not developed a maritime identity. The future USA was still the object of European competition itself and it would be a while before it achieved a national identity and the capacity to compete with its parental powers. In any case its people would repeatedly protest that they had no territorial ambitions. They were intent on fulfilling theology, not on dominating the universe!

THE ENLIGHTENMENT IN FULL SWING

While the politicians of the great powers of Europe were playing games of competition and exploitation, their scientists and philosophers of the new era were still eager to develop an understanding of how the world functions and how to help it live in productive harmony. In 1687 Sir Isaac Newton published what has been described as one of the most important single works in the history of modern science: his Mathematical Principles of Natural Philosophy, (the Principia). A key figure in the scientific revolution, Newton's wide ranging works were to the springboard to quite amazing developments during the industrial revolution. Beginning with his discovery of the composition of light he laid the foundations for the science of light and modern optical physics. His three laws of motion became the basic principles of modern physics and led to an understanding of universal gravitation. And in mathematics he discovered infinitesimal calculus. Newton dominated the scientific life of Britain. He was elected president of the Royal Society; received many significant honours from abroad as well; became patron to a whole generation of brilliant young 'disciples,' and was rewarded with appointment as Warden of the Royal Mint – a post he took just as seriously as every other task he ever tackled. But Newton was not merely a scientist. He read religion and philosophy widely and, being a fervent but unorthodox Protestant, he led a campaign against James II's proposal to Catholicize Cambridge University. He wrote a paper in an attempt to prove that passages in the Bible which are taken as justification for Trinitarian doctrine were later corruptions of the original texts, but when his friend John Locke, a Puritanical Anglican philosopher and physician, moved to publish it, Newton withdrew it in fear because his anti-Trinitarian views would become known. In his later years, as he withdrew from active scientific research, he devoted much time to Biblical study and two works were published after his death.

Four years after publication of Newton's Principia, John Locke published a work which was to have an enormous impact on the critical examination of philosophy and religion. It was his Essay Concerning Human Understanding which was intended "to inquire into the original, certainty, and extent of human knowledge; together with the grounds and degrees of belief, opinion, and assent." He had studied Descartes extensively and found himself in disagreement with the thrust of significant parts of the Frenchman's work. While Descartes maintained that a person could have innate ideas, Locke believed that the human mind derives the materials of reason and knowledge from experience. Knowledge, he said is ideas derived from the observation of external objects and reflection on the evidence provided by one's senses, and moral values are derived from sensations of pleasure or pain. If an experience gives pleasure, the mind labels it as 'good.' There are no innate ideas, he said, and there is no innate depravity. That Essay, and his Essay on Toleration which had been published a year earlier, 1689, were concerned with education, toleration and morality and helped to restore some balance to religious debate and relations which had been shattered by the Edict of Nantes and the expulsion of more than 200,000 Huguenots from France four years earlier. Arguing strongly for religious toleration, Locke said that beliefs, like other human differences, were largely the product of environment and that moral improvement should be the responsibility of society. In addition he maintained that since human irrationality was the consequence of false ideas, instilled by faulty schooling, education should be a prime concern of rulers. It was, therefore, too important to be left to the divided, irrational churches in deep conflict.

But that was not the limit of Locke's interests. He collaborated with another friend, Robert Boyle, who is regarded as one of the founders of modern chemistry, in writing on scientific medical matters, and he also wrote on the philosophy of monarchy and civil government. Because of his Second Treatise on Civil Government, 1690, Locke is regarded as the father of modern liberalism. He laid great stress on the need to limit the power of government, and he was among the first to argue for the separation of powers. He claimed that individuals possessed inalienable natural rights to life, liberty and property which could not be given up or taken away except under special circumstances, and thus provided a bulwark against despotic or absolutist governments. The first duty of Government, he said, was to protect these rights. The only situation in which they were forfeited was in the 'state of war', in which captives who did not die on the field of conquest were regarded to have given up their rights to their captors. Locke regarded this as a justification for slavery. These views were later soundly rejected when the series of Geneva conventions and treaties on the conduct of war were being developed.

Locke also saw the protection of individual's rights as an obligation which required political authority. He rejected contemporary arguments in favour of the divine right of kings, saying that the consent of those being governed was necessary to legitimize constitutional arrangements and taxation measures, since these involved the natural right to property. This required a system so that if a government overstepped its bounds in these matters the consent of those being governed could be withdrawn and the government replaced. This meant that because the electoral system was poorly developed at the time, Locke was, in effect, justifying rebellion and the 'Glorious Revolution' of 1688, in which the Catholic James II was ousted in a palace coup and replaced by the Dutch Prince William of Orange. James, he said, had infringed the terms of the trust by which the constitution of England had been laid down, and that William's legitimacy had been shown by the lack of opposition to his rule. His argument was later used by the American colonies as justification for their rebellion.

Locke's theories had other consequences as well. Nature was 'God given' and therefore open to exploitation by everybody, equally, but inequality in wealth and opportunity to exploit was justified as an effect of legitimate circumstances of inheritance and unequal industriousness. In addition, although Locke proposed a system of subsistence for the poor, redistribution of wealth was firmly taken off the agenda because only property owners were entitled to vote. It was said that although labour-power was regarded as 'property', those with wealth were more likely to think and act responsibly and in accordance with the 'national interest' because they had a greater 'stake' in the country, and that since there was no secret ballot, their financial independence guaranteed that their vote could not be influenced by intimidation (bribery was another matter). To Locke, political equality was not desirable; what mattered was equality before the law.

THE RUSSIAN EXPERIENCE

While Western Europe's philosophers of the Enlightenment and Liberalism struggled to understand morality, and the Pilgrim Fathers sought to fulfill theology, Russia's Peter the Great was trying to bring a little order into theology without worrying about fulfilling it. The monarchy which he commandeered had no obvious political interest in, or economic need for, territorial expansion outside the European context. It was fully occupied with three territorial issues. First, it was trying to mould diverse people scattered over almost half of the entire Euro-Asian land mass – an area three quarters of the size of all Africa – into one nation. Second, it was intent on chipping away at Roman Catholic Europe to its west³³ and the Muslim Ottoman Empire to its south to regain direct access to the trade of the North Sea via the Baltic and the Mediterranean via the Black Sea. Third, it was determined to correct the imbalance between the land holdings of the church and the monarchy itself and, in so doing, to define more clearly the role of the church.

For most of their history the principalities of European Russia (west of the Urals) had been ruled by people related closely to the rulers of Scandinavia and Britain. Therefore, on the basis of current western political reasoning, they should have grown closer together due to their common heritage, but in fact they were being driven further apart. Barriers set up between the infant Russia and the rest of Europe by the politicking of the church had started the process just at the time that trade links between Scandinavia and Asia Minor were bringing cohesion and urban development to the region. The period of Mongol domination had made it more definite and the fantastic chain of events which focused on the fall of Constantinople made it permanent. Permanent, yes. But not irreversible if reason had prevailed. Unfortunately it didn't.

When the Reformation broke across Western Europe, its powers and the church became so preoccupied with their own struggles that they tended to disregard Russia. In any case Poland, which had itself been pushed and pulled by its neighbours like a blob of plasticine, had pushed west and annexed a large slab of Russia as the Mongols had withdrawn. This had brought three and a half million Orthodox Christians, (about half of Russia's population), under Catholic rule. It had also doubled both the area and population of Poland, and given Western Europe the false feeling that Russia was a long way away. The population balance had become a little uneven. Western Europe, excluding Poland and the Ottoman-ruled areas, had 57 million people of whom all except the Muslims of Granada and the widely scattered Jews were Catholic. The Catholic Poles ruled their enlarged and nominally Christian population of about seven million, among whom church allegiance split about equally between Catholic and Orthodox. The Ottomans ruled about six million people in Europe, mostly Orthodox Christians with an estimated one million Muslims, and Russia was down to about three million people.^{34 35 36} So, as Western Europe rampaged its way through its Reformation it ignored the fact that Russia was having one of its own peculiar variety at the same time.

The strange interdependence of the church and the princes during the period of Mongol domination had led to the church accumulating massive land holdings. Although the Khans had officially adopted Islam they never sought to impose it on the Russians, they appear to have held more to their pre-invasion religions and they showed a marked sympathy towards the church, whether Catholic or Orthodox. This was based less on sympathy for its theology ³⁷ than on eagerness to take advantage of the papal plan for a joint Roman/Mongol adventure against the Muslim held territories. ³⁸ The church was exempted from taxes and other obligations imposed on the vassal rulers and ordinary land holders. At the same time the princes, once invested by the Khans, lavished gifts of land on the church to ensure its support for their policies and personal positions. The church rapidly became docile, subservient, brutal and repressive as it helped the princes secure their ends. ³⁹ This coupled with its conciliar structure to cause fragmentation and to further undermine its ability to resist pressure from the princes. In addition, the lack of education for any except the ruling elite, the continued use of "old Slav" as the language for church liturgy and the absence of any local language translations of the scriptures resulted in a concoction of magic, mysticism and superstition which passed as the Christian religion. The clergy have been described as unbelievably ignorant with a monk even begging for alms in the name of the fourth member of the Trinity, St. Nicholas ⁴⁰ On reflection, that is probably no worse than Christians of Muhammad's time talking of Mary as the third member of the Trinity.

The fantastic accumulation of wealth and its inability to resist princely pressure made the church an almost unbelievable prize waiting to be collected. Circumstances began to turn in favour of the princes with the fall of Constantinople. The same changes in trading relationships were a factor in Ivan III's seizure of Novgorod. The monarchy was under severe financial strain but Ivan had to finance an army if he was to be able to recover the regions annexed by Poland. When the first stirrings of reform began in Novgorod, prompted by conflict between the mainstream church and Judaizers and sects similar to the Albigenses, the prize was within his grasp. He moved swiftly to crush the conflict and to confiscate most of the church's property in the city so that it would not provoke further conflict. The issue had been simple. What should the church do with its property?

PROPERTY OR PRACTICE?

Ivan also encouraged the heretical Judaizers at his court but in doing so he was probably less influenced by their demands that Christians adhere to all of the Jewish laws and customs than by their opposition to the church and its clergy holding a lot of property. ⁴¹ However a monk of the mainstream church, Nil Sorskii, had come under the influence of Savonarola and he gradually gathered support for his call for the church to dispose of its property, to put the funds to use for charity and to rely on donations from supporters (alms) to maintain the clergy. Encouraged by steps that Ivan's son, Basil III, took to supervise the finances of the monasteries, Nil Sorskii made an impassioned appeal to a Synod in 1503 to renounce wealth, to resort to alms and to act as a conscience for the monarchy and the nation, free of conflicts of interest over the use of property. The shocked Synod rejected his plea and confirmed that church property was inalienable and sacred. But the rift had opened wide and the Russian church split into 'pro-property' and 'anti-property' parties.

Thus, fourteen years before Martin Luther cried 'enough' in the West, the Russian church had already split. The trigger was different. It was that simple question of what to do with existing property. It was not as complex as the sale of indulgences to finance spectacular building programs with all the additional sophisticated theological debate which went with it. But the basic issue was the same: the church's view of itself, the role which it devised for itself and the actions which it took as a result were all under scrutiny. However the resolution of the Reformation in Russia was to prove much simpler than in the West, or so it seemed, because the monarch, as undisputed head of the church, simply had to reach a decision. Even so, Basil still had to tread carefully. He needed the church's money so he leaned towards the anti-property party. But to support a church which wanted to be his conscience would tend to undermine his personal authority and that would never do, so he swung the other way. Just to help him make up his mind (and not at all fearful of poverty or the loss of prestige, so they said) the pro-property party sprang to Basil's aid. They wouldn't be able to act as the nation's conscience if they were dependent on its financial support for survival, they said. Furthermore, they said, Orthodox canon law requires the ordinary clergy to marry but requires bishops to remain celibate. The church could not provide for the training of future bishops if there were no financially self-sufficient celibate monasteries.

The Tsar hesitated, then tightened the reins a bit on the whole church while he acted to suppress the anti-property party's propaganda. Leaders of the pro-property party who were already in the stronger political and financial position found some more ideas to support their case. Their leader withdrew his abbey from the patronage of his local prince and placed it under the personal protection of the Tsar. Then he introduced a concept of divine kingship more akin to the idea of Julius Caesar than any others which had been dragged up by European kings, popes or caliphs. In his physical being the Tsar was like other men but in his office or authority he was like God, he said.⁴² That did it. No one could stand in his way. Basil moved decisively to crush the anti-property party then issued edicts restricting monasteries from acquiring further land. He won both arguments and the church became more and more an instrument of the Tsar's will rather than God's.

From the social and economic points of view he acted none too soon. By 1550 when his successor tightened the monastery property regulations the church owned one third of the entire productive land in Russia. And in the oppressive effects of its economic policies the church in Russia was no different to the church in the West. It was among the first land owners to petition the monarchy for the bonding of its workers to the land they worked. Serfdom and salvation, it would appear, went together. By the time of the next split in the church in the 1660s (over whether the church should return to the liturgy of the Byzantine Church which it had received "perfect and complete" in 987), some 35,000 serfs were bonded to the patriarch's office alone and the largest monastery, St. Sergius of the Trinity, had 100,000 bonded peasants in 15 provinces.⁴³

Some of the reforms which the patriarch, Nikon, tried to introduce at that stage were as puritanical as anything that was being hawked across the Atlantic from England to the New World. Strict rules for personal conduct included prohibition of card playing, drinking, cursing, sexual license and the requirement that everyone spend from four to five hours in church each day. For a time Nikon was so close to the Tsar that he acted for him when the Tsar was on military campaigns but it proved his undoing when he tried to ape the popes and move to control the monarchy on the basis that in matters affecting religion and life ("spiritual") the patriarch was higher than the Tsar. Hardly surprising in view of his shift from the concept of divine kingship which the pro-property group had so recently forced onto the church and the nation.⁴⁴

So after another thirty years of bickering between the church and the monarchy and sectarian infighting within the church we come to Peter the Great and his need for Baltic and Black Sea ports. The monarchy had the church almost in the palm of its hands but not quite. Those elusive fortunes still couldn't be tapped and because it employed 750,000 peasants out of a total population of around thirteen million it could nullify any military or manpower plans he made. To make matters worse, the church was still meddling in the monarchy by playing him off against his son Alexis. For ten years Peter, sharing rule with His brother, Ivan, had been struggling to get direct access to the Black Sea with a series of skirmishes with the Turks and the Tartars which were unsuccessful largely because he couldn't fund a decent army. Then in 1696, the first year of his sole rule, he was able to take advantage of the crushing defeat of the Turks at Vienna at the hands of the Hapsburgs. He annexed the Dnieper region from the Cossacks and took the port of Azov from the Khanate of the Crimea.⁴⁵ He had done it at last! Russia again had a direct passage to the Mediterranean and even though it was tenuous he could at least turn his attention west to the Baltic, pick up a lot of trade and begin modernizing Russia on the Western European model. To do that he had to break Swedish control of Latvia and Lithuania, but without a major army of his own he needed an alliance with the Danes and the Poles. He got it, and all three attacked together in 1700. But by August Sweden had knocked the Danes out of the war and by October its army was in Estonia facing Peter. His plan was coming unstuck and his position and his need for funds were desperate. Then his chance came. Patriarch Adrian died.

Peter left the office vacant, made a "spineless Ukrainian divine" his acting spiritual head and appointed a committee to administer church property and to assess and tax the clergy.⁴⁶ By November his army had been humiliated by the Swedes and with all Russia at risk no one opposed the new arrangement. But after the winter recess Sweden turned its fury on the Poles instead of turning east towards Moscow and Peter got a breathing space. He swooped on the church, requiring that the monasteries forward all their revenues to the Treasury in return for fixed salaries for everyone. For practical purposes the church had become a department of the state.

The changes had taken place so smoothly that there was hardly a whimper from anyone as the consequences of the pro-property party's attitudes, pressed so strongly three or four generations earlier, finally came home to roost. Well perhaps not quite finally, because they set up shock waves which were later to crash through a whole host of barriers and which are still being felt today. Under Russian patronage the Orthodox Church had showed a lingering tolerance towards other faiths under the influence of its relationships with Islam and Judaism in Asia Minor where it had enjoyed protection under Muslim rulers. However, under the new arrangements which Peter imposed, that tolerance rapidly disappeared. The church was obliged to actively promote the recovery of territory on the Baltic, the Black Sea and Poland, and it knew no more effective way than by playing on interfaith prejudices. It unleashed a torrent of doctrinaire attacks against the Muslims of the Ottoman provinces along the Black Sea; against the Protestant Swedes and Fins; and against both of Poland's religious communities. Poland's Catholics had good relations with their one and a quarter million or more Jewish compatriots who had come to make up the economic heart of their country because of the positive incentives for them to resettle which had been provided, quite deliberately, by earlier Polish monarchs dating from Boleslav the Pious in contrast to, and in response to, imperial persecution of Jews right across Europe.

During the next twenty years the military adventures of Russia and its neighbours in a series of changing alliances had an important bearing on the long term map of Europe, on the Reformation struggles of Western Europe and on the pattern of migration to the New World. They also consolidated Peter's new church/state structure so that when he finally abolished the post of patriarch and replaced it with a state committee of twelve in 1721, at the end of twenty years of the Great Northern Wars, no one whimpered and the life of the nation went on without a ripple. The head of the Most Holy All-Ruling Synod, which was no more nor no less than a ministry of state, was the Chief Procurator who, together with his Synod and all clergy, swore oaths of personal allegiance to the High Autocracy of His Majesty. The role of the clergy, set down in minute detail, included acting as criminal detectives through the confessional. Any rebellious or treasonable designs against the tsar or the state were to be absolved, remitted and then reported to the imperial police. Cooperation in apprehending the villain would follow, of course.⁴⁷

The wheel had turned full circle. It was a long time since a body of Christians at the seat of the once great Roman Empire had struggled, first to gain freedom from persecution, next to gain recognition, and then to become an instrument of state. They had reached a breathtaking pinnacle and opportunity lay like the foothills all around them. They had claimed to be the true church and the sole voice of God on earth. They had gained status and frightening power only to misuse them both, claiming to be what they were not. Eventually their successors sought to usurp absolute earthly power. Now they were in disarray and fragmented, and the fragments were tearing each other apart. But one of the fragments – the Russian one – was now back on a pinnacle. Its monarchs and politicians should have been very happy indeed. They were closer to the aim of achieving political stability through religious conformity (or subservience) than even the Holy Roman Empire had ever been.

SERFDOM: THE NEW JEWISH FATE

In the same year, 1721, Peter legislated to allow merchants to purchase whole villages in order to attach or to bond the local labour force to their industrial and mining enterprises. Serfdom and salvation, it would appear, went together. They must have, because the church was among the first landowners to petition the monarch for the bonding of its workers. The church in Russia seemed hell-bent on proving beyond doubt that it could be at least as repressive of human aspirations and development as the church in Western Europe. It determined its social and economic policies in order to preserve its accumulated property holdings, to perpetuate its institutional structure and to maintain the clergy.

In that glorious environment Peter's successors found the presence of a Jewish minority in their population a distinct embarrassment and, through their new department of the church of course, they issued a series of edicts expelling them. Catherine (1727), Anne (1739) and Elizabeth (1742 and 1747) all had a go. The Russian Church's relations with Rome deteriorated further as a result because most of those Jews also resettled in Poland which had suffered greatly as the battle ground for much of the twenty-year Great Northern Wars and where the Vatican had had its hands full during a long period of conflict between Orthodox, Protestant and Catholic forces. Any understanding and tolerance of the Boleslav type had been crushed together with the church's moral influence and political authority. On June 14, 1751 Pope Benedict XIV issued the encyclical A Quo Primum which was to sear anti-Semitism more deeply into the Polish psyche than all of the country's previous experience. It was a demand for a return to the triumphal oppression of Jews and its significance can easily be under-stated.

Benedict opened A Quo Primum with a note that God in His goodness had allowed Catholicism to take root in Poland at the end of the tenth century but "various sects have attempted to establish themselves in Poland and to spread the seeds of their errors, heresies, and evil opinions" in spite of strong efforts to prevent them by pious and devout Poles in the continued faithful practice of their religion. He then noted the "many successful councils and synods which gloriously defeated the Lutherans" and to the great glory of God "prohibited the principle of freedom of conscience" which its adherents were trying to establish in Poland. But "another threat to Christians has been the influence of Jewish faithlessness (which was strong) because Christians and Jews were living in the same cities and towns." Concern at "the matter of the Jews ... causes Us to cry aloud: 'the best colour has been changed' (and according to) credible experts in Polish affairs ... the number of Jews in that country has greatly increased (so that) some cities and towns which had been predominantly Christian are now practically devoid of Christians."

He noted that so many Jews had replaced Christians that some parishes would lose their ministers because revenue had dwindled; that because Jews controlled liquor and wine businesses, they were allowed to supervise the collection of public revenues; they gained control of inns, bankrupt estates, villages and public land, and they have “subjugated poor Christian farmers.” They are “cruel taskmasters, not only working the farmers harshly and forcing them to carry excessive loads, but also whipping them for punishment.” Even though a Christian official holds the power to punish “he must comply with the commands of the Jews and inflict the punishments they desire” or lose his post. But he then noted the most serious of other unreasonable matters was that “some households of the great have employed a Jew as ‘Superintendent-of-the-household’,” so that they exercise economic and domestic power and “flaunt authority over the Christians they are living with.” By their business methods they amassed fortunes, destroyed Christian wealth by exorbitant rates of interest, and even offered their synagogues as surety.

With a devious reference to “a famous monk, Radulph” who was so inflamed that he traversed Germany and France preaching against the Jews as “the enemies of our holy religion (and) incited Christians to destroy them” he incited Poland’s Christians to do likewise, but sought to deflect the criticism that he was doing so by saying that “the great St. Bernard” had opposed this “immoderate and maddened zeal.” The Jews were not to be persecuted, slaughtered or driven out because “alive ... they are eminent reminders for us of the Lord’s suffering (and) on this account they are scattered through all lands in order that they may be witnesses to Our redemption while they pay the just penalties for so great a crime.” Then there was another such reference to Peter, abbot of Cluny, who wrote to King Louis of France and “encouraged him to punish their excesses and to strip them of the property they had taken from Christians or had acquired by usury (and) ... to devote the value of this to the use and benefit of holy religion.”

So he went on. Aghast that it was even commonplace for Christians and Jews to intermingle anywhere, he reminded his bishops and clergy that Pope Innocent III had said “Let not the sons of the free woman be servants of the sons of the handmaid; but as servants rejected by their lord for whose death they evilly conspired, let them realize that the result of this deed is to make them servants of those whom Christ’s death made free.” He also reminded them that Innocent IV had approved King Louis’s plan “to drive the Jews beyond the boundaries of his kingdom,” saying: “Since We strive with all Our heart for the salvation of souls, We grant you full power by the authority of this letter to expel the Jews, particularly since We have learned that they do not obey the said statutes issued by this See against them.”

Benedict XIV finally came to his instructions to the bishops: to renew the sanctions, encouraging the clergy to set an example which would lead the laity to implement them also, so that “neither your property nor your privileges are hired to Jews (and) furthermore you do no business with them and you neither lend them money nor borrow from them.” His promise was: “We will cooperate energetically and effectively with those whose combined authority and power are appropriate to remove this stain of shame from Poland.” He had ensured that whatever invasions, annexations and boundary changes would be imposed on Poland in future its people would have to live with a level of bigotry, social tension and conflict, the consequences of which neither he nor the church were capable of understanding because of their self-misunderstanding.⁴⁸

Some forty years after Benedict's pathetic outpouring of anti-Semitism, while John Wesley was stirring England to a moral revival and Catholics were regaining some of the civil liberties withheld since Elizabethan days, Peter III moved to end the parasitic independence of Russia's monasteries. He assigned all monastic properties from the church to the state. It was no mere nominal action, because the church had largely managed to manoeuvre its way around previous restrictions and to maintain the hereditary clergy as a class almost untouched. Of 954 abbeys, 569 were closed. Of the 385 left open, the clergy at only 161 were put on the crown payroll. Those at the other 224 abbeys were told to fend for themselves: to work to produce income or to justify alms! All other excess clergy were either drafted into the army or added to the tax paying list which meant they had to work to support themselves as private individuals and not as part of an abbey. Crown income jumped by several million rubels and the wages bill for the clergy remaining on the state list was only 400,000 rubels.

The big church rip-off was over and Russia would never be the same again. The power balance had lurched heavily in favour of the monarchy and the social balance had shifted sharply, too. A million church-bonded peasants became state serfs instead. Relieved of any concerns about commercial survival or profitability the church, as a department of the state, could, if it chose, change sides in the class struggle and work to improve the lot of the serfs. It chose not to because the remaining clergy felt less secure than ever. They opted to keep their noses clean by being good obedient servants of their (earthly) master and busied themselves in the colourful fantasy of the liturgy which was about the only thing that the level of education in the seminaries had fitted them for.

The church was living more and more in its own little vacuum. The nobility had long been prohibited from joining the hereditary clerical estate and Peter now banned the practice of landed families building their own churches and retaining their own priests. Privately retained clergy had previously been portrayed as running along like puppy dogs beside their masters. Any effective influence on the affairs and attitudes of the western-educated elite was therefore just not possible but, on the other hand, the church had cut itself off from the common people who had lost confidence in it completely.⁴⁹ The ordinary common people were crying out for help from somewhere, from anywhere, but the clergy could not hear them. On the other hand if the tsar or tsarina whispered in bed they all came running.

THE POLISH BUFFER

However the internal power balance wasn't the only one which had tilted. The massive amount of money and amazing manpower resources which suddenly became available enabled Peter to lay the foundation for the most powerful army in Eastern Europe. Those of Poland, Sweden and Turkey were no longer a problem. Almost any territorial ambition would be achievable. He had no need to be satisfied with merely a port on the Baltic and another on the Black Sea. The territory absorbed by Poland so long ago was almost his for the asking and that issue had gradually been coming to a head. Poland's expansion into Russian territory in the immediate pre-Reformation period had tended to break down the barrier between the Roman and Orthodox Churches at the local level at first, even though Rome objected strongly to the religious freedom which the nobles allowed on their estates. Chances for Polish/Russian coexistence or even integration therefore looked good for a while.⁵⁰ But when anti-Trinitarian wings of the Anabaptists developed strong support in Poland it was too much for the Vatican.

The town of Rakow which had attracted free thinking radicals and refugees from all over Poland and Germany from about 1569 had developed into the centre of Unitarian thought. Aiming for a New Jerusalem the people encouraged freedom for serfs and set up communally-owned factories, a Unitarian printing press and a trade college. At that point, with the country on the brink of joining the Protestant camp the Jesuits were thrown into the fray with a vengeance. Their task was to destroy all traces of Protestantism among the loosely republican Polish nobility and haul the Orthodox church and its people into line. In 1596 a Uniate church, using Orthodox ritual but subject to Rome's control, was established by a segment of the Orthodox hierarchy and by 1638 the town and religious life of Rakow had been eliminated. Many of the Unitarians who survived moved to Holland.^{51 52} Religious bigotry was again unfettered.

With that situation on the Polish side of the border and the Orthodox Church chained to the now-powerful monarchy and actively preaching against Rome and the Jews on the Russian side of the border, the chances for further cooperation between the two countries were slim even though Russia had eventually secured access to the Baltic at Sweden's expense. Europe was bouncing from one round of chaotic conflict to another as the dynamic and ambitious Prussian, Frederick II, competed with Austria and France for piece meal dominance of the old German Empire. Anything was likely to happen as other countries changed their allegiances more often than they changed kings. Poland was unable to maintain its independence any longer and became little more than a satellite of Russia. Peter's predecessor, Elizabeth, had been at war with Frederick of Prussia across the Polish territory which separated them of course, but Peter, with his eyes on formal annexation of Poland, changed sides. He helped Frederick to the immediate Victory against Austria which he wanted but, in doing so, he raised the fears of each of Prussia, Austria and Turkey which formed an alliance against him and demanded a piece of the Polish cake. His reign was cut short. Very short. After less than a year as tsar, Peter III was deposed, murdered and replaced by his wife Catherine who promised to toe the bureaucratic line.⁵³

It is said that Peter was weak and a trifle mad but his firm action against the church hardly supports the idea. It is more likely that his action to revoke merchant ownership of villages provided the real motive for his removal; that his misjudgement of his three national neighbours and his policies which prompted their alliance against him provided the substantial justification; and that his action against the church provided a moralistic veneer. Such combinations have been sickeningly common right around the "free world" as governments have fallen in dominoes-like succession since 1973. In any case Catherine did not touch her late husband's decrees concerning the church except to formally confirm them although she moved very quickly to tie the civil service to her by means of a series of laws granting automatic promotions and she offset some of the lost merchant support by grants of land and serfs. She felt very insecure indeed.

However Poland was the main loser. Three bites and it had disappeared at least for the time being. In 1772, 1793 and 1795 Prussia, Austria and Russia each took a piece by gentleman's agreement rather than go to war. Russia got the biggest share by far and should have been very happy but it had picked up a huge population of Jews in the process. Several generations of politically motivated attacks against them, using the very effective tool of religious bigotry, gave the Muscovite government a man-sized problem. Catherine apparently thought to solve it by giving away the Jews as serfs in preference to "ordinary people" as much as she could when she made her "grants" of land to her generals and personal supporters. But it took her a while to become accustomed to the game. In ten years between 1762 when she replaced Peter and 1772 she distributed a mere 66,000 serf "souls." During the next twenty years, between the first and second partitions of Poland, she "distributed" 202,000 serfs, most of whom came from the partitioned area. But then the sordid business reached its peak after the third partition when she handed out 100,000 "souls" in one day, August 18th 1795. Her generosity accounted for 800,000 "souls" during her full reign with over half of them coming from Poland.⁵⁴ However her problem wasn't solved quite as easily as that. She couldn't "give" the Jews to her buddies back in Russia proper from where they had been repeatedly expelled. She had to keep them in the new territories. From this arose the law of the Pale of Jewish settlements which was introduced in 1795 as her grants reached their peak. It was later confirmed and tightened by legislation in 1825, but we shall come to that soon enough.

Another matter which came to a head with the partition of Poland was the demise of the Jesuit order which had been under attack for so long in so many countries. Poland rose in revolt and, for the partition to have any reasonable chance of success, there had to be a degree of religious harmony in each of the three subject regions. The church was learning about tolerance very slowly and even then only as a matter of political expediency. The old idea that political stability could come only through religious conformity was a very good denominational prop and while a country had a great majority of the population, or absolute political power, in the hands of either the Catholic Church or Reformers, intolerance was the general rule. This applied in Spain (with absolute Reformed rule). But in countries such as France, Germany, England and Poland where there was something closer to numerical balance, even though the two wings fought bitterly and based their cases on theological reasoning, the movement towards religious tolerance was a little faster.⁵⁵

Poland was again a special case. Austria was essentially Catholic and in league with the popes, except for the odd war or two when Maria Theresa teamed up with the Bourbons against the Vatican. Prussia, with the Lutheran provinces of Germany on one side and Sweden on the other, was heavily Protestant, to the extent that the Vatican refused to recognize Frederick II until his successes on the battlefield and the need to remake a few alliances forced Benedict XIV's hands.⁵⁶ So, in 1773, to facilitate the partition of Poland, Catherine agreed to issue a decree granting freedom of worship and the right for confessions other than the Orthodox Church to organize as religious bodies, on the understanding that her Orthodox Church would have reciprocal rights. Clearly that would not be the case if the Jesuits were still in Poland and unfettered.

CLIPPED WINGS

The enigmatic Maria Theresa, who still saw the church as the bulwark of her power but who would not relinquish her authority in areas like foreign relations and education to it,⁵⁷ took the matter up with Pope Clement XIV. Clement was already under strong pressure from the Bourbon monarchs of France and Spain who were intent on negotiating the best deals they could for the interests in New World territories which they had forfeited to Protestant Britain in the treaty of Paris ten years before. He could kill two birds with one stone, so Clement kindly obliged. He dissolved the Jesuits with his "notorious papal brief" which was greeted as "a masterpiece of guilty conscience", and incurred the ceaseless wrath of his critics as "a man of mediocre intellect, weak-willed, unreliable and suspicious ... conditioned by ambition and fear ... ready to listen to any rumour ... filled with low cunning ... (and having) ... special skill in the concealment of his true intentions."⁵⁸

The Jesuit missions had actually been expelled first from China, in 1722. That was only partly on the grounds of religious incompatibility and cultural arrogance. Other factors were commercial and political interference. They made the religious endeavour, or intrusion, unacceptable. But then followed Portugal (1759), France (1764) and Spain (1767), the country in which the society had originated. More than five thousand Jesuits were expelled from Spain and its empire in one fell swoop. The impact of the Jesuit controversy reverberated around North America from 1767 also, because the Spanish crown expelled its missions and expropriated its "Pious Fund" in Lower California, and applied the funds available to support other religious orders. All of those were countries in which there was, relatively speaking, ethnic or racial and cultural continuity. Their decisions were based on conflict in all three areas: religion, commerce and politics. As we have now noted, six years later, in 1773, the reigning pope, Clement XIV, found it advisable to order the general suspension of the society's activities because of the disruption which resulted wherever it went and to facilitate his ambitions in Poland. The reaction against the extreme bitterness with which it opposed and intrigued against Protestantism, all other faiths, and non-conforming communities within the Catholic Church as well had become a serious embarrassment to the Catholic Church in the countries in which it operated. However it was allowed to continue operating freely in Prussia and parts of Russia under some sort of state 'protection' which suggests that conformity was expected to provide stability in certain regions, and it was also permitted to continue teaching services in Germany and Austria. The suspension was lifted 41 years later, in 1814, by Pius VII in the wake of Napoleon's sweep through Europe. The somewhat battered monarchies were looking for support and stability from whatever quarters it might flow, but the society was required to place its emphasis on support for existing mission functions of the church – and education. In the meantime, Frederick II was perfectly happy. He already accepted every religious group anyway. Naturally this bold new spirit of ecumenism which had been triggered in poor old Poland was only to apply to Trinitarian Christians. The campaigns against those whom the main stream Christians all agreed were heretics, such as the Unitarians, were to be continued and there was no thought of peace for the other two partners in the triangle especially the Jews.

NO PEACE FOR A JEW

The Jews. The church wouldn't leave them alone even when it was rocked by its violent internal strife. Nothing was to be a distraction from the cause of persecuting "those miserable people" until their extinction. Even Martin Luther had turned against them. In his early reforming days he preached tolerance on the basis that there was nothing to attract a Jew in the system which had persecuted them and he agreed that good Christians might even be attracted to Judaism as an outlet for their protests.⁵⁹ But in his later days he was disappointed that the Jews did not accept the purified Gospel and his pen poured out hatred. He promoted the ideas that Synagogues should be burned and, in a sermon shortly before his death, that Jews should be expelled from all of Christendom.⁶⁰ At that stage he was even more vitriolic in his attacks than his adversary, the pope, Paul III, who was exhorting the Inquisition to show a little mercy. But within a few years of his death another pope, Paul IV, had taken his advice, ordered the Jews to wear yellow hats and herded them back into the ghettos.⁶¹

Although various kings, popes and councils had tried to enforce segregation of Jews and Christians from time to time they had seemed more intent on persecution and elimination than on segregation. The concept of the ghetto, as opposed to the oppressed and semi-isolated community, had only gained general use coincidentally with the Reformation. In 1516, while Tetzl was gearing up for his sales campaign, the Catholic Republic of Venice ordered all Jews into the Ghetto Nuovo. It meant business. The practice caught on in most countries of Europe and the name was soon seared into world history and the mind of mankind. Locked gates; curfews; restrictions on professions and trades which inmates could follow; cramped conditions; raids to "rescue" converts; personal identification; enforced attendance at conversion sermons, and special taxes all became standard features of "the ghetto."⁶² The church and its brainwashed cohorts succeeded in denigrating and dehumanizing the Jewish population very effectively. The ghetto compounded the inhuman treatment of the previous twelve hundred years of the Diaspora in Europe and succeeded in producing within the Jewish community a proportion of physically degenerated people some of whom were timorous, neurotic, evasive, "sharp" in their practices and who carried a chip of exaggerated grievance on their shoulders.⁶³ The church took full advantage of this in "typing" the entire Jewish community and as a basis on which to continue to extend its anti-Jewish propaganda.

For a few generations it appeared that the church's campaign was succeeding. Jewish morale hit rock bottom. Hebrew scholarship hit the skids. Superstition began to be syncretized into religious practice just as it had with Christianity and Islam, (especially with Ottoman expansion into Christian Europe⁶⁴), and tradition began to take the place of faith and hope as the only straw that a Jew in a ghetto had to clutch at.⁶⁵ But as was always the case when the church ran off the rails and pursued power and self-interest through its self-misunderstanding, there were other effects. Just as it had finally broken the link between Judaism and Palestinian racial heritage when it triggered the destruction of the Khazar Khanate and sent a flood of non-Palestinian Judaists across Europe, the church was now hell-bent on promoting the racial connection between Judaism and its adherents in the most derogatory manner it could. But, even more self-damning, the church was helping to substantiate the link by making intercourse between Christians and Jews an offence, thus very effectively enforcing inbreeding and local type development.

In Germany after Luther an effort was even made to keep the Jewish population in check by restricting the number of houses in each ghetto and the number of people to each house. When that failed to restrain Jewish population growth, even when emigration was encouraged, a novel method of birth control was imposed. No marriages were permitted except by licence from the Christian authorities and these were restricted to the eldest son in each Jewish family.⁶⁶ And just in case some Christian communities had not already become affected by deep-seated and contagious racism through its long-established doctrines, their contact with the ghetto and almost continuous anti-Jewish propaganda ensured that they had to be almost superhuman to avoid becoming racist. Ghetto and propaganda combined to compound the existing problem. If adherence to Judaism defined a race then by implication Christianity defined a vastly superior race. On the other hand after the depressing shock of semi imprisonment or pseudo-exile in the ghetto had worn off it produced an effect very similar to that of the slaughter of the first crusade. It bound the Jewish communities together. Integration was no longer an option. The new cohesion resulted in a new self-awareness and a new determination to achieve personal and community dignity and recognition through education, effort and personal achievement.

THE RENEWED ENLIGHTENMENT

A new period of Jewish scholarship and enlightenment had been triggered. It bears a close relationship to the development of the golden age of Judaism under Islam in Spain after the trauma of the destruction of the Khazar Khanate. Within their ghettos Jewish communities established schools which they financed on a communal basis, side by side with their synagogues, and they provided universal free education years before mass education had been organized in Protestant Europe and in Austria under the enlightened, dynamic, but somewhat unsuccessful Joseph II. When he succeeded his mother, Maria Theresa, Joseph tried to haul the church into line, reform the universities and abolish censorship.⁶⁷

Law and discipline were very important and the authority of the warden and his council in a ghetto was firm and seldom challenged. Jewish tailors, traders⁶⁸ and money lenders developed much skill and a careful eye for competition. They had to because the conditions under which they worked were so restrictive. They also formed their own guilds. Pauperism became widespread in the ghettos as the Jewish communities outgrew the number of jobs which they were able to find in the community around them and the concentration of poverty in the ghettos was aggravated by the natural tendency of those who managed to acquire wealth to move to a less restrictive town or country. In fact there was a steady stream of Jewish families able to better themselves in the occasional communities where they were welcome, either on humanitarian grounds or because of their skills and money for employment-generating industries. But the pent-up jealousy towards successful Jews within the Christian community was unleashed with ever more bitter attacks on those in the ghettos.

It was during this period that the foundations were laid for some of the great Jewish family financial empires which were to be of quite staggering significance during the nineteenth and twentieth centuries. And the small cores of elite Jewish diplomats, financial advisers and physicians which many of Europe's crowned heads surreptitiously built around themselves as their "Court Jews" didn't come as an unmixed blessing either. While they played a major role in sorting out some of Europe's conflicts and in developing new economic initiatives, their presence and influence also antagonized the fragmented church and prompted even harsher restrictions on the people of the ghettos. A rash of Jewish reform movements which had already sprung up (in much the same manner as during the Reformation within Christianity) gathered momentum. There had been two important trigger points for these reforms. The first was the expulsion of the Jews from Spain in 1492 and the second was the Cossack uprising in Poland in 1648.

Prior to the expulsion Spain had been the base of the Jewish Kabbalah philosophy, a branch of mysticism in which worshippers place heavy emphasis on the community's traditional rites, messianic yearning and inner experience of their religion rather than on a rational intellectual approach. The expulsion destroyed that kabbalist base, but by dispersing kabbalists throughout the entire Mediterranean region of North Africa, the Middle East and Southern Europe, it gave a boost to kabbalistic practices and messianic yearning, and led to their widespread acceptance among Jews in the entire region. A school was established at Safed in Palestine and the main Kabbalah reference, the Sefer ha-Zohar (Book of Splendour) was distributed throughout Europe.⁶⁹

The massacres during the Cossack uprising were a direct consequence of the Jewish community in Poland being sandwiched between the church and the nobles. Led by a minor chieftain, Bogdan Chmeilnicki, the revolt began as a bid to free the Ukraine of Polish domination but it soon changed character. The economic and social success of the Jews in Poland had led to them being engaged by the nobles to lease or to manage estates in the Ukraine when the nobles had their minds on other matters following the 'unification' of Poland and Lithuania in 1569. However the Orthodox Ukrainian peasants, then also subjects of Poland, saw the Jews as representative of the oppressive Catholic Polish nobility. The hatred generated by the church in Russia against both the Jews and the Catholics soon knew no bounds. Bands of Cossacks moved through the Ukraine from east to west, ravaging Jewish villages as they went and reliable estimates put the massacre of Jews at over 100,000 people.⁷⁰ In addition, another round of forced conversions and deportations to serfdom in Russia began, with accusations of interference in the affairs of the Orthodox church and the ritual murder of adolescent Christians to provide blood for use in unleavened Passover bread.

The tragedy in the Ukraine led to the direction of Jewish migration being reversed, with many who could, moving back towards Germany, Holland, Bohemia and the Balkans, and an upsurge in interest in the Kabbalah and in the latent yearning for a messiah. In 1665, urged on by his chief supporter, Nathan Ashkenazi, who he met in Palestine, Shabbetai Zevi of Smyrna in Turkey proclaimed himself as such. The impact, especially among kabbalists, was considerable. Processions and acts of mortification were held and delegations travelled to see him. The messianic agitation so alarmed the Ottoman authorities that Zevi was summoned to appear before the Sultan and given the choice of death or adopting Islam. He chose Islam. Even so, some small communities which had remodeled their Judaism around him (as Shabbateanism) survived within the framework of the Doenmeh movement with semi-Trinitarian beliefs. There was another brief burst of Shabbateanism in central and eastern Europe when one of Zevi's disciples, Jacob Leibovicz (or Frank), claimed to be Zevi's reincarnation and declared war on both the Talmud and the Rabbinate in the mid eighteenth century, and one community continued in Greece until the 1920s.^{71 72}

In the meantime the tragedy of the Ukraine and the depressing impact which it had on the Polish economy had drawn attention to the benefits which had resulted for Poland from having a strong core of Jewish business people. The Elector of Brandenburg appears to have taken a leaf out of King Boleslav's diary of 1264,. In 1670, totally ignoring the church's policies and regarding the interests of the state as supreme, he invited several dozen wealthy Jews to settle in Berlin and a formal Jewish community was founded the following year. In return for the development which their capital would bring and their economic and administrative expertise they were assured of religious freedom, commercial liberties and protection from persecution. A new pattern of commercial entrepreneurs, "court Jews", diplomats and advisers in law and other fields began to emerge throughout Europe.⁷³

A CRY FOR RELIEF

Such were the extremes of the Jewish environment which generated intellectual unrest among Europe's young Jews. They found it just as hard to understand and to adjust to the changes around them as did the church which did all it could to minimize the changes. The young Jews were no longer content to accept that a state of human degradation was their proper and inevitable station in life simply because everyone from their own rabbis to the pope said they should. People like Moses Mendelssohn began to hack away at the barriers between Christians and Jews and the bonds which tied down the Jewish people. Their only tools were their own intellectual brilliance, personal effort and whatever personal authority they could develop in positions to which they were appointed. They saw their tasks in many different lights but basically they were simply aiming to expand the overall Jewish intellect, eliminate complacency and remove the ghetto walls. They didn't realize that they were gearing up a whole people for the eventual twentieth century trouble in the triangle. That was still too far off. And they probably didn't expect such deep division within their community which even such simple aims would prompt.

Mendelssohn, born in 1729 in the Dessau ghetto just a few kilometers west of Luther's Wittenberg in Germany, a hunchback, was required to pay the special Jewish toll before he could enter Berlin to study in 1743. Having gained admission he became a prominent mathematician, philosopher and educator at a critical time. As Barnavi explains: "Mendelssohn had to fight on two fronts, with traditionalist rabbis who feared losing the purity of Judaism and the nation's cohesion, and with Germans who opposed Jewish emancipation."⁷⁴ He translated the Pentateuch into excellent German with a commentary in Hebrew, and thus encouraged Jews to use a language which gave them access to a whole new range of literature, scientific and philosophical writing. He carried the debate on interfaith relations right up to the Christians (both Catholic and Reformed), he set a new pattern of Biblical interpretation, and he provided a strong focus for the Reform Movement in Jerusalem, a statement of his philosophy of Judaism in relation to the modern secular state, which was published in 1783, three years before his death. Fortunately Mendelssohn lived to be able to see some of the fruits of his work. The Jewish Free School was opened in Berlin in 1781 on the basis of his educational principles and in Austria Joseph II issued his Toleranzpatent in 1781, prompted by Mendelssohn's work which was brought to his attention by Christian Wilhelm von Dohm. Mendelssohn earned his recognition as 'father of the Haskalah', the Jewish version of the German Enlightenment.

Of course although a number of other rulers followed Joseph II's example during the next few years a lot of other rulers were having difficulty accepting the new openness towards Jews and their role in society, notably the popes. In 1775 an edict imposed further restrictions on Jews in the Papal States which recalled most of the worst abuses of the Middle Ages. Then came a further reaction to the messianic movements within the Jewish community, known as Hassidism, which developed in Poland but which struck trouble in a head-on confrontation with mainstream Rabbinical Judaism at Vilna in 1777, just at the time of the first partition.^{75 76} Polish Judaism split into anti-Rabbinical and pro-Rabbinical parties. At that critical stage Elijah ben Solomon (the Gaon of Vilna) assumed leadership of the mainstream pro-Rabbinical party. Described as "the greatest intellectual and spiritual force in Rabbinical Judaism since Maimonides"⁷⁷, he drew the Hassidics back to full recognition of the Torah, even if not to the Rabbinate, at the same time that Mendelssohn was trying to sweep away the old ghetto mentality and the deeply-entrenched orthodoxy which he saw as perpetuating it.

The combined effects of such men and their movements led to a burning desire among young Jews for secular education in the arts and sciences, the establishment of free schools which went beyond the basics of reading, writing and Talmudic law, and the beginning of an unprecedented flood of brilliant minds onto the artistic, scientific, commercial and political stages of the world. The bonds had not yet been broken but cries for a fresh start were ringing to the heavens from everywhere. They had a lot to do with the church but, as before, they were not orchestrated by the church. They were in spite of it or, more correctly, they were cries for relief from the church. They were ringing out from Russia where the monarchy had hauled the church into line and stripped it of its assets after a long period of resistance. During that period the church had been a force for repression, both as an instrument of state and because of its self-interested economic policies. And the resources made available by the enforced dismembering of the church had completely changed the balance of power in eastern Europe. The church, in a broad sense, had thus contributed towards the partition of Poland in several ways. It had set up the interfaith and interdenominational discord which were a major factor in the plot and it had accumulated the resources, through gross misconduct, which then made the partition possible.

Cries for a fresh start were ringing out from ghettos all over Europe. The church had promoted them and forced their Jewish residents into a degrading and racially isolated position which had encouraged a new self-awareness and a renewed struggle for recognition and basic human rights through education and personal achievement. The church just couldn't help itself. Its unprecedented abuse of human rights triggered a jack-in-a-box reaction by the Jewish community. And that reaction was, in due course, to result in a dynamic contribution from the Jewish community towards human self-understanding and both physical and cultural development – in short, towards salvation – quite out of proportion to the number of Jews compared with Christians. The Jewish community was also building on the foundations which Copernicus and Galileo had laid towards the next great challenge to the church's doctrines and its view of itself, but it did not realize that at the time. And the Lubavicher movement, established under the stimulus of Mendelssohn and his contemporaries, led to the establishment of schools and the training of religious reactivators to revive adherence to the Torah among Jews.

TIME FOR A NEW START

But the cries for a fresh start were ringing out right across Europe – not just from the ghettos – as Reformation, Counter-Reformation and Inquisition involved people in a struggle for tolerance and for an understanding of their relationship with each other and with God. And cries had begun to ring out on the other side of the Atlantic as well. Thirteen young North American colonies were waging an all-out war against England, the dominant colonial power on the continent, and they had just made a unilateral declaration of Independence. The church had the ball at its feet again. That continent, which is richer in natural resources than any other on earth, was being settled by a hotchpotch of people who were escaping from persecution, imbued to the point of fanaticism with the message of their particular brand of Christianity, with no long-established labour, land tenure or legal systems to inhibit them. They were shaking off the English monarchy which was their last link with the old world. They could establish their ideal new nation from scratch. At least they were shaking off their second to last link with the old world. Every fragment of the Christian church was there and each colony was institutionally linked to one of them. The roar was going up from the crowd: "Let's make a new start!"

So it was that a dream began to take shape out in the New World. With a touch of goodwill and good luck the new wave of settlers north of the Gulf of Mexico would be able to take advantage of their personal experience of religious intolerance and persecution and turn into a reality their visions of a dynamic, peace loving, God fearing community fulfilling theology. The church still had the ball at its feet or, more correctly, the reform wing of the church did. When Canada was "united" by Wolfe's victory at Quebec in 1759 followed by France's generous "gesture" in ceding the whole of its Canadian territory to England in the Peace of Paris in 1763, the Church of England replaced the Roman Catholic Church as the official religious institution for the whole of Canada and the numerical and political balance in North America overall swung firmly in favour of the reformers.

The young country had everything going for it. Vast expanses of virtually unoccupied country were ready to be broken up for food production. There was only a small indigenous population with which to make peace. There was greater concentration of usable resources waiting to be put to good use than anywhere else in the world. Freedom from the inhibitions which go with long established systems of government and economic management, coupled with a steady flow of both free immigrants and refugees from every culture which Europe knew, to give free reign to personal and community initiative and inspiration. That steady flow of immigrants and refugees also brought together people of diverse racial streams from several continents and provided the basis for a multi-racial population with marked hybrid vigour through intermarriage.

The history of the USA in its formative period suggests that such a development did take place. Actually both Europe and Asia Minor had already enjoyed the same opportunity as waves of people had moved backwards and forwards. The people of Asia Minor had few inhibitions in this regard, as we have already noted, from the influence of Muhammad's teaching on the unity of mankind and the marriage policy of the Abbasid caliphs. On the other hand the church's doctrine-based racism, developed from the time of the Arian controversy and compounded by Augustine, had become a major stumbling block for Christians. It had not only isolated and segregated communities on the basis of faith, it had been largely responsible for the attitude of white skinned Anglo-Saxons towards people of any other skin colour, including swarthy southern Europeans (whether Non-Christian or Christian), and it had become a gigantic impediment to intermarriage. Of course neither Darwin nor Mendel had come along at that stage to talk about natural selection, evolution and hybrid vigour in a community, and any European who married a Non-European in America or anywhere else was immediately ostracized. Use them as a convenience, enslave them, even baptize them if you must, but marry them? No!

It was wishful thinking that the church could move from one environment to another, take only the Gospel with it and leave its self-portrait, its bigotry and its assorted collection of baggage behind completely. It was not capable of doing so when it moved from Old Europe to New Europe across the Atlantic, a continent which did not have a large population with a long established cultural environment. It simply eliminated the cultures of the small populations which were there and with which it otherwise had to relate. It could not possibly do so when it moved into other continents with dense and diverse populations and long established cultures and traditions. It could not simply eliminate the populations and rub out their cultures. It was supposed to be going there for the purpose of ensuring their salvation. But then that was supposed to have been its purpose in the Old World as well.

Fortunately the fall of Constantinople to the Muslim forces of the Ottoman Empire had not only triggered the unholy, competitive and exploitative push for colonial expansion. It had also released the full impact of the Renaissance. This had blossomed into the era of the Enlightenment so that the Reformation and the Counter-Reformation were not the only influences at play. The several influences were interwoven as Europe and its amorphous Christian gel rushed headlong into the big wide world beyond its understanding.

CHAPTER 13

PADDLE YOUR OWN CANOE

When in the course of Human Events it becomes necessary for one people to dissolve the political bands which have connected them with another, and to assume among the Powers of the earth, the separate and equal station to which the Laws of Nature and of Nature's God entitle them, a decent respect to the opinions of mankind requires that they should declare the causes which impel them to the separation.¹

It is very doubtful whether Thomas Jefferson's four colleagues really grasped its full significance when they nodded their agreement to that preamble to the Declaration of American Independence. The group of five had been appointed by the First Continental Congress of thirteen colonies along the east coast of North America to draft a suitable declaration. While they must have had one eye cocked for the history book their main aim was to justify what they were intent on doing.²

The two million people of very diverse backgrounds in that cluster of colonies, each of which had come under direct British control by one means or another, were crying out for a new start. But they were not the only people who were doing so, and although all of the cries had common roots their immediate causes were quite varied. In the case of the North American colonists it was basically economic exploitation. It was not the religious oppression which was the continuing curse of Europe and which had prompted many of them to cross the Atlantic. Nor was it the racial labour exploitation of Africa in which they themselves were involved, the trade and political manipulation of Asia, or the fantastic combination of the whole lot in Latin America.

The American colonists were not upset because the traders and industrialists of Britain and their government wanted to take advantage of the natural resources and farm production of the New World. They were upset because the British wanted to suppress the aspirations of the colonists and tax them to finance Britain's wars as well. Their unilateral declaration of independence – which has echoed down the years to haunt them as they, in turn, have used sledge hammer tactics to suppress the aspirations of other countries – must therefore be viewed against the environment in which it was spawned.

To begin with, the uninterrupted flow of devious diplomacy, double-dealing and wretched wars between Europe's Christian kings, princes and prelates in the post-Reformation period makes a Miami Mafia vendetta look like a well organized Sunday School picnic. One big difference is that after a Mafia vendetta everyone knows who is boss and sticks to a code of conduct. That was not the case in Europe from the sixteenth to eighteenth centuries. Even though new systems of values and ethics were emerging slowly it was, on an international basis, every man for himself. Whatever we may think of its overall influence, the sense of unity which the Holy Roman Empire had implied had been destroyed.

THE ROLE OF A 'REGULAR' COLONY

However the church's view of itself, the Christian community's view of Europe and the racist views which were written into the creed of Athanasius, developed by Augustine and then progressively reinforced over the centuries which we have traced, became the planks with which European colonial policies were built. The Europeans were able to subdue other people with other cultures and pre-Messianic religious faiths very easily because of the greatly more effective fire power available to them in their mad scramble to compete for new food and resource supplies. This served to compound their racial and religious superiority complexes and, except in the case of China, prevented any counter pressure which could force them to modify their colonial policies and mercantilist empire-building doctrines. The availability of those weapons was also the factor which enabled them to demand and to commandeer the resources on land which other people had occupied first and was therefore the basis for the rapidly widening gap in the quantity of consumable goods available to the people of Christian Europe and the rest of the world. These matters are put in perspective by a 1726 statement by a member of the British Board of Trade.

Every act of a dependent provincial government ought therefore to terminate in the advantage of the mother state unto whom it owes its being and protection in all its valuable privileges. Hence it follows that all advantageous projects or commercial gains in any colony which are truly prejudicial to and inconsistent with the interests of the mother state must be understood to be illegal and the practice of them unwarrantable, because they contradict the end for which the colony had a being and are incompatible with the terms on which the people claim both privileges and protection... For such is the end of the colonies, and if this use cannot be made of them it will be much better for the state to be without them.³

It is therefore quite obvious from what we know of the mass migration and military patterns of the world up to that time that if gunpowder, the starting point for military and economic expansion, had been more ruthlessly exploited by those outside of Christian Europe who had it first – the Chinese in the sixth century and the Mongols who took it to Europe in the thirteenth or fourteenth century – rather than by the Europeans, the pattern of the colonial era could have been quite different.

At that stage Britain's empire included the thirteen North American colonies plus Hudson's Bay and Newfoundland (Canada), three bites of the Caribbean cherry, three North West African colonies, and three of the most important bases in India (Bombay, Madras and Calcutta). In addition it had the untapped rights to Australia which Holland had conceded in return for a free hand in Guyana (South America).⁴

The philosophy behind colonial administration was the same in each case. British government decisions and actions only varied according to the resistance of the people in each colony, the resources being exploited, competition from other imperial powers and the personal whims of British investors. The fact that successive British governments chose not to utilize the gift of Australia until much later is quite consistent with that philosophy. The situation was quite comparable with that in North America until the terror of the Reformation forced people across there. The known terrain was unattractive, there were no people with urbanized civilizations with whom to trade, to conquer or to exploit as slaves and, although the Dutch, French, Spanish and Portuguese were all competing with them in the territories immediately to the north, there was not the incentive of competition for Australia.

The establishment of a colony in Australia was going to be sheer hard work for the people who were silly enough to set it up. No one had shown the slightest interest in a royal charter to form companies such as in India, Africa or Hudson's Bay. Then those silly colonists in North America began to rock the boat. They seemed to have forgotten the sacred relationship between a European power and its colonies.

Until then no one in Europe had questioned the concept that the rest of the world existed for the benefit of Christian Europe. The only debate had focused on whether the popes had the authority to carve up the spoils or whether the carve-up was to be left to open contest between the kings. That dispute had been resolved in favour of the kings by the passage of events and it was soon taken for granted that European powers and their royal chartered companies had the God-given right to "pacify" the native populations, to compel them to provide raw materials for processing and use "at home" and to "absorb" or provide highly profitable markets for the goods manufactured at home. It was also understood that the colonists were not to compete by manufacturing anything which could be manufactured at home, and legal and economic arrangements were to be made, of course, to maintain that relationship.⁵ And whether they recognized the popes or not, the "powers" would play their part by civilizing and Christianizing their charges.

AMERICA IS 'DIFFERENT'

The trouble was that North America wasn't like most other colonies. Like Australia, it didn't have a large "native" population. The colonists were starting from scratch. The vast majority of them were racially the same as the people of the mother country, they shared the same basic religion, culture and aspirations and they had a lot of pride, initiative and determination, otherwise they would not have been there anyway. They didn't share the mother country's view of the proper relationship between home and the colony. They were going to develop a strong, self-reliant community which would use its resources as it saw fit rather than as someone else dictated and they were going to have good diplomatic and trading relations with every country. In short they were determined to be what Europe should have been.

On top of that they were not scared of the fire power and naval might of their mother country. They understood it and their mixed European heritage and the well tried jealousies between Europe's competing powers assured them of access to exactly the same sort of fire power. What is more they had an immense natural advantage in the days of naval power based on sails. They had a coastline of about 2,500 miles which was much harder to blockade than the small ocean frontages of Britain's other colonies. When the crunch came they took full advantage of their long coastline and their friendship with the other powers of Europe.

Considering the circumstances of the time and the assumptions on which colonial policy was based it was inevitable that friction would develop to the point of political confrontation between Britain and its American colonies before the point could possibly be reached between Britain and its other colonies. Every time the American colonists sought to compete with Britain in the European market place or to determine a major domestic policy for themselves Britain regulated to prevent it or instructed its governors to use their power of veto over colonial legislators. The stage was set with the Navigation and Trade Acts of 1651 and complementary legislation was passed as required after that to plug up gaps.

The act of 1663 required the colonies to import and export all "enumerated" goods through England irrespective of where they had been produced or where they were going except for other American colonies.⁶ England "bought cheap and sold dear." All goods had to be carried in English ships on the outward run and only English ships or those of the country of origin on the inwards run to Britain. Sugar, cotton, tobacco, ginger, indigo, dyewoods, molasses, rice, naval stores, hemp, masts, yards and bowsprits, copper ore, beaver and other furs, hides, whale fins, iron, raw silk, lumber, potash and pearl ash all found their way onto the enumerated list as the colonies began to produce them in significant quantities.⁷ Then the act of 1673 imposed taxes on exports at the port of clearance and that of 1696 aimed to cut out the illegal trade which had developed with Holland. Restrictions added in 1733 made it impossible for the northern group of colonies to maintain a favourable balance of trade by legal means so their ship's captains took matters into their own hands on the high seas.

Of course when the colonies retaliated by imposing import duties on British manufactured goods or others carried in English ships the Board of Trade instructed the colonial governors to veto such regulations. On several occasions the board was able to prevent new towns being established on the grounds that they would encourage competitive manufacturing industries and reduce the efficiency of tobacco production by drawing labour away from the fields. They were able to prevent the establishment of shoe, linen, wool and hat factories in the colonies from time to time and tried to enforce restrictions on the iron and steel industry by banning new furnaces and rolling mills. Even with the smell of revolution already in the air the board added iron to the enumerated list in 1764.⁸ In the same year the House of Commons passed the Currency Act to turn the screws even tighter on private money movement to, from and within the colonies. It also set up special courts and naval patrols to deal with smuggling to and from the colonies, taxed an increased range of goods, and ended exemptions from transshipment in England for non-enumerated goods being exported to Europe.

The complex Seven Years War (1756–1763) had just dragged to a close with a Treaty signed in Paris. France had ceded to the English the balance of its interests in North America, including the Mississippi, Ohio and Tennessee Valleys which stretched to the west of the English colonies, – except for its sprawling and ill-defined colony of Louisiana which went to Spain. It was small comfort that it got back some of its Caribbean sugar producing islands in lieu, and France was in very bad shape indeed. England also gained Florida from Spain and strengthened its hold on a series of Caribbean and Central American territories at Spain's expense so it ought to have been very happy. However all three of the bickering maritime Sunday School teachers had spent heavily on their European and New World wars and all three were under severe financial strain. They were not the only powers involved in the war. They were, in a sense, secondary players whose territorial interests centred on New World and Asian colonies rather than on European territorial claims and trade routes. But they each had very volatile alliances and treaties with central European powers which had been entered into (certainly not 'forged') during the previous decade and on which they were dependent for the integrity of their own territorial positions.

The events of the 1740s were very much a prelude to the Seven Years War. Frederick II of Prussia triggered a round of wars by swooping on Silesia in 1741 to strengthen his position and in doing so he exposed the newly installed Empress Maria Theresa's inability to secure her Austrian empire. His fellow monarchs followed suite very quickly in anticipation that the Austrian Empire was in its death throes. France moved to relieve Austria of the Netherlands and Luxemburg to strengthen its position in relation to England and to fulfill its ambition to become pre-eminent in Europe. Bavaria wanted to expand eastward and to make a bid for the imperial crown. And Saxony, whose Elector was also king of Poland, wanted what was left, Hungary. A deal between France and Bavaria gave Bavaria's Charles Albert the title of Emperor, with or without the pope's consent, and Austria's glory was about to be consigned to the history books. But the Hungarian aristocracy didn't welcome the change. They rallied to Maria Theresa's aid, pushed the French out of Prague and the Bavarians out of Munich, and forced Charles Albert to renounce his claim to the imperial title and to cede his provinces to Maria Theresa in her capacity as queen of Hungary. England and Sardinia joined forces as allies of Austria and planned an invasion of France so that they could share in the spoils, and Prussia, having triggered the whole affair, made peace with Austria and withdrew from the war after securing two prizes: Silesia and Saxony.

A general peace may have been possible but Maria Theresa wanted retribution against France. Never mind the trauma and casualties for the masses. The powers must have their glory. Austria, Sardinia and England signed a treaty at Worms in 1743 for an English-subsidized grand alliance against France. But Frederick or Prussia intervened again, invaded Bohemia, seized Prague, distracted Austria and relieved the pressure on France. It was then time for France to plot in the hope of extending its realm north through Belgium along the Channel coast and of re-establishing a Catholic monarchy in England. Early successes against English armies in the Austrian-controlled Netherlands appeared to put the goal within reach but the French had to contend with the vagaries of the Channel weather and the strength of attachment which the English aristocracy had developed for a Protestant monarchy. The great carve-up of Europe in the guise of a war to determine the Austrian Succession ground to a halt with only a bit of tinkering at the edges of territorial borders, but none of the powers were really satisfied.

Fresh alliances formed and re-formed around much the same issues that they had for several hundred years. But then the pattern began to change as governments and traders realized more clearly that the alliances they made could have a big bearing not only on their territorial survival but also on their chances to secure lucrative overseas colonies, or “possessions.” Maria Theresa took the initiative as Austria and France began to develop an accord as a buffer against Prussia and this evolved into a defensive and offensive treaty involving Russia also. This tended to re-focus France’s attention on Europe and its domestic problems and to distract it from its Trans-Atlantic interests. Frederick, previously loosely aligned with France against Austria, not trusting Austrian intentions, invaded Saxony in September 1756. He immediately had the armies of three nations aligned against him and encircling him, and Sweden soon joined the push. Prussia’s future looked bleak. Then England ignored its long-standing allegiance and threw its support behind Prussia instead of Austria. The pattern of the war changed.

King George II was opposed to any support for Frederick. H.A.L. Fisher quotes him as saying: “The King of Prussia is a mischievous rascal, a bad friend, a bad ally, a bad relation, and a bad neighbour, in fact, the most dangerous and ill-disposed prince in Europe.” But the English monarchy was no longer absolute. William Pitt was in charge. He wanted a greater slice of the colonial cake and he could see a way of gaining it through an alliance with Frederick. But how would he gain the support of both the aristocracy and the population at large for such a plan? A land grab and greed would do for the aristocracy who would gain the bulk of the benefits. But in the mood of the time it was not likely to raise the enthusiasm of the masses who would provide the gun fodder.

Pitt justified England’s support for Frederick on the basis of virtues which no one else was able to see. Frederick, he said, was the pillar of the Protestant faith and the champion of the liberties of Europe. His simplistic picture of the battlefield in Europe was Protestant Prussia and England taking on Catholic Austria and France but Pitt did not send an army into central Europe to fight alongside his new found ally. He subsidized the armies of Frederick’s vassals such as the Prince of Brunswick and by repeated raids on the French coast he prevented France from throwing its full force against Prussia.⁹ With religious freedom as the basis of his policy he therefore earned England a place at the peace talks and its share of the spoils from the Treaty of Paris. Or did he? His real motive was the displacement of France from the American colonies and Canada, and he described America as the “fountain of our wealth, the nerve of our strength, the nursery and basis of our naval power.”¹⁰ As the war progressed he showed little interest in his ally in Prussia and threw all of England’s capacity into a war against the French possessions in the Americas and Asia. As the Board of Trade tightened the screws on the American colonies, working on the basis of a philosophy with which he was obviously in full agreement, Pitt must have been well satisfied with the outcome of his “religious war” (dare we call it a crusade?) and the Treaty of Paris of 1763

RELIGION: A PRETEXT FOR WAR ...

Britain had not yet savoured the full benefits of absolute control in Bengal and effective control over the whole of the Indian Peninsula (which had been fragmenting rapidly from the impact of never-ending outside interference), both of which it gained during the period of the Seven Years War. It needed money and it thought it needed greater control over its American colonies to get it but at the same time it had to avoid an uprising by the French Catholic settlers in the territory which it had just acquired from France. Since 1625, about six generations, Quebec had been ruled as a Jesuit theocracy and that Treaty of Paris suddenly thrust them into the unenviable position of being a minority community of 70,000 in a total colonial population of two million, a high proportion of whom were vigorously anti-papal.¹¹ The lobbying and the double-dealing which resulted very quickly complicated relations between Britain and its colonies and sent shock waves back across the Atlantic.

Britain should not have been surprised. Pitt had not only used the pretext of a religious war to justify Britain’s involvement in the first place, but he had used the threat of French and Catholic encirclement as a means of getting the support of the remote colonists for its war against France and to raise units for the war in Canada. He had also encouraged exploration and land speculation in those regions west of the Allegheny Mountains which the French controlled and where Quebec-based Jesuit missions had been established. A young man named George Washington who had represented an English landlord named Fairfax at the time that he surveyed land around the upper Potomac was among the colonists who expected the British authorities to approve of settlement west of the Appalachian crest and he bought up soldier-bounty claims. Like the others, he was rather unhappy when the British government directed that the settlers and traders abandon their settlements in the former French territory which it put under the control of imperial agents, instead of the colonial governors, as a temporary measure to pacify the people and establish orderly government at the end of the war.

Further restrictions and the introduction of direct taxes through the Stamp Act (1765), Townshend duties (1767) and the Tea Act (1773) made the colonists even more restless.¹² They enjoyed a little merriment in the port of Boston at the expense of both the crown and the merchants who had been given exclusive rights to East India Company tea and then fretted while the English navy blockaded their port. But then it appeared that the position would improve. With Britain in a stronger trading and political position because of the profitability of its empire the government responded to the appeals from the colonists and released the pressure a bit by easing controls on the issue and use of paper money within the colonies.¹³

However the basic philosophy behind colonial policy hadn’t changed and neither had the politics of the Canadian territories. The British Parliament passed the Quebec Act. Former French areas were not to become an extension of the thirteen midcoast colonies for farming and urban industrial development. They were to be kept as fur hides and timber producing areas to serve British industries through merchants in Montreal and Quebec. Existing land occupancy was confirmed and further land tracts were retained for British army officers, merchants and gentry.¹⁴ Shades of Catherine of Russia. But whereas she had serfs to give away too, George III could only insist that the slave trade and transportation of felons fresh from the courthouses of the English countryside be continued in order to provide the necessary labour force, against the wishes of the existing colonists.

... AND A BASIS FOR A STATE

Unfortunately the parallel with Russia, Prussia, Austria and Poland goes even further. In the same way that official religious toleration in Eastern Europe had just come out of the first partition of Poland, which was still in the process of being enforced, it was expedient for the British Parliament to recognize the status of the Roman Catholic Church in its newly acquired colony of Quebec even though Catholics at home in Britain were still totally disenfranchised. As usual, the long term implications were not considered and it didn't seem to occur to the government that self-interest in colonial policy would eventually backfire.

In guaranteeing freedom of worship, property ownership and the vote to Quebec's Catholics just as the backbone of their settlement, the Jesuit order, was being disbanded the government did four things. It threw those people more directly into the clutches of the Vatican; it guaranteed a feudal and authoritarian system which would remain into the twentieth century and isolate Quebec from British Protestant settlers into the present era; it set the scene for renewed sectarian struggles at home; and it caused further conflict between itself and the American colonists.¹⁵

The colonists had had about enough. They were not only being exploited, they were now being shut in and their aspirations were being brushed aside to satisfy the greed of the English aristocracy and their need to do a deal with people who had been painted as the common enemy until that moment. When the Coercive and Restraining Acts which went hand in hand with the Quebec Act were passed, leading colonists convened the First Continental Congress. Delegates came from twelve of the thirteen midcoast colonies, set up the Continental Association and imposed an embargo on imports from England. It was so successful that by early 1775 imports had virtually disappeared. In April the British army moved in on government orders to arrest leaders of the congress. Might was right, of course, but not at all conclusive, and a series of skirmishes followed. Lacking wholehearted support from the people of England, George III threw in German mercenaries and, with the boot on the other foot, units from Quebec and Indian auxiliaries. The colonists, with Washington in overall command, marched on Quebec.

New attitudes and new antagonisms were being nurtured. In 1776, just twelve months after the first British march the Congress met again, declared the Trade and Navigation Acts null and void, ordered a stop to the colonial slave trade (but not the release of slaves then in service) and appointed Jefferson and company to draft a declaration of independence. Lord Dartmouth wrote that the colonists could not be allowed to “check or discourage a traffic so beneficent to the nation” in a response which was typical of the great proprietary interests of the mother country.¹⁶

TIME FOR A NEW APPROACH

But relations between Britain and the Americas were not evolving in isolation. There was no longer any isolation. Europe was in a continuing state of turmoil and Americans were intensely conscious of the conflicts and disputes which were buffeting and reshaping, yet again, the political, religious and social patterns of Europe. They were especially aware of the works of two people which resulted from, and reflected, that turmoil. One was Jean-Jaques Rousseau and the other was Francois-Marie Arouet – Voltaire.

Geneva-born Rousseau fled humiliating domestic conflict in an austere environment of rigid Calvinism and adopted Catholicism in his adopted home, France, in circumstances which he came to regard as shameful, and became the centre of a clique of young writers, musicians and philosophers. However he went through an experience which jolted him into the realization, or belief, that modern progress had corrupted men instead of improving them. He wrote A Discourse on the Sciences and the Arts in 1750 in which he argued that the history of man’s life on earth was a history of decay. He believed that humanity and society were not inherently bad and that they had taken a wrong direction under the influence of the Enlightenment. He set about passionately criticizing its central premises and argued that society needed simplicity and austere virtue. He repudiated his Catholicism, returned to Geneva and worked on Emile a book basically about education.

Freedom, he wrote, was not a matter of being left alone by the government under the rule of law, but was to be found in governing oneself – in making laws for oneself – both in a moral and political sense. True liberty not only demanded self-mastery, it also demanded a democracy, and could only be achieved when all were politically equal. Simplicity and austerity were needed, he argued, because the fewer the wants of a society, the fewer laws it would need, and the easier it would be to recognize and submit oneself to the common good. This common good he called the ‘general will’, and he argued that the general will, expressed properly through the will of the majority, was always right, and always in the best interests of each individual. Since it always aimed at preserving and promoting the conditions of freedom and equality by aiming at the best interests of society as a whole, it always accorded with the best interests of all the members of society. If you disagreed with the general will you were wrong, and in submitting to it you were being ‘forced to be free’. When Emile was published in 1762 both Geneva and Paris were scandalized. He responded to criticism saying that what political society needed was patriotic republican citizens who loved their country more than themselves, who believed in a simple and natural religion, and who were immersed in the common life of their people. Only then could a republic be strong enough to defend itself, and only then could the common good be put before selfish individual interests. His books were banned, he was arrested in Paris, escaped and lived a life on the run. But whether the elite liked them or not, Rousseau's ideas were providing an important intellectual and cultural wellspring for both the French Revolution and the broad European cultural movement of Romanticism. At the same time he was bringing the curtain down on the Enlightenment.

Voltaire's crusade was of a different kind. He was educated as a Jesuit but his bitter experience led him into a courageous crusade against tyranny, bigotry and cruelty. From 1709, when he was distressed by the horrors of religious persecution under Louis XIV, he set out to use his columns to shame the establishment, but when he mocked the Regent in an epigram in 1717 he was first banished, then imprisoned in the Bastille, beaten and sent into exile in England in 1726 where he was greatly influenced by Newton, Locke and the Quakers. In Geneva where he had then gone to live, he was at first admired by the Calvinist elite, but when he was accused of inspiring the writer for an encyclopedia to praise certain pastors for their doubts on Christ's divinity all hell was let loose. The publisher was forced to halt the encyclopedia and Voltaire was forced into exile again. But that did not curtail his writing. He returned again and again to his main themes: the establishment of religious tolerance, the growth of material prosperity, and respect for the rights of man by the abolition of torture and useless punishments. When the Protestant Jean Calas, a merchant of Toulouse accused of having murdered his son in order to prevent his conversion to the Roman Catholic Church, was broken on the wheel while protesting his innocence (March 10, 1762), Voltaire, livid with anger, took up the case and by his vigorous intervention obtained the vindication of the unfortunate Calas and the indemnification of the family. But he was less successful in a dramatic affair concerning the 19-year-old Chevalier de La Barre. La Barre was tried and beheaded for having insulted a religious procession and damaging a crucifix (July 1, 1766). Voltaire protested actively, suggesting that the Philosophes should leave France and settle in the town of Cleves, offered them by Frederick II. Although public opinion had been distressed by such barbarity, Voltaire was not even able to force a judicial review of the scandalous trial.¹⁷

SMITH: 'TRY MINE'

However, just as Jefferson was appointed to draft a declaration of independence another book was published which could, if they paid it close attention, strengthen the hands of the colonists considerably. Adam Smith, whose post as professor of moral philosophy at Glasgow University gave him responsibility for studies in the fields of natural theology, ethics, jurisprudence and political economy, published An Inquiry into the nature and causes of the Wealth of Nations in 1776. He provided the first comprehensive and systematic statement of political economy. It went beyond a simple study of economics and ranged over the much larger field of historical evolution. Rousseau was trying to reverse the trend of the Enlightenment, but in a very real sense Smith's work complemented the ground-breaking work of key figures of the Enlightenment. New ground had already been broken in the fields of mathematics, astronomy, science and philosophy. With Smith's work in economics all of the basic areas of study and human endeavour had now been drawn into the age of Enlightenment.

The basic perspective for Wealth of Nations was the domestic structure of a nation's economy and its path to wealth through the division of labour, the availability of resources, the policies of government and competition between suppliers. Smith was less concerned with interaction between nations. He outlined four basic stages through which he said a society passed from its original 'rude' hunting state towards advanced commercial interdependence, and he saw the concept of 'private property' linked to the protection of privilege as central to economic development, requiring the buttress of law and order systems. The recognition of private property was justified, he said, by economic aims rather than natural law. "Civil government," he wrote, "so far as it is instituted for the security of private property, is in reality instituted for the defence of the rich against the poor, or of those who have some property against those who have none at all." His system of "perfect liberty" required the evolution of institutions, the determination of wages by markets rather than guilds, and a free enterprise economy in which the market was self-correcting rather than one restrained by government. He had drafted guidelines for laissez-faire capitalism. But he qualified the idea in a very important manner. His system, he said, was in the best interests of all, provided that government is not entrusted to, or heeds the demands of, "the mean rapacity, the monopolizing spirit of merchants and manufacturers, who neither are, nor ought to be, the rulers of mankind." That was certainly not the way the Calvinist elite wanted to interpret the doctrine of predestination and it is in sharp contrast to the situation at the opening of the twenty first century in which control of government policies is an imperative of capital interests and the Bretton Woods Institutions.

However some aspects of Smith's writing did impact on relations between nations, especially where the regulations of one directly influenced another, as in the case of an imperial power and its colonies or when questions of the supply of resources were involved. He said that progress could be blocked by deficiencies of resources, wars, or bad policies of government. Those were the very issues which were being debated on both sides of the Atlantic and which would soon bring conflict between the American colonies and Britain to a head and result in their push for independence. In that regard it is noteworthy that after his retirement from academia Smith was appointed commissioner of customs and salt duties for Scotland.

Like many of the other key figures of the Enlightenment, Smith had remarkably wide interests and he wrote extensively on moral theology and social philosophy. In The Theory of Moral Sentiments he examined the source of human ability to form moral judgements, including judgements on one's own behaviour, passions and self-interest. He proposed that within each person there is an "inner man" who plays the role of the "impartial spectator," approving or condemning our own or others' actions with a voice impossible to disregard. But he also saw humans as creatures driven by passions and at the same time self-regulated by their ability to reason and by their capacity for sympathy. Individuals were pitted against one another and provided with rational and moral faculties to develop institutions through which destructive struggles could be mitigated and even put to the common good. He said that without knowing it or intending it, self-seeking men are often “led by an invisible hand ... to advance the interests of society.”¹⁸ In studying these aspects of human behaviour Smith was following the same course as both Descartes and Locke before him. Their reasoning and their conclusions overlapped or were similar in some respects but they differed, and even contradictory in others. None could be said to have found the conclusive ‘right answer.’ That is of no consequence. They were each responding to the ongoing public and theological debate about human nature and the doctrine of predestination in relation to Humanist ideas of free will. In order: the Synod of Dort made its pronouncements in 1619; Descartes wrote in 1644; Locke in 1689; and Smith in 1759. They each made remarkable contributions to the understanding of human nature and motivation and, ultimately, to a clearer understanding of the relationship between humanity and God. They were going through the process which the churches should have gone through but could not. The churches were anchored to doctrinal statements which were based on the prior doctrines and self-understanding which they had developed and insisted, on pain of death, had to be believed but which were not acceptable to a host of scholars. As with many other situations which we have considered, the debate could not have developed in this manner except in the context of the trouble in the triangle. It is interesting to ponder what statements the churches may have arrived at if the Synod of Dort had been held after those writers of the Enlightenment had made their contributions instead of before. Because the churches had dug their heels in so firmly in a bid to preserve their self-understanding, their status and their authority, they have shifted ground only very slowly indeed.

A FRENCH INTERVENTION

The tide of events was still running fast and in England’s favour until France, eager to redress her humiliation at England’s hands fourteen years earlier, entered the war either against England or for the colonists, or perhaps a bit of both, and persuaded the Spanish and Dutch to follow suit. For a while it was England’s turn to run but, possibly believing the American colonies a lost cause, the Royal Navy turned its attention full on the French in the Caribbean, gained a sharp victory and England went reasonably happily to Paris in 1763 to negotiate another treaty. The French scored one Caribbean island (Tabago) and an African slave trading post at St. Louis; the Spanish reclaimed Florida and the Mosquito Coast; the Dutch came out even; England held on to Canada; and the American colonists got their independence.

INDEPENDENCE ... FROM THE DIVINE RIGHT OF A KING

The colonists justified their defiant seizure of independence not on the basis of their mother country’s greed or their own material ambitions but by an attack on the person of the monarch and his actions. Their attack was certainly not against the monarchy as an institution and it was only against their “British brethren” with ties of “common kindred” to the extent that they had ignored warnings of “attempts by their legislature to extend an unwarrantable jurisdiction over us.” Appealing to “the Supreme Judge of the world” with “a firm reliance on the Protection of Divine Providence” they declared that their “United Colonies” are “Absolved from all Allegiance to the British Crown” as free and independent states. Saying that “the history of the present King of Great Britain is a history of repeated injuries and usurpations, all having in direct object the establishment of an absolute Tyranny over these states”, their declaration set out eighteen paragraphs of his sins and concluded that “a Prince, whose character is thus marked by every act which may define a Tyrant, is unfit to be the ruler of a free People.”¹⁹

While the declaration contained a challenge to the principle of an hereditary monarchy through the personal attack on George III it would be a mistake to think that the colonists were all tarred with the same brush as either the democratic Puritans and Whigs who had previously tried to clip the monarch’s wings or the republican army under Cromwell, fear of which is said to have stopped him from accepting the crown of England.²⁰ There was in reality quite a strong streak of the imperial spirit running through the leaders of the embryonic United States.

George Washington, landed gentleman, military leader and first president, is said to have refused the crown, in the shadow of Cromwell, but to have maintained a rather formal “court.” John Adams tried to set the executive above the “petty factionalizing” as an independent agency representing “the dignity of government and the interests of all the people” and even Thomas Jefferson is said to have made a republican patriot king of himself in a self conscious and backhanded way. He personified the revolutionary colonists’ call for “a patriot king or none.”²¹ What is more, the central government was so feeble in its early years because of the independence of the thirteen states and their reluctance to cede powers to Congress, encouraged by Britain’s insistence on separate negotiation with each of them no doubt, that there was a real danger of the federation falling apart. The establishment of a monarchy was seen as a possible solution, secret talks took place on the idea and the president of Congress, Nathaniel Gorham of Massachusetts, arranged for an approach to be made to the brother of Frederick of Prussia, Prince Henry, before the Constitution was ratified in 1787.²² In fact the declaration carries a more direct challenge to the church through its statement of misdeeds and aspirations than it does to the monarchy.

But where, we may wonder, is the connection with the church? It was only a few generations earlier that the Church of England had anchored itself to the doctrine of the Divine Right of Kings during its struggle to justify a break with papal Rome. The doctrine was simply an extension of the arguments used during the investiture controversy between the popes and kings of France and Germany. Similarly it was little different to the arguments used in Russia to tie the monarchy to the church and vice versa, and in Islam to perpetuate the Abbasid Caliphate. There were, however, a couple of refinements.

In the English version kings were accorded healing-by-touch’n’faith properties more often associated with bishops of Orthodox churches, and a rebellion against the king was a sin against God. The colonists were therefore very conscious of the enormous ethical and religious implications of what they were doing, especially because Maryland had been settled as a colony for English Catholics through the efforts of George Calvert, elevated to first Baron of Baltimore, under the patronage of Charles I.²³ Its royal charter was issued in 1632 just two months after Calvert died. Ten years later the English civil war brought serious conflict between Maryland and Virginia and it reached such bitterness and trauma when Charles lost his head on January 30, 1649 that Maryland was forced to introduce an act of religious toleration two months later. Only five years later that act was repealed and, with Cromwell at the reins, Catholicism was outlawed. It was still outlawed at the time of the war of Independence. The execution of Charles had actually sent chills down royal spines right across Europe. Several countries applied sanctions against England, not because they refuted the right of ordinary people to rise against oppression, but because his own parliament had actually killed their king! The Cossacks had just risen in Poland and this English ‘incident’ could provoke anything in Austria, Prussia or Russia.

When George III came to the throne he had the enthusiastic support of the vast majority of colonists. They saw him from their position as better able to fulfill the responsibilities which went with his Divine Right than his grandfather whom he succeeded. It was only when “corruption and factional conflict continued unabated” and a decade of “almost continuous controversy” began with the Townshend Act of 1766 that the “bubble of euphoria” finally burst. Even the Stamp Act had not turned them against him. They had seen it as a plot hatched by “dirty sycophants” and “ministerial hacks” to turn the colonies against him.²⁴ Even the religious conflict which had driven many of them to America and the continuing friction which they were experiencing had only shaken, but not destroyed, such deeply ingrained doctrines.

RELIGIOUS FREEDOM ENSHRINED

But now that was all behind them and they could settle down to the serious business of developing their country, establishing a strong trading position and otherwise quietly watching the rest of the world’s powers bicker among themselves. Or could they? Twelve colonies adopted the Declaration of Independence on July 4, 1776. New York abstained and only after much domestic debate adopted it on July 15. The Church of England had been established by law in four of New York’s main counties and penal laws to suppress Catholicism existed there as well as in Maryland. When the colony had been ceded to England by Holland in 1674 religious freedom had been guaranteed, but it didn’t last long. Religious intrigue, never far below the surface, reared its ugly head when a Catholic, Thomas Dongan, was appointed governor in 1682. By 1689 the government had been overthrown, Dongan and the Catholic clergy were outlawed and the Church of England was soon established complete with those penal laws.

When the Declaration of Independence came along with its challenge to the role and attitudes of the church it naturally caused a great deal of soul searching. The settlers, or at least some of them, wanted to cling to the churches of their heritage and the churches wanted to cling to their positions of privilege and authority. Several of the states retained or promptly adopted as their state churches the denominations with which their founding settlers had been linked. It seemed quite logical at first but then the struggle for the prestigious role of national church began. It seemed that sectarianism could bring the union down even if reluctance to cede powers didn't.

The solution was all too simple. There would be no direct links between the church and the state at all. The life, ethics and legislative procedures of the nation would be based on generally accepted Christian principles but there would be no single church with precedence over any other. The young nation had reached a point which had not been possible in Europe. The very first amendment to the constitution of the United States of America was adopted in 1791, just two years after the constitution had been ratified.

Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

The independent young nation out in the New World had made a momentous decision and in doing so it was providing a lead which was soon to be followed by many countries. Forced into the position of avoiding conflict within the nation by clipping the wings of the fragmented church, it had established a new relationship between the church and the state. Like it or not, the church in the USA was to be only the moral and religious teacher; the conscience of its adherents, the business community and the legislature; and the guiding light upon the hill which would determine the ethics of the nation and its dealings with every other nation. It was to have no direct role in government; no system of courts with enforceable jurisdiction in civil matters parallel with the civil judiciary; a strictly defined role in education and certainly no taxing powers. The church might still see itself as the sole route to Salvation and the ultimate interpreter of God's will on earth but the state didn't see it that way and the mechanism of Salvation was to be leadership and not liturgy.

However these rebellious young refugees from religious intolerance who were striking out on their own were not on their own in their eagerness to clip the church's wings. It was twenty years since Peter III had turned the church in Russia inside out and the pace of events had been hotting up right across Europe. Every major event or government decision and the effects of those decisions became ingredients in consequent events. Of course it had never been any different since one man first swung a punch at another – action and reaction – but as the stakes were getting higher so the reactions were becoming more rapid and more violent. And now the American War of Independence had provided countless ingredients for a revolution in France which was about to trigger such chain reactions that no country in Europe could avoid becoming involved.

Changes in the role of the church and in church/state relations which had not been achieved through reformation were about to come through revolution. Europe would soon be well aware of the death pangs of the Holy Roman Empire. However for the time being it was still cloistered or, perhaps more correctly, isolated by its church-built walls and moats, seemingly all-powerful and favoured by the Almighty, and it was still inhibited in its thinking by the church's self-assessment which remained, shaken but not destroyed, in spite of the Reformation. It would therefore be less conscious that the long-standing relationship between its church and the other partners in the triangle had been torn to shreds. A new relationship was beginning to evolve and the thing which would shape it would be the conduct of the world's Christians: the very same factor which had spawned, shaped, battered and torn the triangle up to that stage.

The decision by France to conclude an alliance with the rebellious colonies a few months after their declaration of independence had only a little to do with sympathy for republicanism. In fact there was real sympathy for that philosophy only among the academics of the anarchist fringe. Certainly Louis XVI had come to the throne while George III of England was organizing a navy to close the harbour at Boston after its tea party, but the French people were more impressed by what Frederick was achieving in Prussia and they longed for an enlightened despot who, like a new Charlemagne, would reform the state. It was generally the case that Europe's kings and queens were becoming more progressive out of fear for popular uprisings while their Diets of dominant nobles were solidly conservative, clinging to the privileges they held because of exactly the same fear.

GRAND MONARCHY

In spite of some setbacks France was still the classic model of a grand monarchy and enjoyed an overall level of prosperity and culture which was the envy of Britain and most of Europe. Its foreign trade had increased even faster than England's, (being six times as great as only sixty years before), it had splendid internal transport, a flourishing textile industry, and vast agricultural resources worked by a population almost three times as large as all of Britain. But the lack of an equitable taxation system brought social inequality and enormous financial problems.

Neither the nobility nor the church and its clergy who were supported by compulsory tithes from the ordinary people paid any tax and posts in the judiciary, the church, the army and the navy were denied by conditions of privilege to even the educated middle class.²⁵ Among the cabinet ministers whom Louis inherited was a man named Turgot who wanted to free the corn trade and abolish the restrictive trade guilds. He is said to have been the most brilliant and to have been best able to introduce reforms to bridge the privilege gap, if he had received support. Quite clearly the reforms he proposed would have required a strong king to back him because they were their own guarantee of opposition from those who then controlled the life of France. Louis was not such a king and after a little more than a year he dismissed Turgot for lack of results and appointed a Protestant banker with republican leanings from Geneva. With a background like that the poor man, Necker by name, was marked for elimination from the start. However the young Louis had not been completely dumb. He knew that Bourbon kings ought to marry within the Holy Roman Empire. He had gone straight to the top and took the hand of Marie Antoinette, daughter of Maria Theresa and sister of the reigning Austrian Emperor Joseph. It was the queen who didn't want a Protestant finance minister.

Just a year on and the American colonies took their bold step, declared their independence and prepared for a hard struggle. They needed trade treaties and support from Europe to be able to bypass England. There was a basis for trade treaties with both Holland and France but France was still smarting from the loss of Quebec and its other North American territories, so an alliance could kill two birds with one stone. The deal was done. The outcome was that from 1778 Necker had the task of raising funds to finance another war with England. The nobles and the church wouldn't budge, so rather than bleed the poorer social groups even further he borrowed heavily in anticipation of the fruits of victory and increased foreign trade.

That policy was fine until the rebel colonies had an important victory at Yorktown, Virginia, and the British government decided to forfeit the rebel colonies, turn its attention to the French and Dutch overseas territories, and cut its losses at the expense of those countries. In the meantime the Quebec Act of 1774 had brought increased pressure from the very small but real Catholic minority in England for land rights. When France entered the war on the side of the colonists there were two immediate reactions. In the colonies it reduced the prejudice against the Catholic minority ²⁶, and in England it highlighted the land rights question and added fuel to the fire of antiwar feeling. To defuse the religious tension the government granted to English Catholics the same land rights which French Catholics in Quebec, now supporting England against the rebels and France, already enjoyed.

In France, with the war losing its attraction and the national debt getting bigger, Necker tried to set up provincial assemblies to reduce the power of the church, the nobles and regional superintendents. He just had to follow Turgot into the wilderness. He did. Then with the Treaty of Paris out of the way in 1783 it was time for France to take stock. It had regained a bit of territory but the cost had been enormous. A series of ministers had failed to produce any acceptable financial policies and the country was becoming restless, although by no means explosive.

Dear Marie Antoinette, ever at the king's side, at least when a policy decision had to be taken, intervened to have Calonne appointed finance minister. Her idea of restoring the economic health of the nation was to lavish grants on the church to restore it to the glories of days long past and with even greater power over the private lives of ordinary people, to lavish favours on the nobility, encourage aristocratic elegance and extravagance and to remove those not of aristocratic birth from the army and the civil service.²⁷ She grossly misjudged the nerve of France. Or perhaps she realized that the French monarchy needed a supportive civil service and aristocracy for much the same reasons as Catherine in Russia. She left Calonne with no option but increased debt financing. The pampered aristocracy indignantly refused to pay a property tax. Loan piled on loan until the monarchy was declared bankrupt.

Calonne was frank enough to write that France was a kingdom in which the richest class was the most lightly taxed; where privilege had upset all equilibrium; a necessarily imperfect kingdom, very full of abuses in which it was impossible to have any constant rule or common will and which had become impossible to govern.²⁸ It was his turn to go. Louis recalled Necker and summoned the unwieldy States General to meet in May 1789, just 175 years since it had been called together at the height of Europe's Reformation wars.

Just the fact that he called it to meet was enough to add a sense of national crisis to the urgent matters to be resolved and if there wasn't a crisis before it met there certainly was soon after. The nature of the three estates, (the clergy, nobility and 'commons' or professional and commercial groups), appeared to make solutions through consensus on economic reform impossible. However with nine months for politicking and intrigue before the States General met, the anticlerical groups which generally wanted a constitutional monarchy, the Jacobins and the republican fringe, had plenty of time to determine tactics. If they were going to try to finance the national debt by liquidating church property they had some excellent precedents to base their case on. There was Peter III in Russia 27 years earlier, in 1762; there was the appropriation of Jesuit funds and property in Spanish California a little more recently, in 1767; but much more to the point there was the program which Joseph II, Marie Antoinette's brother, had begun in Austria just eight years earlier, in 1781.

In an empire which needed peace rather than economic miracles Joseph had issued a remarkable Patent of Toleration in 1781. Like Catherine, he had a piece of Poland to absorb and religious toleration was essential, except for Jews of course. In the state which had become the chief protector of the papacy the Emperor declared Catholicism to be the state religion; the church assumed the role of a department of the state and was given exclusive authority to conduct public worship; but the clergy swore allegiance to the emperor who exercised the power of veto over papal bulls, and other churches were permitted to build places of worship and conduct services in private. Marriage was made a civil matter and dissoluble, and ceased to be an exclusive religious sacrament. The state took full responsibility for all education, including even that of the clergy who were to have a sound and comprehensive training, liberal in outlook and compatible with the latest developments in the sciences. Joseph even founded five general seminaries. But then came the crunch. He suppressed the diocesan seminaries as unsatisfactory and put the properties to other uses; contemplative monasteries and convents he closed, leaving open only those devoted to practical duties such as teaching or the care of the sick; he cut the number of monks from 65,000 to 27,000 and he liquidated seven hundred of the 2,163 monastic establishments.²⁹ The pope, Pius VI, even travelled to Vienna to intervene in 1782 just as France, Britain and the American colonies were winding down their war, but he was powerless to influence the emperor's policies.³⁰

Joseph's program of enlightened reform in Austria was in full swing when the States General finally met in France. It appears that an understanding developed between them that the clergy would team up with the commons to wring economic reforms out of the nobles which would reduce the tax burden on the ordinary people without requiring many concessions from the church.³¹ It could be settled by the simple process of a vote because the mechanism was in place. Perhaps. Three months before the States General was to meet the government had agreed that the Third Estate would have 621 deputies and outnumber the clergy (308) and the nobles (285) combined, but it did not resolve the "procedural question" of whether they would all meet as a single body or as three separate debating chambers.³² The response to that little question showed that the nobles still held the reins of government firmly and real reform was unlikely.

With nothing to show for the first five weeks of farce the third estate declared itself to be a National Assembly on June 10th 1789. Ten days later, with Louis offering concessions but being restrained by his court clique, the Assembly swore not to dissolve until France had a new constitution. Detesting the very thought of concessions, let alone a new constitution and the loss of much of their power and privilege, the palace clique swung into action. It forced Louis to dismiss the reforming Protestant upstart, Necker, for the second time and to set up a coercive army camp near Versailles where the States General had met and where the National Assembly was now in control.

But in the streets the bread queues were getting longer, hunger-stricken mothers and children wept for bread while Marie Antoinette dined in luxury with her courtiers. The mood of Paris grew resentful and that conservative reaction brought a prompt response.³³ On June 23rd the clergy of the first estate split. Just one less than half of the 308 clergy, (149 pastors and four bishops), being most of those who had collaborated with the third estate and who were generally from the lower, non-aristocratic, posts of the church, joined the National Assembly. The government line toughened. So did that of the mainstream aristocratic church hierarchy. Leadership of the National Assembly lurched equally firmly the other way into the hands of confirmed anti-clerics and republicans and France could not avoid a head-on confrontation. It was the monarchy, the nobility and the hard-liners of the church hierarchy versus the rest.

Three weeks later the storming of the state prison, the Bastille, the murder of its governor, the slaughter of the garrison which had already surrendered on terms, and the total destruction of the old fortress triggered nationwide attacks on castles, churches and monasteries. It brought the king to his knees. Louis had to recall the army, dismiss his Ministers, recall Necker yet again and recognize the National Assembly.

AN ALTERNATIVE ROUTE TO PEACE ...

Such was the devastation that the nobility began to plead for peace and the initiative passed more firmly to the National Assembly. On August 4–5, just three weeks after the storming of the Bastille, the clergy present renounced all feudal rights, including any claim to peasant tithes,³⁴ vested their land in the name of the nation's peasants and renounced all distinctions of clerical rank and office. Serfdom, noble titles, privileges and tax exemptions were all abolished. The entire medieval feudal order of the Catholic Church in France began to collapse and because it was spontaneous the collapse was more rapid and more traumatic than in both Russia and Austria.

Another three weeks and the Declaration of the Rights of Man was proclaimed. At the stroke of a pen the revolutionaries achieved what the reformers had failed to achieve and lost sight of, if they had ever had a vision of it. Article ten of the Declaration granted freedom of religion and conscience to all Frenchmen. Even Jews were to enjoy liberty, equality and fraternity. Against the bitter opposition of the Vatican-backed hierarchy the ghetto gates began to swing open. All memories of Maimonides had not been swept away but Deism could no longer be harshly put down by the church.

The declaration was eventually prefixed to a new constitution which Louis accepted in 1791, about the same time that the First Amendment to the constitution of the United States of America guaranteed freedom of religion and prevented the establishment of a national church in the young republic. In the meantime the National Assembly had ruled and France settled down to a period of reasonable peace with a king whose power was somewhat restricted, but the church hierarchy had dug its heels in hard. It was not ready to forfeit all its property, although in view of Emperor Joseph's program in Austria the pope was powerless to prevent a similar policy being enforced in France.³⁵ In February 1790 all non-charitable orders and monasteries were closed, in April a law providing for the confiscation and secularization of all church property was passed, and in July, almost one year to the day since the slaughter at the Bastille, the incorporation of the Catholic Church in France into the French State as a national church, completely separated from Rome, was foreshadowed in the Civil Constitution of the Clergy.³⁶

However the motivation behind that final step was not entirely revolutionary in the same sense that the church's properties were being confiscated to pay the nation's debts and to break the church's feudal hold over the people. Relations between France and the Vatican had been uneasy ever since the days of the Franks and Boniface and the anti-papal clergy were now happy to take advantage of the revolution to end the dominance of the Vatican which was against their deeply entrenched "Gallicanism." The Concordat of Bologna which Leo X and Francis I had signed in 1516, during the politicking in the run up to the Reformation, had given the king wide rights to nominate the church hierarchy and his nominations were only to be confirmed by the pope. The new constitution was to go further and give the French church much more the role of the Austrian or even the Russian church, for which there was substantial sympathy in France. It also took account of public petitions which had been prepared for the States General.

Archbishoprics were abolished, fifty seven bishoprics were eliminated, church diocesan and civil department boundaries were matched, and staff, councils and their patterns of authority within a diocese were thoroughly overhauled. Above all, the clergy were to swear allegiance to the church of the new constitution and not to the pope. However, whereas in Austria the bishops were nominated by the hierarchy and in Russia they were appointed by the state, in France they were to be elected by the civil electors of each department, after they had heard mass and taken an oath to consider only religious issues, of course.³⁷

As in Austria the clergy became civil servants, being paid salaries by the state, and carrying out some administrative duties otherwise carried out by civil servants. To this extent marriage was to become a civil and not a sacramental function. Certainly the administrative role of the clergy increased at the expense of their priestly and pastoral roles, but considering the self-understanding and attitudes of the autocratic and aristocratic church hierarchy it is doubtful whether this was a significant stimulus to opposition.

With such dramatic changes involved, and with Marie Antoinette and the church hierarchy leaning on each other more and more, Louis, even in his precarious position, was not prepared to ratify the Civil Constitution of the Church without consulting the pope. But the pope did not reply officially. Instead the Vatican set about supporting, (or inciting to opposition), those clergy still faithful to it.³⁸ Chaos followed and Catholics battled Catholics instead of Huguenots as each side pressed its case on the monarchy. Papal sympathizers tried to prove that politicians and at least, Jews, Judaizers or Deists and even Protestants would be able to influence the civil elections for bishops, and Marie Antoinette began to intrigue with anyone outside France who might oppose the new constitution. Civil unrest was on the increase again and when a decision could not be delayed for want of a papal reply any longer the king proclaimed the Civil Constitution of the Church, disestablished the Roman Catholic Church and required the clergy to swear allegiance to the civil constitution in November 1790.

Reports vary on the proportion of clergy who signed (known as jurors), retained their posts and drew their salaries from the state church, but it is reasonable to work on estimates of one half, which corresponds with the numbers who threw in their lot with the Third Estate in the National Assembly.³⁹ The nonjurors were expelled from their posts and forfeited their salaries and all rights. Some quietly retired, but probably not many. Some fled from France, joined their colleagues in and out of the nobility in the fun of Marie Antoinette's intrigues and organized a fifth column in France with mercenaries and political supporters outside preparing for a counter-revolution.

Louis tired of being a constitutional monarch, or a sort of final adjudicator at the end of a new and orderly judicial system which had been set up, and of rubber-stamping one move after another to steadily liquidate the old church order and the properties of the aristocracy. He drew up a manifesto abrogating the constitutional changes he had been compelled to sign, threw in his lot with the nonjuring clergy, and tried to flee the country to his brother-in-law, the emperor, in Austria. All that he succeeded in doing was foment civil war. He was caught before he reached the border and returned, a prisoner, to Paris. After ten weeks suspended by the National Assembly he was reinstated when the new constitution was ready to be put into effect in September 1791.

Unfortunately in drawing on both the well established parliamentary system and constitutional monarchy of Westminster and the fledgling republican system of Washington the constitutional draftsmen in Paris were at once inspired and naive. In providing a constitutional monarchy with a non-elected cabinet and a Legislative Assembly from which all who had served in the National Assembly were excluded they had provided a system which was doomed to failure. Inexperienced radicals gained control, the king and queen set out to undermine the lot and France's friends and competitors formed some strange alliances against the new France. They were driven by a mixed bag of motives which included reinstating the monarchy to its former position, hacking away at France's foreign trade and overseas possessions, and reverting to a Roman and papal church from the national church with a civil constitution.

Joseph had died just as France's revolutionaries were taking his Austrian State Church as one of the models for their own. Pope Pius VI promptly and eagerly joined Marie Antoinette in welcoming her next brother, Leopold, to the imperial throne with a few concessions and incentives to encourage him to reverse some of Joseph's reforms, to oppose the French Revolution and to press for the full reinstatement of the monarchy and the Roman Catholic Church in France. The complex maze of domestic and foreign interference threw France into absolute confusion with parish against parish and brother against brother. It was worse than a re-run of the Reformation years. Peace, love and harmony – the hallmarks of the Gospel – were nowhere to be seen, let alone relief from oppression or a glimpse of salvation.

... THROUGH ANOTHER WAR OR TWO

In August 1791 Leopold and the Prussian king declared the restoration of order and the monarchy, a matter of interest to all sovereigns, and encouraged an army of French emigrants, nobles, nonjuring clergy and royalist army officers to gather just along the border. Marie Antoinette pleaded with Leopold to summon a Congress of Europe, to mount an army and put down the revolution. Louis, taking advantage of the strangest set of bed-fellows the revolution could assemble, but driven by a hope that in a war the revolutionaries would be quickly trounced and his position restored, then paid a visit to the Assembly on April 20, 1792, and, to great applause, proposed war against Austria.

Voltaire could not have dreamed up a more mocking plot. As Louis and Marie Antoinette expected, the war began disastrously with an invasion of Belgium turning into a fiasco. That was the signal for Prussia to declare war on France in league with Austria. Leopold, loud in his threats but slow to throw his people into war for the sake of either his sister or the pope, died after only two years at the helm and his impetuous 24 year old son Frances II, taking the title Holy Roman Emperor, threw himself into the fray with a will. In August, with Prussia marching on Paris, Danton incited a mob attack on the palace at Tuileries, the arrest of Louis and Marie Antoinette, and the mass arrest of royalists. He argued that the monarch could hardly lead or even be free during the defence against an attack which the Duke of Brunswick insisted was to put him back in full authority.

The war continued to go badly for the revolution and mobs began to raid prisons to vent their spleen on the royalist prisoners. The September massacre was soon in full swing. Revolutionaries would take over a prison, put the prisoners through a "court" one by one, release them or thrust them out to the mob to be slashed, hacked, stabbed and beaten to death. Heads, hacked from bodies, were carried lustfully through the streets on pikes.

Suddenly the tide turned. The Prussian army was stopped, temporarily it seemed at first, by a small action at Valmy, 170 km from Paris. But they could fight no more. Dysentery, brought on by over indulgence in green champagne grapes had them on the run about ten days later.⁴⁰

Meanwhile, on September 21, immediately after the battle at Valmy, the National Convention, which had gained the support of only a flimsy six percent of the electorate, was able to proclaim a republic.

Then, as ragged, ill-trained but inspired armies of the republic pushed the Prussians and the royalist émigrés back towards the border the aims of the revolution became blurred. Expansion and reprisal replaced freedom as an aim. Envious of Austria's grip on Belgium and Holland and determined to cut into Britain's trade by re establishing Antwerp as a major port and entry point for European imports, the republican armies pushed north. Within a matter of weeks they tore up the unnatural Treaty of the Scheldt and boldly announced that Antwerp was open for trade. Britain reacted by increasing its subsidies and support for French Catholic clergy who were taking refuge in England. France responded by inciting rebellion in Ireland, and pressed on to relieve a large portion of Protestant Holland from Catholic Austrian domination.

Louis couldn't last, and on January 21, 1793 he lost his head for treason. Although his fate was not unexpected Britain put on a show of royal indignation, withdrew her ambassador from France in the same way that European powers had boycotted her when Charles had walked to the scaffold, and used it as an excuse to join battle with France again on all fronts.

Robespierre came to power a little later and liquidation of the monarchy took a nasty turn. The Revolutionary Tribunal assumed a political role similar to the religious role of the Inquisition. But in place of the crude brutality of the Inquisition it simply used the quick, terrifying guillotine – 1,220 times up to May 1794 then 1,376 times during June and July – until Robespierre ended up under the blade himself for his excesses on July 28 1794. But before he went he had reacted to the Church's view of itself, its role in the revolution and its doctrines in a manner much more extreme than any other reformer, anti-cleric or autocratic monarch.

CHURCH AND STATE DRIFT APART

Organized Christianity was abolished in France altogether by an edict in November 1793. There was to be no papal church, state church, Protestant church or any other sort of church. The cult of reason, with recognition of a Supreme Being and immortality of the soul, was to be a sufficient system of religious faith without the need for earthly institutional authority, doctrine and liturgy. His all-consuming passion to develop a new order of life and human relations had taken him so far, probably to the point of mental imbalance, that his achievements and his motives were easily forgotten. All that lingered after Robespierre was the memory of the often exaggerated reign of terror.⁴¹ After his execution the clergy tended to be drawn together again and the opportunity for a thorough and effective theological rethink which came with his frontal attack on the church was scuttled. The Roman Catholic Church was able to reassert itself, together with the state church of the civil constitution, although from February 1795 the constitution was changed again to separate the church and the state completely.

During his fantastic year Robespierre had brought order and scientific developments, including the semaphore telegraph, into the French army; a royalist counter revolution was put down at Lyons; the Duke of York was beaten at Hondschoote and the British were expelled from Toulon; Belgium was reconquered; and the Austrians were defeated at Wattignies and Fleurus. Robespierre's successors in a Directory of five men, although also unequal to the task of shaping the destiny of the first republic which had grown out of a European grand monarchy, was given a chance to concentrate on rebuilding the economic and social fabric of France and of circumventing the blockade by Britain. Russia, Prussia and Austria kindly obliged by relieving the pressure from the east while they were preoccupied with the second and third stages of the partition of Poland, then Prussia and Spain withdrew from the French war games, temporarily, in 1795. Perhaps they had sensed the overthrow of the Revolution and a return to monarchy without further outside interference. It had certainly come close in October that year.

The government had been saved through brilliant intervention by a young Corsican artillery general, Napoleon Bonaparte, who had been recalled to duty in a crisis situation by the Directory after being dropped during an earlier round of intrigue. The romantic twenty-six-year-old who had been commissioned in the cavalry at the age of sixteen, had already shown rare military genius in action at the siege of Toulon in 1793. But he was a critical, egotistical, scientifically inclined rationalist and these things, coupled with his friendship with Robespierre, had cost him dearly. However, because of his success at Toulon and in view of the government's obvious debt to him, the young Napoleon, was appointed General of the Interior in the crisis of October 1795. A few months later, early in 1796, he was given command of the war against the pope, Pius VI, and Austria, in league, which was being fought in northern Italy. Pius, a prime manipulator in both the civil trauma in France and the alliances against it, soon realized that Napoleon had him cut off by land from Austria and unable to defend the papal states. He also knew that if he was to salvage anything for the Roman Catholic Church in France he had to reach an understanding with Napoleon. He therefore opened negotiations and signed the Peace of Bologna on June 23, 1796, leaving Napoleon free to concentrate on Austria.

However Pius VI found it hard to keep his fingers out of France's internal affairs and Napoleon turned his army against the papal states again. The peace of Tolentino, February 19, 1797, was much more onerous than the earlier one. The pope had to finally renounce his claim to Avignon and pay six million scudi in reparations, tribute, or whatever else the price for survival is called.⁴² By October a series of defeats also brought Austria to the negotiating table and Napoleon went home with a peace treaty loaded heavily in France's favour, a lot more French territory and immense prestige.

The ebb and flow of papal alliances, political manipulation, double-crossing and wars during the long period of the Holy Roman Empire which resulted from the Vatican's struggle to combine world political and religious domination in the papacy had left Italy fragmented. During the two generations since the question of Austrian Succession had been settled (by war and not by either a vote of the princes or the pope) some eleven states, principalities and republics had tried to live peaceably like sardines. Towns were being modernized, agriculture improved and the population was rising. But many of them were ruled by kings or princes who had been left to run a subject territory by rulers of major European powers after one or other of the papal wars and they still hiccuped every time a European monarch glared at one of his neighbours. They just couldn't avoid being drawn into other peoples' jealousies, especially if the pope was trying to pull a few strings or organize a counter-reformation.

Such was the situation when the pope and Austria's emperor decided to dabble in the French Revolution and the ordinary people of Italy were the losers once more. But now, with the Corsican-born general knocking over trade barriers, discriminatory migration, and financial and religious controls as he merged some of the states, and the enclaves into which they were subdivided, the people became more conscious that Italy was a geographical expression and little more. Machiavelli, second chancellor to the republic during the papacies of Alexander VI and Julius II, had contributed to Reformation thinking with his cry that the papacy was the main obstacle to Italian political unity and that Italy needed a powerful political ruler not involved in the determination of moral standards. It had cost him his office, a spell in gaol and exile under the Medicis from 1513 until his death in 1527 when the fury of the Reformation was reaching its peak. But now his words rang true as Napoleon began to demonstrate that unity was possible and not just pie-in-the-sky.

Writers like the Piedmontese Count Vittorio Alfieri glorified the American republic and the unity of Britain under a constitutional monarchy, and Freemasonry, which had been spreading across Europe from England since the beginning of the century, began to lead an anti-papal push for Italian Unity.⁴³ So, as Napoleon returned to Paris in December 1797 he took with him a clear understanding of the mentality of the pope and the Vatican from their confrontations and negotiations. He left the pope seething from having his wings clipped; he knew that the yearning among Italians for the reunification of their country, the Risorgimento, was beginning to pick up steam; and he understood the aspirations of people living in a politically and socially fragmented soldiers' playground even more clearly than from his childhood on Corsica.

The Directory harboured a yearning to launch an attack on England and wanted Napoleon to command it, but its backdoor attempt through Ireland while he had been in Italy was a total failure. Therefore, because France's fleet of fifty seven battleships was "as little prepared for battle as it was four months ago" he advised against it and supported a previously mooted plan for the occupation of Egypt.⁴⁴ The British naval blockade of France and control of the Cape route to the east was so effective that French trade and the economy of the republic was at risk. Unless France could break Britain's naval supremacy its only hope was to reopen the Suez/Red Sea route to India and the east. It had been closed to Western Christian Europe ever since 616 when Heraclius lost Egypt to Chosroes, the Persian, just as the first groups of persecuted Muslim refugees were setting up an Islamic community in Ethiopia on the African coast of the Red Sea. Since then the only European Christian power bases along the Eastern Mediterranean had been those set up during the ghastly period of the crusades. The last of these, Acre, had fallen to the Mamelukes in 1291.

NAPOLÉON'S WEDGE, AND A FLIRT WITH ISLAM

Napoleon saw the Red Sea route as a means of driving a wedge between Britain and the east as well as a means of recovery for France. He wrote that “to destroy England completely we must seize Egypt” and on April 12 1798 the Directory instructed him to conquer Malta and Egypt, secure the Red Sea and improve the condition of the inhabitants of Egypt. In doing these things he was to maintain good relations with the Porte and thereby keep Turkey out of a war on the grounds that France was protecting Turkey’s interests by evicting the Mameluke usurpers.⁴⁵

The Egyptian expedition was no mere short term military expedient. France intended to stay. Napoleon arrived in July 1798 with nearly 400 ships, of which only 13 were battleships, 38,000 troops and more than 150 scientists, engineers and archeologists.⁴⁶ In spite of the British fleet under Nelson tracking and almost annihilating the French fleet at anchor near Alexandria, Napoleon pressed on with the occupation of Egypt, endeavouring to isolate the Mameluke overlords from their Arab Muslim and Coptic Christian subjects. He set up local advisory committees; established an Institute of Egypt for survey, exploration and archaeological programs; gave strict orders that every aspect of Muslim religious life was to be respected and that pillaging was taboo. He sent messages of respect to Mecca; had long discussions on theology with Muslim leaders in Cairo and held out to them the possibility of the entire French army of occupation being converted to Islam.⁴⁷

Territorial expansion by a Western European Christian power into the heartland of Islam, the junior partner in the triangle, was now fait accompli. The faith which had been denigrated, made the subject of malicious misrepresentation, and which had been made both the reason for and the object of political and military manoeuvres of the basest kind was now being wooed for political, military and trade benefit. The territorial grab had been made necessary by national need on the part of France and national greed on the part of Britain. It flowed from animosity between those two major Christian powers, heavily laced with religious bigotry and the concept that all the world was Christian Europe’s plaything. It had been made possible by technological developments which had been triggered largely by the very same factors even though such developments had been inhibited by doctrinal misconceptions and religious arrogance for a very long time. Contact had been established which provided for meaningful dialogue at a high level for the first time. It had been established with no initiative from the Vatican or any other church authority – in fact in spite of them. It made a mockery of those papal plans to mount one more mighty pincers movement crusade to eliminate Islam. It was an opportunity for the Christian world to take a fresh look at Islam and itself in circumstances which had not been possible previously and it is beyond question that Napoleon understood better than the church the significance of the contact he had established. Perhaps he assessed the chances of establishing meaningful dialogue at the level of theological re-assessment as hopeless. Ultimately, whatever the reason, the opportunity went begging.

It has been argued that Napoleon, a Christian thrust into the conqueror’s role by circumstances, was two-faced in his dealings with the Muslim community and that he was only concerned with victory, politics and his personal future, but that does him a gross injustice. For the first time ever a Christian conqueror was showing genuine religious tolerance, understanding and personal responsibility towards a conquered Muslim people. His attitude and his actions were in sharp contrast to the Crusaders, the Spanish, the Russians and the European states bordering the Turkish Ottoman Empire. Quite apart from his intense belief in religious tolerance which was to show time and time again there is no doubt that he had genuine empathy and sympathy with Islam.

According to his will he died in the Catholic, Apostolic and Roman faith into which he had been born. But he told one confidant shortly before his death that he was glad he had no religion because he had no imaginary fears and no fears for the future, and he told another that Islam was a more effective religion than Christianity.⁴⁸ However, at the time that he was in close dialogue with Muslims in Cairo most of his career lay before him.

NAPOLÉON'S ABSOLUTE POWER

After an abortive attempt to capture Palestine and Syria, thwarted by collaboration between Britain and Turkey and disgraced by the out-of-character massacre of 3,000 Turkish prisoners at Jaffa which had served to recall the excesses of the Crusaders, Napoleon left a commander in charge of Egypt and sailed on August 24, 1799, for Paris where the re-elected Directory, somewhat to the left of French politics, was desperately trying to cope with a new alliance against France. The British had been joined by Turkey, Naples, Russia and Austria. By September 18, Napoleon was in effective control of the Republic as First Consul, having taken full advantage of an invitation to spearhead a Jacobin coup d'état against the Directory and the Council. Within a matter of weeks he had out-manoeuvred the councils and the other two consuls and was exercising absolute power through new structures of government well before a new constitution was approved, overwhelmingly, in February 1800.

Napoleon saw with exceptional clarity that France's internal bleeding from religious conflict had to be healed before it could gain the health and strength necessary to reach a position of pre-eminence in Europe and to bring peace to the whole continent through unification. But unlike Constantine, a great succession of emperors, popes and people like Calvin, he saw that peace and political stability would come not through imposed theological conformity but through religious tolerance. However it was not until after another somewhat shaky victory against Austria in December 1800, fought again in northern Italy, and a peace treaty that brought more territorial advantage to France that he was able to turn his attention to domestic economic and religious affairs.

While Napoleon was in Egypt the Vatican's allies in France had continued to intrigue against the Directory and the civil constitution of the church in spite of the two settlements which Pius VI had signed with Napoleon during his first sortie into Italy. Anti-Roman feeling was running so high that when a French envoy, General Duphot, was murdered in Rome the city was occupied by General Berthier. Five weeks later, on February 15 1798, the pope was declared deposed and the papal states were proclaimed a republic. The pope was imprisoned a few days later and died on August 20 1799 in the south of France while Napoleon was on his way back from Cairo to Paris. With Rome in the hands of a republic there were many who expected that the papacy was at an end. But thirty five cardinals met in Venice, elected a pope-in-exile and began the struggle to recover Rome for the papacy before another schism developed and the civil church became entrenched in France. There can be no doubt that Napoleon had the military capacity to prevent the newly elected Pius VII from returning to Rome as pope. However he did not do so and it is quite consistent with his conciliatory policy that he reinstated Pius VII in Rome in June 1800 and immediately began negotiations to resolve the future of the church in France.

THE FRENCH CONCORDAT

A Concordat was signed in July 1801 and both Napoleon and the Vatican had reason to be happy with it. Napoleon disposed of the bloody conflict between the Civil and Roman wings of the church almost at the stroke of a pen. He also gained, at least for a short term, the gratitude and support of the Vatican. The entire hierarchies of both wings were dissolved on November 29 1801, sixty new bishops were nominated, the link between the church and the state was eliminated, the pope became the spiritual head of the church again and the Roman Curia was able to exert more control over the church in France than ever before.⁴⁹ For its part, Rome relinquished any claim to nationalized properties and accepted some civil duties for the clergy and the state salaries which went with them.⁵⁰ It also used the French Concordat as a basis on which to resolve some of its disputes in Germany.

For the British government, still at war with the French Republic, the Concordat was a real embarrassment. It raised still further the morale and demands of its one percent of Catholics and transformed the 190 emigre bishops and 5,000 emigre priests, whom it was still harbouring and subsidizing in the hope of using their influence against the revolution, from a political asset into a political liability. It provoked so much sympathy for them that William Pitt drew up a bill to grant them full emancipation at the same time that the Irish Parliament was abolished and Ireland and Britain were unified – by liberal use of bribery, corruption and the appointment of 32 life peers – but George III refused to sign it. It would have been contrary to his coronation oath. Or at least that is what he said.^{51 52} However the trigger had been tripped and within the lifetime of Catholic youth of the day their emancipation was complete – in law if not in practice.

For the moment the moves towards Catholic emancipation and continued financial support for the émigrés stifled their opposition to the British capture of Napoleon's Cairo Colony in June, just three months after Britain, France, Spain and Holland had signed a peace treaty at Amiens and while Napoleon and Pius VII were putting the finishing touches to their Concordat. Pitt was able to use the issue as a smoke screen for his resignation to make way for a new face in further territorial negotiations and to improve the chances for an urgently needed treaty to put trade with the New World on a proper basis.⁵³ The Church of England was finding that religious purity, or self righteousness, could be sacrificed for trade and territory and it used its influence in parliament with studied hypocrisy, especially in the Lords. Britain's governments and its church seemed intent on illustrating another fact about the misuse of religion (quite apart from the imposition of religious conformity in a bid to achieve political stability) which governments have never understood: that the deliberate use of religion for national gain at the expense of another country or to destabilize another country inevitably backfires. The colonial era would provide many more examples before they all helped to bring the trouble in the triangle to its twentieth century peak.

England had taken full advantage of the French Revolution to play chess with Europe's colonial interests and to try to bring the young United States of America to heel through the expansion of its navy. Now it had agreed to hold only Ceylon and Trinidad, and to restore the Cape of Good Hope to Holland, Malta to the Catholic Order of St. John and Egypt to Turkey. If in doing so it had to recognize a continuing territorial role for the Catholic Church as an unfortunate temporary expediency, and if in extending its dealings with Turkey, (set in train by their collaboration to keep France out of Palestine), it had to recognize Islam that didn't matter much either. It was only following France and that matter could also be put right later.

If anyone doubted it at the time it ought to have soon become clear that the Peace of Amiens was a classic exercise in double-crossing with each party intent on gaining breathing space to press its territorial claims from a stronger position in its own good time. France was determined to recover Egypt. It bought Louisiana from Spain, declined to vacate Holland, (to which Britain was supposed to return the Cape), and invaded Switzerland to impose a new constitution. And Napoleon secured his own election as president of the Italian Republic which had been moulded out of the papal states. Britain on the other hand had no intention of returning Malta, or Egypt, or the Cape. It needed both Egypt and the Cape to secure its interests in India and the East against French, Russian or even German competition.

Soon Europe was tearing itself apart again. The basic issue was who would control the territories, trade routes and resources of the non-European world. There was no question that the rest of the world might want to control itself, that it didn't want to be absorbed by Europe and its alien cultures or that it might be happy to trade with everyone who happened by. The world was for Europe and the Christian church, of course. But as issues, alliances, borders and forms of government continued to change over the next two generations other things were changing too. The temporal authority of the Church, which had begun to weaken with the Reformation, was destroyed completely, with a few important exceptions. Russia, where it continued as an integral although subordinate part of the state machinery, was one. Ethiopia, where it retained a peculiar and mystical relationship with the monarchy as well as a shamefully high proportion of the country's productive land, equally shamefully managed, was another.

The church overall had gradually been transformed, very largely against its will, from the perpetual partner in a long-running series of autocratic, dogmatic and repressive partnerships in government into the guardian of national and personal ethics and morals. It had become basically the purveyor of religion and the institutionalized but highly fragmented bulwark against attacks on national morale, traditions and stability. It ought to have been guiding mankind towards Salvation through an understanding of God but it had lost the will and the capacity. In any case it still could not do that effectively because it hadn't tackled those long-standing questions of its doctrine and its self-understanding.

EMANCIPATION FOR JEWS ...

While the church was being forced through its change of life the Jewish community was slowly and painfully gaining its emancipation in Europe, and Islam was being drawn slowly into the mainstream of European interests. The triangle was being reshaped and the safety valve of Judaism was being primed ready for the twentieth century. Napoleon was not simply the most ambitious of French nationalists. He was one of the chief engineers of change towards the new relationships, but he was by no means the initiator.

Napoleon trained at the French Military Academy at Brienne and he was described as a romantic, melancholy, self-willed "alien patriot" student.⁵⁴ While he was in training, Joseph II in Austria, acting under the indirect influence of Moses Mendelssohn, had decreed that Jewish legal disabilities were to be removed gradually and that they should be encouraged to mix in the life of the general population.⁵⁵ Then, six years later, while Napoleon was getting experience of poverty and ghetto life as a young artillery officer suppressing food riots in the Rhone Valley, Joseph ordered that all Jews were to adopt recognizable surnames instead of their Biblical patronymic as an aid towards integration which he hoped would end prejudice against them.⁵⁶

Other rulers began to follow Joseph's example but the rush only began with the Bill of Rights of the French Revolution. In Holland Jews were granted full citizenship under pressure from the French envoy in 1796 and only the next year Jews took their seats in a national legislature for the first time ever in Christendom. When Napoleon's army entered Venice on July 10 1797 the gates of the ghetto were removed and burned with great celebrations. In Rome the Jews had to wait until General Berthier occupied the city in February the next year while Napoleon was in Egypt. Wherever the French armies moved after that, or wherever Napoleon signed a treaty and imposed the Code Napoleon from 1804 onwards, the story was much the same, including Germany, Prussia and Austria (where Joseph's successors had reversed some of his reforms), but not in Spain.

While Napoleon was passing through Strassburg on his return from the Austerlitz campaign he was assailed with complaints against Jews by Christians and had one of his brilliant inspirations. He summoned a representative assembly of Jews to settle their status in European society once and for all and to revive "that civic morality lost during the long centuries of a degrading existence."⁵⁷ It met in Paris in July 1806 and, having satisfied Napoleon of Jewish sincerity, prepared for the establishment of a Sanhedrin in February 1807.

The Sanhedrin of 1807 was the first in almost 1,500 years. It was modeled on those of pre-Christian Palestine, and it was very short-lived. It was disbanded as soon as it completed its immediate task. Its purpose became clear to everyone as special services to commemorate the occasion were held in synagogues throughout Europe and America. Napoleon was the hero of the Jewish communities.⁵⁸ He had pulled off a coup of immense significance. He was the first European leader to manipulate Jewish community support either in his favour for domestic political ends or to deliberately undermine the government of another country. He was certainly not to be the last. Britain and the United States of America followed his example a few generations later.⁵⁹

However, the Sanhedrin grasped the opportunity Napoleon had offered. A Jew was a Jew by virtue of his religious faith, it declared. A Jew was not a member of a Jewish nation or race and regarded the country of his or her birth as the Fatherland to be defended as a duty. For the first time there was an authoritative statement to repudiate the dogma of the church and to expose the ghettos for what they were: an effort by the church, bigoted and unable to face the truth, to eliminate a contrary theological view by suppressing those who adhered to it. But, alas, the solution called for more than a simple declaration.

During the previous few generations the Jews within their ghettos had developed much more sophisticated systems of public discipline, courts, judges and taxation for community welfare services than Christians enjoyed outside. This combined with their church-enforced isolation to make the larger ghettos almost self-contained states within a state. The residents therefore were jealous of the security and liberty which this gave them inside the gate. The church was therefore quick to point to the numerous fifth columns dotted around the countryside, especially in countries other than France, after Napoleon's Sanhedrin had met. After all it could speak as an expert in such matters. It was very familiar indeed with the effectiveness of such a role from its own recent activities. So the Jewish community was still caught in the bind into which it had been thrown from the moment that Christianity took on political affiliations and began to harass it. Its members found very quickly that the Sanhedrin's grand statement about support for the Fatherland was not going to be easy to adhere to. They would repeatedly find conflict between personal interest and national interest. Basically their problem was little different to that of devout Christians living in the subordinate countries of the Holy Roman Empire, or more especially that of papists living anywhere as the empire declined and the popes engaged in war after war with the princes and powers of Europe. But of course it is always members of a minority and not of the majority who are characterized as having problems, idiosyncrasies or "hang-ups." On top of that the problem for Jews was made more acute by the systematic harassment organized by the church and Christian authorities. It would become very much more acute within a few generations.

... AND A CRISIS OF IDENTITY

In the circumstances it was natural that the Jewish community would divide over the issues of ghettos, freedom, emancipation and integration. Some feared a backlash from the Christian majority, some believed that integration would destroy their faith, some were reluctant to leave the security which they enjoyed inside the ghetto and others had accepted the separate race concept for so long that they simply could not accept the Sanhedrin's declaration. They had become convinced that it was their lot to suffer at the hands of Christians until the Messiah came. Now added to all those concerns was the knowledge that, although he offered freedom, Napoleon had forced them into the very position which they denied: a conflict of interest.

On the other hand there were the progressive and, generally, the more educated Jews who had a vision of freedom and equality, who were prepared to face a few more risks and who couldn't break down the gates quickly enough. In Holland a Jewish battalion had already been established to support Napoleon, in 1805, but in his abortive march on Moscow in 1812 large numbers of Russian Jews supported the monarchy against him. Some did so simply from that fear for their orthodox faith but others did so from their determination to show that the Sanhedrin was right after all and that Jews did support their Fatherland above personal interests. Similarly, in the provinces of old Poland the following year, while many Polish Jews rebelled and joined Napoleon, others supported the Prussian army even though he had dangled the carrot of renewed independence for Poland.^{60 61}

The old order had tumbled as Napoleon swept across Europe. He had shackled the church, unshackled the Jews, and introduced a breath of democracy. But it was too good to last. When the alliance against Napoleon was able to regroup and pursue him back to France he was eventually defeated at La Rothiere in February, 1814. However, with many supporters and a divided coalition against him he clung to office until March 31 when the coalition powers entered Paris and forced a provisional government of Talleyrand to remove him from office. Forced to abdicate on April 6, he was granted the island of Elba as a principality with a guard of honour of 800 troops. With Napoleon in exile the Peace of Paris was signed in May and then the other powers set about returning the map of Europe to its pre-Napoleonic form with Emperor Francis playing glorious host to monarchs and pretenders at the Congress of Vienna. They gleefully reversed many of Napoleon's reforms but there was tension between them as they bickered about territorial claims – until they learned he had jumped exile, returned to France, landed at Cannes in March, 1815, and was reassembling the core of the French Army around him. A touch of panic swept the congress and Louis XVIII fled when Napoleon entered Paris, but such an alliance was quickly mounted against him that the former emperor must have been a super-optimist to believe that he could re-establish his authority. After a preliminary victory in Belgium he had to face the combined British and Prussian armies and suffered a massive defeat at Waterloo in June, 1815. When the coalition powers entered Paris for the second time his supporters deserted him. He sought British protection but was arrested and deported to the island of St. Helena. His second exile permanent.

AFTER WATERLOO

Napoleon's ship was hardly out of sight before the Congress of Vienna joyfully resumed for a final session. France was allowed to retain the territories it held in 1792, but (at the second Peace of Paris, in November, 1815), it was required to pay a war indemnity of 700 million francs; 17 fortresses were occupied by foreign troops for a period of five years; and it was stripped of three territories: Saarbrücken went to Prussia, Landau to Bavaria, and Savoy to Sardinia. There were some benefits for Prussia, the Scandinavian countries and a new United Netherlands kingdom. Austria forfeited some territories in return for others and gained political primacy over a restored Italy. Russia was granted sovereignty over a self-constituted Congress Poland, making it potentially the most powerful country in Europe. Germany was reorganized into a confederation of states, and the neutrality of Switzerland was guaranteed. But Britain was the main territorial beneficiary of the settlement. Having facilitated Napoleon's defeat it received Malta, Ceylon, Cape Colony and the strategically important island of Heligoland, facing the estuary of the River Elbe, for its trouble. Or was it? The papal states were re-established. The ghetto gates began to reappear immediately.

In Russia Alexander I had caught the fever of Napoleon's liberalism when he assumed the throne in 1801. He opened the Pale of settlement, abolished torture, granted an amnesty to political prisoners, permitted the release of serfs, and even permitted Jews to attend schools and universities in Moscow and to choose their own occupation. But as his territorial interests shifted, Alexander swung from alliances with Napoleon to alliances against him and the conflict of interest which Napoleon had forced on the Jews in 1812 by his march on Moscow cost them dearly. Alexander turned more reactionary than most of his colleagues at the congress. He withdrew all civil privileges for Jews, herded them back into the Pale, made it smaller, dissolved their communal governments, impressed or kidnapped huge numbers of Jewish youths between 12 and 18 years of age into the army for a tyrannical 25 years, applied intense coercion for them to change to Christianity, and clamped a police-state straight jacket over the whole of Russia.

A RETURN TO CHURCH-STATE TIES ...

Right across Europe extremists within the churches raved and ranted that they had been right about Jewish disloyalty all the time and "reprisals" became more vicious. Many Jews began to wish they had never heard of Napoleon. But their trauma was only part of the evolution of the triangle. Before they were much older they would experience another round of revolutions as most of Europe, especially France, Italy, Germany and Greece, was swept into a new era. Emancipation, in law anyway, would follow like a wave rolling across Europe even before many of the children who had cheered Napoleon's victories prayed "next year in Jerusalem" for the last time.

The Vatican, which never took defeat easily because of its unshaken self-assessment, turned ever more reactionary when it got its papal states back and with them a small dose of the temporal sovereignty which the papacy had longed for world wide. In Rome, Venice, Mainz and Frankfurt the Jewish communities were forced back into the same ghettos with an extra touch of the whip to remind them of their proper place in Christian society.⁶² But the Vatican also turned against the rationalist mainstream of European thought to which it had appeared to be responding during the previous two or three generations and Pius VII caused affront to even Europe's monarchs by reaffirming the Bull of excommunication against Freemasons.⁶³ It even turned sharply back towards mystery, miracles, dogma, repression of heretical opinion and rejection of the world. Within a few years it was striking miraculous medals and honoring apparitions.⁶⁴

Many of Europe's rulers, especially those in smaller states, became convinced that their power depended on the support of a powerful and militant church and Rome was ready to oblige. The Inquisition was reintroduced, the Jesuit Order was re-established, monasteries were reopened where possible and reconstruction and enlargement of the Vatican was stepped up.^{65 66} It was as if the church believed it could turn the clock back forty years but it was flying in the face of reality.

Peter and Catherine in Russia and Joseph in Austria had said quite clearly that if the church wanted to have a hand in running the state it had to put its resources at the disposal of the state and become an integral part of it. The divine right of kings and the assorted relationships between kings and the church which went with it had been shown to be so much hocus pocus by the Declaration of American Independence. The French Revolution had gone a stage further and said there is no place at all for a direct link between the state and the church. In fact, through Robespierre's cult of reason and the temporary abolition of institutional Christianity, the Revolution had issued another of those challenges to the church, its doctrines and its view of itself. Then Napoleon had neatly reshaped the triangle.

... WITHOUT A HOLY ROMAN EMPEROR

Although the purveyors and perversers of Christianity still clung to all the political and economic clout and their self-righteous view of themselves, Islam was recognized, Judaism had gained a new status and Jews were well on the way to emancipation. But, finally, the Holy Roman Empire, having shrunk progressively, was declared dead. Francis had been awarded the title emperor when he succeeded his father, Leopold. As the only person prepared to reverse some of the anti-papal reforms his uncle Joseph had introduced he was probably the only contender and he was well aware that the church had long ceased to be a unifying force. It was in fact the most divisive influence in the Old World, and considering that not even he recognized the pope as the administrative head of the Austrian church it must have been a severe embarrassment and a serious impediment in his ever changing relations with France, Britain, Prussia, Russia and Protestant Holland, (to which he still laid claim), to be regarded as the ultimate defender of the pope.

Francis had taken the title Emperor of Austria in 1804 but he continued to use the Roman title as well. However he didn't need it for long. After the debacle at Austerlitz and Napoleon's victories against Prussia, the Duchy of Warsaw was established as a French protectorate out of much of former Poland, and Napoleon took the title Protector of a Confederation of the Rhine which took in most of the German states of the Holy Roman Empire. The concept was now totally irrelevant. Francis abandoned the title and the Holy Roman Empire was dissolved.

It was official. The church was on its own. It had to chart a new course and paddle its own canoe. It was just like the fall of the Roman Empire all over again. The opportunities were unprecedented because greed was sweeping the people of Europe, and the church, right around the world, and there were plenty of beacons by which to chart a new course, if only the church could see them. They were the series of philosophical and scientific mini-challenges which were strung out along the course to make up the big penultimate challenge to its doctrines and its self-assessment which had begun with Copernicus and Galileo. It was right in the middle of them and they would run on for a couple of generations yet. It had just passed Thomas Jefferson and his Declaration, then Robespierre and his cult of reason, and then Napoleon and his Sanhedrin. But it hadn't recognized any of them. The Roman fragment was too busy plugging up leaks and trying to take advantage of the fact that Russia, drawn into the fringe of European affairs by the partition of Poland, was now ready to pluck. The Napoleonic Wars had drawn it right into the mainstream of European affairs. The barrier between Western Europe and Russia which the church had built a long time before had been trampled twice: by Napoleon's army on its march to Moscow in September 1812, and by the Russian army as it followed him home, relieving Prussia in March 1813 and joining the allied occupation of Paris just a year later.

The Vatican was poised once more to make a takeover bid for the Orthodox Church. For their part the Reformed fragments were intent on consolidating gains they had won the hard way and in shaping a few new irons in the fire. Their confidence had been badly shaken by the French Revolution but they were still smug in their belief that they had done all the reforming that was necessary. They were forming new alliances in their own way just as eagerly as Rome in an effort to prop up their particular environments. And cooperation was, with few exceptions, only a word.

Everyone was paddling his own canoe.

CHAPTER 14

LET'S TRY ANOTHER REVOLUTION!

When the other great powers placed Louis XVIII back on the throne of France in July 1814 it was as if a key era of forty tumultuous years had just been snuffed out. The pope and the crowned heads of Europe tried to turn the clock back by means of the Congress of Vienna in a bid to recover positions of power and privilege which they had consistently misused until Napoleon cut his swathe across Europe and back again. But they were flying in the face of reality and it soon became fashionable to say that the world would never be the same again after the French Revolution. Certainly chain reactions of great social, economic and political importance had been triggered, but to say that the world would never be the same again implies that it had been in a steady state before, and that simply was not the case

Mankind's social and communal evolution could not be stopped for the sake of the privileges of a few. The Congress of Vienna simply bottled up the growing tensions in Europe to have them break out a few years later and complicate the effects of reactions to Napoleon's reign in other parts of the world. Humanity, evolving at the will of the Creator, was moving relentlessly into the era of population expansion coupled with social, communal and cultural evolution as opposed to biological evolution. Humans had adapted to a wide range of environments and had gradually learned to master their vagaries and to use the obvious resources placed at their disposal. Steadily increasing population pressure made it necessary for them to master still more situations, techniques and resources. They had to do so in order that they would not go hungry and so that they could live a comfortable and satisfying life. Without freedom from hunger for the whole community they could not live happily and at peace with their fellows. Without peace, salvation is no more than a weapon in the psychological armoury of the church.

From the beginning of the agricultural revolution about 10,000 years earlier, the world population had probably multiplied from a base of between five and ten million by only, say, a factor of three or four up to the time when Abraham went for his memorable stroll around the fertile crescent.¹ It was probably between 100 and 200 million at the time of Christ and about 400 million when Isabella waved goodbye to Columbus.² Then the rate of growth began to accelerate. In the sixty years before Napoleon's defeat at Waterloo the world population had increased by 15 or 20 percent, (about 150 million), so that when Emperor Francis II welcomed his clutch of crowned heads to a banquet in Vienna there were between 900 million and 1,000 million other mouths to feed around the world. Of course he wasn't to know that within little more than a generation the world population would have risen by about another one third and that most of the people whose kings he was entertaining would be living under new forms of government, travelling by new means of transport, communicating instantly through newfangled mechanical devices, and working in completely new industries.³ He wasn't to know that the peoples of the world were being drawn together into a global village.

The ascent of humanity towards whatever may be the Creator's purpose was accelerating as it entered that vibrant new phase. Mankind had been given, firstly, some guidelines for communal living (through Abraham and his successors, the Hindu Sages, Zoroaster, Confucius, Gautama the Buddha, the Greek philosophers and others) and, secondly, an insight into the nature of God to guide mankind during the ascent, through Moses, the Prophets, the Messiah and his message. Unfortunately that message had been misunderstood and hideously confused. Muhammad responded to the challenge to try to untangle the mess, with limited success, but because of its deeply entrenched self-misunderstanding and the doctrines and dogmas with which it had cluttered itself, the church believed that humanity had reached the ultimate stage of development, with the church itself at the pinnacle in all respects. However, whatever the church hierarchy and a few people in other high places might have thought and might have wished, humanity was on the ascent and the process could neither be stopped nor reversed. The trouble was that it faced a rugged mountain range strewn with doctrinal stumbling blocks instead of lights along the ridges.

The biggest of those stumbling blocks was the church's self-understanding and its wont to control and direct every aspect of human life: how and what one thought, how one conducted one's relations with other people, how one was governed and how one did business. So, with Napoleon out of the way for the second time and with the basic territorial questions settled to their satisfaction the church and the great powers – or some of them anyway – sat down to confer again. They talked through two concepts: the Holy Alliance and the Concert of Europe.

ANOTHER HOLY ALLIANCE

In September 1815, apparently prompted by a confidant or 'spiritual director' to Russian Tsar Alexander I, Baroness von Krudener,⁴ the rulers of three of the great powers linked to the three great [competing] Christian traditions met to formulate an 'alliance of throne and altar' which was supposed to provide the first supranational organization in history to preserve peace in modern history. The first ... if one discounts the Catholic Church which saw itself in the same light. The three were the emperors of Greek Orthodox Russia, Roman Catholic Austria and Protestant Prussia. They invited all other heads of states in Europe, except the Pope and the Sultan, to subscribe to the alliance and to bind themselves to govern at home in a Christian Patriarchal spirit 'in accordance with Holy Writ' and to practice solidarity in foreign affairs. They based their right of intervention against all liberal and national movements on their responsibility to God, governing by Divine Right.⁵ All of those invited signed the Holy Alliance, except the British king whose parliament refused to acknowledge any right of intervention, and Russia's Alexander signed for Poland because he had just annexed most of it under the powers granted by his peers at the Congress of Vienna. Britain continued to intervene in other nations' affairs itself, just like all the others, but it rejected the right for the others to do the same. Nothing had changed. Certainly not the position of the pope.

The pope could not be invited to sign because many of the powers disputed his claims to temporal authority and although they wanted his blessing, and the domestic political support which that implied, they did not want him sitting around the same table making political decisions. In any case he would not accept an invitation because to do so would be to acknowledge the legitimacy and equality of the two other streams of the church – Orthodoxy and Protestantism – with which he would have to share the table. The sultan could not be invited, even though his authority extended throughout the Balkans, because an important aim of the Holy Alliance was to restrict his authority and to eliminate the faith which he represented. And he would not accept an invitation because to do so would be to acknowledge the doctrine of the Trinity which was the root cause of the establishment of Islam, and the divine right of the Christian kings whose theology and self-understanding he rejected.

The statement of alliance actually began with the words: "In the name of the Most Holy and Indivisible Trinity ..." It did not begin with the more usual form of words: "In the name of God ..." It bound each of the signatories to regard themselves in their dealings with their subjects and their armies as "fathers of families." "Consider each other as fellow-countrymen" they were to sustain each other, protect true religion, and urge their subjects to strengthen and exercise themselves in Christian duties, recognizing Christ as the real king of all Christian peoples and their monarchs as 'his mayors of the palace.'⁶

The Holy Alliance was 361 years behind the papal bull Rominus Pontifex but coming just when the European powers were about to embark on a second wave of colonial enterprise, when the world was just entering its phase of remarkable population growth, and when Europe was in desperate need of social enlightenment it reinforced the attitudes which had swept the world with such disastrous consequences in the first wave of colonial enterprise. It was a formula for perpetuating and aggravating international and communal division, not for resolving those divisions. The big difference between Rominus Pontifex and the Holy Alliance was that in the latter, all three streams of the church were involved, together, instead of only the Roman Catholic stream. However the alliance was really only a 'gentlemen's agreement' and not a binding document. That, the Concert of Europe, came a little later and it was a 'restricted membership power-sharing club.'

THE CONCERT OF EUROPE

The Concert of Europe, a brainchild of Prince Metternich, in effect Austria's foreign minister, took effect as a four-power club on November 20, 1815, when it was signed by Austria, Prussia, Russia and Britain, but it was modified progressively in 1818 and 1820. Its purpose was to make the decisions of the Congress of Vienna, its boundaries and power relationships, binding for all time. It was totally ill-conceived. In effect, those who already enjoyed power were to retain it. Those who did not have it were never to achieve it, and liberal movements, power sharing and revolutionary social change were to be suppressed at any cost, with the four club members empowered to intervene anywhere in Europe where the status quo and the concept of divine-right-monarchy was threatened. France was to be excluded from the club because of its dangerous liaison with republicanism. The British government was uncomfortable with the idea of intervention, but its foreign minister carried the day. By 1818 the club of four had realized that if France was to be 'saved' for monarchy it had to be admitted as a member. It joined. There was a club of five. But when Spain had difficulty suppressing its republican revolt in the New World and Austria wanted to invoke the rules of the club and the spirit of the Holy Alliance to prop it up, Britain reneged. It withdrew from the Concert of Europe in 1820. The club was back to four. It invoked its authority in 1823 and authorized France to crush a republican insurrection in Spain while Austria followed suit in Naples, and sporadic oppressive interventions dotted the map of Europe for the next twenty five years until a right royal round of revolutions erupted.

In the meantime the ordinary people of Europe, having caught the first faint scent of representative government, were pressing against the cell doors, impatient for the relief of a full deep breath. However, although a whole series of political changes which had been initiated during those forty years were all dynamic, the most important change was the temporary ending of the church's formal temporal power, coupled with the reshaping of the relationships between the partners in the triangle. That change could have been accepted with good grace so that the relationship could have been moulded into a thing of beauty. Instead it was denied and resisted with such vigour and bitterness on the part of the church and its adherents that the senior partners, the Jews of Europe, would be crying out for release within two or three generations. The call "Let's find a new home" would echo from the Atlantic to the Urals.

The despised junior partners, the Muslims of Africa and Asia, had nowhere to go. They simply didn't have the capacity to prevent the European invasion and exploitation of their homelands and the church rode in on the gun carriages. At the same time the church continued to fragment for three or four generations and the struggle for reunification could only take on meaning as progressive radicals, rethinking the identity and purpose of the church, were able to remain and have some influence, on its fringes at first, instead of being rejected outright and facing dire personal consequences.

Although the Inquisition would eventually be laid to rest, each of the major fragments of the church, as well as the other two partners, would develop characteristic social and economic attitudes as a consequence of their particular theology and in response to changing political circumstances. In turn these would further influence political and racial alignments right around the world. Issues requiring personal, corporate and national decisions based on ethical and moral values would soon begin to crowd in and give each partner in the triangle and each fragment of the church the opportunity to demonstrate the superiority of its particular ethic, if that was what it wanted to do. In any case they would be a severe test for the credibility of each group and each partner would find itself under intense scrutiny. But that is jumping ahead, too.

As the British frigate Northumberland carried Napoleon into exile on St. Helena the clergy of the fragmented church on both sides of the English Channel were fearful of the future. They were finding it very difficult to adjust and to chart their new course as members of just one of many guides to moral and ethical conduct for the communities in which they existed. The thought of being a mere pointer towards salvation rather than the acknowledged purveyor of salvation or the sole route to salvation, was repugnant to the church-at-large which still claimed the right to shape the pattern and conduct of society.

WHAT ROLE FOR THE CHURCH?

Very few clergy had grasped the significance of what was happening around them. They failed to see that in breaking the formal links between a monolithic church and various countries each in competition but all under the umbrella of the Holy Roman Empire, and by dismantling the pope's temporal responsibility Napoleon had in fact freed the whole church to show what the Messianic message was really all about. In Italy the pope set about trying to consolidate what little temporal authority was left to him and acted like a greedy schoolboy grabbing at other boys' marbles. However in other countries it was the turn of the nobility and privileged merchant and industrial interests to woo the church. They didn't want to give it back any constitutional power but they needed its support as a bulwark against revolution. The clergy's shaken self-image, uncertainty and fear made them very ready to cooperate.

The agricultural revolution had reached the British Isles last after slowly filtering across Europe from Western Asia but the Industrial Revolution had started in England just as the American War of Independence was brewing and it had not yet had any impact in continental Europe.⁷ Because of the rapid industrialization and urbanization of Britain as it took full advantage of imports from its colonies it began to face social and communal tensions of a kind which Europe was not experiencing, even though there was a definite lift in the material well-being of the vast majority of the British people.

Insufficient thought was given to the problems of hygiene and the personal needs of people suddenly crammed into sardine-tin towns as factory fodder after living in an open and much less restricted environment, even if they were being "relieved" of a squalid and underpaid existence in rural areas. It followed that when the French Revolution had erupted Britain was at first jubilant at the thought of commercial and territorial advantage which might come as France began to tear itself apart. In particular Britain could expect to recover a lot of American trade which was going to France. There was also a smug sense of superiority at the thought that France was following where Protestant Britain had led the way in constitutional government and internal church reform.

But when the French National Assembly confiscated and secularized all of the church's property and closed all non-charitable orders and monasteries it sent cold shivers down the spines of the church and the establishment. They began to realize that Britain was also ripe for revolution, especially when the trickle of emigre Catholic bishops, priests and nobles rose to a flood. The stimulus to the Puritan revival was immediate and there was the ludicrous picture of British Government manipulation of the French emigre clergy for political purposes, moves towards Catholic emancipation and, concurrently, a sharp anti-Catholic reaction within the English church which forced George III to oppose emancipation.

SUPPORT FOR THE ARISTOCRACY!

Sensing trouble ahead the British aristocracy and the growing merchant and industrialist class turned towards the Church of England for mutual support. Schools financed by the wealthy but conducted by the church began to spring up everywhere. Education, heavily laced with creeds, catechisms and Christian conduct, was seen as a way to avoid another revolution but of course it had to be under the control of staff faithful to conservatism in all matters. There could be no boat-rocking. The powers of the day promoted the story that the church, as the guardian of morality, was the proper body to provide for education and the church was delighted to go along with it. The aristocracy got what they wanted and the church consolidated its role in the community and got the credit. It logically followed that there was no room for secular or state-run schools which might not adhere to the Christian ethic and, of course, a test of Christian orthodoxy of the English variety was still applied for admission to universities.

In a strange way Britain reverted part way towards the pre Christian philosophy of a national religion. A belief pervaded the countryside that in some way God was smiling especially kindly on Britain, like a customs collector handing out "favoured nation" status. It may have been self-consciousness but it was certainly fostered by circumstances and the dominant conservative attitudes of the time. Rule Britannia! The Book of Common Prayer and its liturgy were cloaked in the aura of something like a cross between an act of parliament and the Bible. The established church was accorded the unwritten status of an arm of the crown and nonconformists, or dissenters, were definitely second class citizens, not much to be preferred to Catholics although infinitely preferable to Jews.

The idea that one was saved through one's personal conduct, which of course included a thoroughly good, conscientious and devoted day's work for one's employer, began to compete with the idea of justification through faith alone which had been the cornerstone of Protestantism from the days of the break with indulgences, penance and priestly absolution. Personal conversion, personal commitment and belief in the value of the individual person began to gather new meaning. That was indeed a real contribution to Christian attitudes and it ought to have led to a breaking down of elitist and racist attitudes. Unfortunately it tended to have the reverse effect and the accumulation of personal wealth as the end point of diligence took on a religious and ethical value. The age of the Protestant work ethic had arrived.

Unfortunately it had come not as a spontaneous response to Christ's teaching in a deeply committed Christian society but as a carefully orchestrated response to economic and political pressures. It bears a definite similarity to the development of the church's social and economic attitudes at the time of the great plagues, and to its anti-usury attitudes at the time of the Crusades. While it cannot properly be described as the base on which capitalism was built, it has certainly been a prop for capitalism in later years. It became a hallmark of English-speaking Protestantism and affected other branches of European Protestantism to varying degrees. It helped to link the church-at-large to the abuses which have resulted from the unrestrained expansion of Western capitalist enterprises in the Third World. It held the church on its long-standing course of confrontation with economic and social reformers, giving anti communist campaigners plenty of grounds on which to implicate the whole church in their campaigns. And it had played into the hands of Fascist movements, first in Italy and more recently in Latin America.

THE IMPACT OF THE PROTESTANT WORK ETHIC

When the Protestant work ethic began to take hold in Britain Evangelicalism took some strange twists as business leaders and politicians threw their weight behind revivalist campaigns at home, the expansion of a series of foreign missionary societies which had been set up in the critical years between 1792 and the restoration of the old order in Europe, (1814), and the establishment of new ones. The rollicking hymn soon proved to be an effective morale booster, a distraction from the depressing circumstances of industrial life and a relief from the personal distress which often went with it.

“Go, labour on while it is day: The world’s dark night is hastening on; Speed, speed thy work; cast sloth away; It is not thus that souls are won,”⁸

Words like these and the more popular “work, for the night is coming”⁹ were music in the employer’s ear as well as to the crusaders. The concept of self-judgement through one’s conscience, or guilt complexes, which is implicit in the Protestant work ethic also proved very helpful, along with a little fear of the unknown, in the slave fields and later among indentured labourers in countries such as Australia. Attendance at church on Sunday, a matter of only gentle persuasion, coupled with the foreman’s injunction to remember that “the good Lord is watching you from up there”, was often sufficient to suppress dissent against the system, to keep law and order, and to ensure a long hard day’s slog at Queensland’s sugar cane by Kanaka “recruits” from South Sea Islands. Quite often the recruits had even been coerced from mission fields by agents masquerading as missionaries.¹⁰

As the century wore on the churches in Australia mounted a strong campaign against “Blackbirding” but by then lasting damage had been done. Most Australians were insensitive to the fact that in just one lifetime they had succeeded in exterminating almost an entire Aboriginal people whose capacities and cultures they were incapable of appreciating. They developed very deep-seated racist attitudes because of the loss of jobs to exploited labour. Many churches built during that period are furnished with pews and other items which carry stamps such as “Guaranteed build entirely by European labour. No coloured labour.” Pressure developed for a White Australia Policy with repatriation of the Kanakas as if it was all their fault and with notorious racially biased immigration controls. It became a basic facet of Australian political and social life from federation in 1901 until after World War II when Australians found themselves embroiled in the crossfire of big power politics. There was a need to trade with Japan, South East Asia and Africa to offset falling trade opportunities with Britain and Europe. But that is jumping ahead a bit again.

Back in Britain and Europe a whole host of ethical issues were coming to a head under the impact of the French Revolution and Napoleon. Sugar and the other major New World crops, cotton and tobacco, were right in the thick of them. They were labour intensive crops around which the slave trade had developed and Britain, through its front run into the Industrial Revolution, had a strangle hold over their processing and marketing in Europe. In the run-up to the American War of Independence there had been strong pressure from the colonies for an end to the largely British-controlled slave trade. This had come largely from Protestant Puritan settlers on moral grounds but there had also been quite a bit of the Australian brand of economic self-interest fear of unemployment among unskilled settlers who would be displaced by the use of cheap labour. Maybe someone had taken lessons in a bit of early Roman history as well. But Britain insisted that the trade continue. Profits for its investors came before love for humanity.

However love and understanding between people of different racial and cultural backgrounds are vital to the question of peace and salvation. This is one of the issues which has bedeviled the people of Judaism throughout the Diaspora. It has rarely been an issue for Muslims who have understood how basic the relationship is from revelation through Muhammad and it ought not to have been an issue for Christians with both the Gospel and the Acts of the Apostles to guide them. Unfortunately, as we have already seen, it has been at the centre of many issues for the Christian community ever since conflicts within the imperial church were institutionalized and wrapped up in creeds and doctrines at Nicaea. The second slave trade era brought it to a head, it had then become enmeshed in the power struggles of the Napoleonic Wars and it was about to shape the course of American history through the Civil War. In fact it did much more than that and the philosophy and motives which made it possible have still to be flushed out of our system. We pick up the threads again at the end of the American War of Independence.

SUGAR, SLAVES AND SALVATION

The import of slaves from Africa, often via the Caribbean and South America, had not been blocked and was actually on the increase. A few people still spoke out against it but the capacity of Britain's cotton industry had increased ten fold between 1760 and 1785. Then as most of Europe's armies were at war with Napoleon at some time or other the demand for uniforms and other cotton goods rose at the rate of about 8.5 per cent per year.¹¹ The only way the young United States could meet that sort of market was by increased use of slave labour. At least that is what the growers claimed. Eminent economists have disputed it, and it is painfully obvious that the profitability of the slave trade for European traders, (up to 60,000 pounds Sterling net from one expedition¹²), and the long-standing attitude that Africans should quite properly labour for Europeans both had a great deal to do with the policy.

At the same time, being freed of the restrictions of British colonial policy, the southern states planted sugar at a great rate. They began to compete seriously with British-owned plantations in the Caribbean which had been the basis of a series of fortunes which were well represented in the House of Commons as well as the Lords. A Lord Mayor of London, William Beckford, having grabbed 22,000 acres of Jamaica's sugar country alongside 26,000 acres held by relatives and members of his family, built the most splendid country seat in the west of England, entertained the nobility en masse in quite fabulous fashion during his term of office and left a fortune which his son William is said to have squandered on Fonthill Abbey, "one of the most foolish follies of all time."¹³ Such people didn't like market competition coming on top of their other troubles which had been building up for some time.

Slaves formed a high proportion of the population in all of the Caribbean islands, outnumbering the white planters, merchants, clergy and runaways by a big margin, but they had little except their honour with which to defend themselves. However there were always a few gun runners ready to provide them with weapons. The first of the big slave uprisings which had become inevitable left the entire white population of the Danish island of St. John slaughtered in 1753 except for one doctor who was selected to tend the Negro wounded. French troops from Martinique returned the compliment and slaughtered the rebels, leaving the island a nonproductive wilderness until tourism interests found it in the twentieth century.¹⁴ While France slipped and slithered towards its Revolution its Caribbean colonies, enhanced at the expense of Britain and Spain in the two Paris peace treaties, traded freely with both the USA and Europe and exported more and better quality sugar than the British colonies.

Every community of planters knew it was sitting on a powder keg with tension in the air and pistols in the bedroom, but Britain's Jamaica, with 211,000 slaves, was regarded as a more likely target for rebellion than France's Saint Domingue with 480,000 slaves. The French planters, supposedly Christian monogamists, had adopted the practice of taking African slave mistresses as well as French wives. The Mulattos, children from such unions, were given a special social status and were sent to France with their mothers for an education. That factor alone brought complications and tensions because while British Methodist and Church of England missionaries taught slaves the rudiments of religion – presumably creeds, catechisms and conduct – they were not permitted to teach them to read or write.¹⁵ Their eyes might have been opened and their aspirations aroused to increase the likelihood of rebellion and that would never do! But the French policy, using very intriguing means, was aimed at the same end. To avoid rebellion.

Few people seemed to notice two anomalies or conflicting ethical judgements which were highlighted by the situation. One concerned education and the other concerned marriage and race relations. Education was outlawed for African slaves because it might foment rebellion but it was soon to be actively encouraged for Englishmen in order to avoid rebellion. And French Christians were using slaves in the bedroom with that one basic motive in common with the Abbasid Muslim Caliphs, but there the similarity between the conduct and motives of the two groups ends. The conduct of the Abbasids had been proper and their policy had improved race relations, stressed the equality of mankind and improved the status of slaves. The conduct of the French was exploitative and, in the end, violently destructive. But neither they nor the British planters were having things all their own way. A small band of dedicated reformers in Britain and the USA were beginning to rouse the public conscience. Prominent among them were Granville Sharp, the philosopher and political economist Adam Smith, a Quaker leader named Benezet, a slave-runner turned Church of England clergyman and well known hymn writer named John Newton, and the founder of Methodism, John Wesley. However for impact made possible by his wealth and independence William Wilberforce towered above them.

Two years after Wilberforce entered Parliament, in 1772, Granville Sharp brought the second of his civil court actions aimed at outlawing slavery in Britain and Lord Chief Justice Mansfield delivered his momentous judgement after some hesitation that “as soon as any slave sets foot in England he becomes free.” The pressure was on to outlaw not just slavery as such but the trade in slaves throughout the British Empire. It quickly became obvious that because of their patterns of interdependence and also because of competition for trade between colonial powers, slavery had to be abolished everywhere within the sphere of European influence, or not at all. The pro-abolition and anti abolition forces began to organize.

The Society for the Abolition of Slavery was established in England in 1787 and its less influential counterpart, Amis des Noirs, in France a little later. The establishment churches divided down the middle while the dissenters or nonconformists solidly back the abolition movement. The slaves in the New World took heart. Then France erupted. The revolutionaries with their Declaration of the Rights of Man were striking at the nobility and the church as controllers of wealth with one fist and at the ghetto gates with the other. They could hardly be expected to support the stand of the Caribbean slave-owning planters who had insisted on sending delegates to the Estates General as members of the Third Estate. They didn't. In 1791 the National Assembly rejected the planters' plea for greater independence but decreed that people of colour born of free parents or themselves freed should be entitled to vote and to enjoy all the privileges of French citizenship.

When the planters threatened to secede from France the mulattos and freed slaves revolted to demand the rights the National Assembly had granted them. Within months 2,000 whites and 10,000 slaves were dead, the sugar plantations had been destroyed and the northern half of the island of Saint Domingue was under the control of the slaves. In 1794, after three years of chaos and abortive efforts to stabilize the situation, France became the first European power to free all slaves under its control by an act of the Assembly. The shock waves sweeping across Europe and Britain intensified, especially when an English army sent to annex the island was defeated by slaves who had assumed semi-independence.

MALTHUS INTERVENES

Then in 1798, while people across Europe were having to think more deeply than they ever had before about their relationship with non-European peoples – and with black Africans in particular – another of those people who were rapidly straining the boundaries of philosophical, scientific and economic investigation, Thomas Robert Malthus, published a study on The Principle of Population as it affects the Future Improvement of Society.¹⁶ The systematic study of science was still young. The study of demography was even younger. Having studied economics to gain his master of arts degree, Malthus was admitted a fellow of Jesus College, Cambridge, in 1793 and took holy orders as an Anglican minister in 1797. That made him an expert. Therefore when he wrote in his study that population growth will always tend to outrun the food supply and that betterment of the lot of mankind is impossible without stern limits on reproduction, the consternation was immediate. Malthus was saying that the infinite human hope for happiness must be in vain and that poverty was the inevitable fate for many. The expansion of food production, he said, would not keep pace with the population which would grow to the limit of subsistence and be kept there by famine, war and pestilence. He drew attention to the need to change laws so that they encouraged population mobility and discouraged high birth rates, and he proposed for consideration the establishment of workhouses for the excess population in which they would face the harshest of environments. In spite of criticism of his scientific, mathematical, and highly pessimistic approach to his study it was adopted for incorporation into the theoretical systems of economics then in use.

Malthus' theories had immediate implications for each of domestic and foreign policy, and religious understanding and human relations. One of his aims appears to have been to put a brake on expectations of an ultimate utopian society or an all-embracing messianic age. He contrasted the high natural population growth rate in North America with the lower rates in Europe and called for more attention to the 'moral restraint' of late marriage with adult celibacy until the partners were economically able to support their children. He contrasted that practice with the alternatives of birth control, abortion, adultery and homosexuality, each of which he considered immoral. Then he turned to the broad picture. Societies which ignored these moral constraints would suffer the deplorable "positive checks" of war, famine, and epidemic, he said, and it should be society's goal to avoid each of these – but not by charity or 'poor laws' which might cause those who benefited from them to "relax their moral restraint or increase their fertility ..." It was wonderful stuff for the Calvinists – except that on the domestic front it put a brake on economic optimism. It helped to justify a theory of wages that made the minimum cost of subsistence for a wage earner a standard by which to judge others, and discouraged traditional forms of charity. On the imperial and foreign affairs front it elevated the need to exploit overseas colonies and other sources of supplies for the home markets; it encouraged an attitude that war didn't really matter because it might help to retard the growth of world population; it discouraged the abolition of the slave trade because when people had the benefit of slaves to work properties they were less inclined to have large families in order to spread the work load; it reduced the incentive to 'lift' the non-European peoples to Europe's levels of social expectation; and it aggravated fears that a restrained and responsible white Christian Europe might be disadvantaged by the unrestrained expansion of non-European non-Christian populations. They were not the messages or the influences which the world needed at a critical stage in the European colonial era.

TROUBLE IN SAINT DOMINGUE

Then, in 1802, Napoleon made another move as out of character with his general policy as the massacre at Acre. He revoked the emancipation law, reintroduced the status of slavery in French dominions and sent an army to recover control of Saint Domingue. It was exactly what the world did not need hot on the heels of Malthus. But when we turn a few more pages of history the rationale behind Napoleon's decision becomes apparent. Britain's attempt to annex Saint Domingue had come immediately after Louis lost his head and Britain had joined a loose European alliance to restore the French monarchy and to prevent Robespierre from fomenting rebellion beyond France's borders. By 1802 the boot was changing to the other foot. Napoleon had made big strides across Europe and was working towards a different European alliance – one which would break Britain and make up for its capture of Malta and the French Army and outpost in Egypt in 1800–1801. He had already inveigled Russia, Prussia, Sweden and Denmark into signing a pact of armed neutrality and trade embargoes against Britain but these were not naval powers and because Britain still had firm control of the seas Napoleon needed the support of every naval power he could muster. These were the same powers who shared the Caribbean and South American sugar colonies with France and Britain and they would hardly welcome an alliance with a country hell-bent on emancipating their slaves.

The sordid drama continued and eventually the new states of Haiti and the Dominican Republic, hacked out of Saint Domingue, were left with no chance of shaping an orderly life for several generations. The stage had been set for the Western world to make its never-ending stream of sick jokes about banana republic corruption. The great Christian powers of Europe had set it themselves very thoroughly indeed. In doing so they provided another illustration of contrasting attitudes between the people of Christendom and people of Islam. The rebellious sugar slaves of Basra had received treatment of a very different kind, even after the massacre of 1871.

Napoleon's embryonic alliance soon ran into trouble. Britain again declared war on France and promptly sent a fleet into the Baltic to break up the alliance. One afternoon was enough. The Danish flotilla was sheltering in Copenhagen harbour behind seven hundred guns and at first gave the British fleet such a pounding that the admiral ordered an end to the action. But the second in command, a certain Horatio Nelson, turned his famous blind eye to his telescope and signaled "engage more closely." A few hours later the Danes suffered the humiliation of seeing half their fleet towed to England as bounty, (and perhaps left dangling as a carrot to encourage Denmark to change sides), while 1,700 Danes and 943 British lay dead.¹⁷

THE DANISH CHALLENGE

Denmark was in big trouble. It had lost its Caribbean island of St. John just fifty years before and relied heavily on the good will of other powers for its sugar and other imports and exports. Now, after the debacle of Copenhagen harbour it was at the mercy of every power in Europe and Danish bonds fell heavily. The king had to borrow quickly, heavily and in confidence to re-equip the navy and secure the nation's integrity and markets or it would be only a matter of time before Denmark lost its independence and was absorbed by Prussia, Russia, France or Britain. The money came, in September 1803, through indirect channels from his brother-in-law Prince William of Hesse-Cassel, the wealthiest prince in Europe, who was leading a very complicated double life.

Prince William had been among the Rhine princes dispossessed as a result of the French/Austrian peace which foreshadowed the formation of the Confederation of the Rhine and the end of the Holy Roman Empire. By way of compensation he had accepted from Napoleon the title Elector and a big hunk of property at Mainz, confiscated from the church, and he was being wooed by Napoleon to join the proposed confederation and the alliance against Britain. But William had fortunes invested in Britain plus big loans made to the Prince of Wales, the Duke of York and the Duke of Clarence which, in view of Britain's well proven sea power, he would never clap hands on again if he went to war against them. On top of that he was making yet another fortune out of selling souls to a great list of Europe's warring monarchs. He would conscript an army and then hire it out to any oppressor who needed to put down a rebellion or grab another piece of territory. It was not his troops who were the mercenaries. It was William and he was following a well trodden family path. His troops simply stood to lose their lives.¹⁸

While he was being wooed by Napoleon and was busy propping up the King of Denmark he had to decide on an offer from the anti-French alliance of a special "subsidy" of 1,250,000 pounds Sterling above the going mercenary rate for every 100,000 men he could throw into the war against Napoleon. He could have raised 20,000 men, which amounted to a gift of 250,000 pounds Sterling, but to do so would have amounted to an open invitation for Napoleon to jump on him with both heels. He declined.¹⁹

At that point the King of Denmark decided the situation was getting rather unhealthy. He wasn't keen to be ground between Britain and France, especially in another struggle for control of the Caribbean which was like a whole string of tinder-box-dry St. Johns. He wanted out. He made a gesture of defiance against Napoleon's policies which he seems to have hoped would not be sufficient to prompt a French invasion but which would suffice to attract British sympathy and perhaps even the return of a few ships. He repudiated Napoleon's reintroduction of slavery and outlawed it in Denmark.²⁰ His kingdom, he said, stood squarely with the Mansfield judgement in Britain thirty years earlier, It didn't really matter that there had been practically no slavery in Denmark. He had thrown out a challenge and the question was whether Britain would take it up. It did, relations quickly recovered and Denmark, way out on the fringe of European affairs, managed to stay clear of Napoleon for quite a while.

Two years later, when he apparently abandoned his cherished plan to invade Britain because of its continuing naval superiority, Napoleon launched a full-scale land-controlled trade blockade of Britain. When events proved that he could enforce it reasonably effectively and British exports of sugar, hardware and cotton goods to the continent had almost ceased, the British government judged that the time was right to accept the abolition of the slave trade. A bill was introduced in the House of Lords, passed, referred to the Commons, carried in committee by 175 votes to 17 and easily passed the final stages without a division in what must have been an anticlimax after forty years of struggle.

MORALITY OR POLITICS?

The flag waving began. It had been a resounding victory for British Christian morality – or so the churches and the papers told the public. Almost all the arguments used against the bill had been economic, dealing with the loss of profit for planters and traders, the retarding effect on naval recruitment, and the benefits for Africans living under British colonial rule. Then there were the arguments that Britain's colonists would feel let down and may become estranged from Britain and that if trading were outlawed the status of slavery would soon be outlawed also, with even more serious consequences. In contrast to earlier times little was said about the benefits of baptism and Christian teaching being better for a slave than life in ignorance in darkest Africa. Speakers for abolition concentrated on the immorality of the trade in human beings, on countering the economic arguments of the opposition and on the fact that Portugal was the only important slave trader left after Britain.²¹ The United States had acted to ban trading only a matter of weeks before, but little was said by either side in the debate about that.

And yet there was something hollow about the debate. Wilberforce knew, the government knew and most of parliament knew that the real position had not been debated. Although public attitudes had gradually firmed against the slave trade on moral grounds, when the chips were down it was economic expediency which had called the tune and if it had been in Britain's economic interests for the trade to continue the bill would probably not have passed the Commons and certainly would not have passed the Lords. Its introduction in the House of Lords and not the Commons therefore says much about the image of Britain which the passage of the bill was intended to establish. The closed trading patterns of early colonial days had passed and Britain had to rethink its relationships with its suppliers.

After the loss of the American colonies much of the financial benefit from the slave trade had slipped through Britain's fingers although the Jay Treaty of 1796 had provided a basis acceptable to both nations just for future trade and had eliminated a lot of the tension in relations between them.²² Britain's Caribbean plantations were becoming overworked, run down, more costly to operate and therefore poorly competitive with younger Caribbean and United States plantations and the large scale operations of South America. They also faced the probability of rebellion. The only hope for them to survive in the sugar market in future, especially on the continent, was for the other producers to be forced to compete on a different basis or for Britain to pick up a hunk of their production action. The closing of the slave trade was one move in that direction. Without slave labour they would have to rely on more expensive methods of land development, the sugar price would have to rise and the older British colonies would have a chance to keep going.

NEW INTEREST IN AFRICA, SOUTH AMERICA

But Britain was also becoming more aware of the production potential of Africa itself and there was an influential body of industrial opinion which maintained that new colonies should be developed with new industries like palm oil worked by indigenous labour. The reasoning therefore ran that the labour, regarded under the expanding capitalist economic system as one of the units of input in the production schedule, should be left where it was and not exported. On top of all that, Britain was deeply embroiled in fomenting rebellion in Spain's American colonies. Trading and investment potential in South America was enormous so that redirection of lost exports to Europe and redeployment of investment interests from the old Caribbean colonies was very attractive, especially if Britain was geared to share in the independence action which was imminent. It therefore gradually becomes clear why very little was said by either side in the parliamentary debates about the fact that the United States had acted to ban trading in slaves only a matter of weeks before.

Then Napoleon kindly intervened again. Within a few months of the British anti-slave trade bill being passed he occupied Portugal and then in March 1808 he placed his brother Joseph on the Spanish throne in a bloodless coup. In theory he had become master of Latin America as well as two thirds of Europe. In practice it wasn't quite like that. He didn't have control of the seas. Britain did. The great naval battles of Biscay, led by Calder, and Trafalgar, the last to be led by Nelson, had left Napoleon virtually anchored on dry land and unable to enforce his new authority west of the Atlantic. Britain had already been applying a naval blockade of Spanish America sporadically since 1796 in its on-again-off-again wars with Spain. This, combined with British piracy on the high seas had had a crippling effect on the economics of some regions. The policy was politically justified on the grounds of encouraging independence for Spain's colonies but the real motive had simply been to grab a large share of Spain's South and Central American trade of which Britain's merchants and other power brokers had become extremely jealous.

Until the Declaration of Independence by Britain's North American colonies in 1776 the corrupt and repressive Spanish administration had insisted on trans-shipment of all goods in inter-colony trade through its customs at Porto Bello (Panama). In that respect it was no different from British colonial policy and when the balloon went up in North America the Spanish king, Charles III, quickly took the hint and relaxed controls over trade between Spain's colonies. Transshipment at Porto Bello was discontinued and Spanish shipping was allowed to travel freely via Cape Horn to Chile and Peru. The effect was quite unexpected. In the ten years from 1778 to 1788 Spain's trade with the Americas grew about seven fold.²³ Britain just couldn't resist the temptation to offset its losses in the north at the expense of Spain in the south.

In an effort to counter British interference Spain established a Viceroyalty at Buenos Aires on the River Plate, (Argentina), as well as that at Lima, (Peru). The new administration was to strengthen and protect the southern mainland and in particular to secure the southern sea route to the Pacific against British raiders. Buenos Aires boomed. The price of its imports, freed of transshipment at Porto Bello, fell to about one third of previous levels. Its exports of hides, skins, tallow, horns and wool expanded in volume and it got full value for them. And in addition it had the prestige and government population growth which went with viceregal status.

Then came the British blockade of 1796 and the value of exports from Buenos Aires fell by well over 90 percent from about 5,500,000 pesos in 1796 to 335,000 pesos the next year.²⁴ Spain's authority was badly shaken through its inability to do anything about the blockade and ties with the Bourbon monarchy, already weakened through the reforms it had been forced to permit, were seriously undermined. Immediately Britain took possession of Trinidad in 1797 the British government began to actively incite rebellion. It ordered its governor to promote measures which would undermine the Spanish authorities, help the colonies to resist the "oppressive authority" of their government and lead to their liberation. He was to assure them of British resources all the way from arms and ammunition to forces. But he was also to assure them that Britain had no designs on their territory or sovereignty over them, nor any wish to interfere in the religious, political and civil privileges of the colonists, which included the long-standing right to trade in and to exploit slaves.²⁵ When Napoleon took control of Spain the colonists quickly seized their chances. They didn't want one overlord simply replaced by another – especially one who had just precipitated another disaster in Saint Domingue by reintroducing slavery. They would have their British-sponsored independence, thank you very much. Rebellions, each justified by quite separate situations, swept Spanish America, starting in Mexico, then Venezuela and engulfing every other region in turn.

Britain provided refuge for rebels and insurgents in its Caribbean Islands, plus naval "volunteers" and army mercenaries.²⁶ In fact it had been providing refuge for a key rebel right in the heart of London for some years. Francisco de Miranda, a well-to-do criollo²⁷ who was intent on liberating Spanish America, had friends in high places right across Europe and the USA. He was back in London at his home which had become a centre for anti-Spanish conspiracy after an unsuccessful attempt at a coup in Venezuela at the time that Wilberforce steered the bill outlawing the slave trade through parliament. He was not sitting idly waiting for another opportunity to fall into his lap. He was deeply involved in the British conspiracy against Spain and was implicated in unauthorized and abortive British expeditions to Buenos Aires in 1806 and 1807. They had first captured the city and shipped home over a million dollars in booty which was paraded triumphantly through London on eight wagons, greatly stimulating British trade and investment in Latin America.

But then the British forces were defeated in an anti-British mob reaction and interned in the interior. A further naval and military expedition with ten thousand men was mounted to release them, concurrent with the introduction of the slave trade prohibition bill in parliament. The commander, General Whitelock, carried instructions from the British Government that he was to reduce the province of Buenos Aires by force and exile those who had overthrown and interned the short-lived British administration, but he was only to occupy a portion of the territory and he was to minimize distress and annoyance for the people. At the same time he was to "attach the inhabitants to British rule" but he was forbidden to guarantee them protection against the vengeance of Old Spain after a peace settlement had been reached.²⁸ The expedition was an absolute disaster and Whitelock was forced to evacuate all British interests, both military and commercial, not only from Buenos Aires but from Montevideo also.

However in the Portuguese territory of Brazil events were about to take a different turn. British interests had designs on the immense markets and resources of the tropical territory which was bigger than the whole of the USA as it then was and some uprisings against the weak and bankrupt Portuguese colonial administration had already occurred. Brazil was ripe for a take over if only someone would trigger an inside rebellion. But Britain and Portugal were allies against France. When Napoleon's forces moved towards Lisbon in November 1807 the chance fell in Britain's lap. It tipped off the royal family and as a result the Prince Regent, Dom Joao, and a huge party of two thousand hangers-on from court, plus of course all the treasury's gold and jewels, were two days at sea heading for Brazil under British naval escort before the French army reached Lisbon. The Portuguese monarchy had been saved, Rio de Janeiro became the centre of gravity of the Portuguese empire and Brazil was saved the trauma of a war of independence because independence later came fairly smoothly through the gradual establishment of a separate monarchy. And Britain had gained the trade and investment advantage which the whole exercise had been designed to achieve for the bargain basement price of a naval escort for a royal exile. It not only offset the diplomatic and commercial debacle of the River Plate, it also got British speculators off the hook of unplanned overindulgence in the Latin American markets which they had swallowed under the pressure of Napoleon's European embargo.

A GREAT VICTORY FOR MANKIND

Events had moved so fast that they had overtaken and overshadowed the introduction of the anti-slave trade bill. The extent to which the bill was intended to undermine Napoleon on one hand or the Spaniards and Portuguese on the other, nor its expected value in getting Britain out of the mess it had sailed into in the River Plate, may never be quite clear. However all three factors were significant considerations and could account for the subdued atmosphere and the relative lack of fire in debate while the bill was before Parliament.

Yes, a great victory had been won for mankind, for human rights, and for love and understanding between peoples of different races and it gave the campaigners great heart for the next campaign. After all, it was only trading in slaves in areas under British control which had been outlawed. Exploitation of those already in the system and trading in areas under many other flags could continue to Britain's disadvantage. Being pre occupied with Napoleon there seemed little she could do about it for the time being. The public debate had been mainly about Christian morality but the decision making had been based on self interest.^{29 30} Little had changed except appearance.

In spite of its naval power and the steps it had taken in the Caribbean and South America Britain's financial and trading position continued to worsen as Napoleon swept across Europe and tightened his trade embargo. By 1810 the Duke of Wellington was forced to tell the British Government that if it could not pay his army or keep it supplied in the field then it should be withdrawn³¹, leaving Napoleon without an effective challenge in Spain and Portugal. The likely effects of such a British withdrawal from Spain, (or even the effects of its army being partially immobilized), on both the future of the anti-Napoleonic alliances and the course of the war were absolutely frightening. The money just had to be found and got to Wellington's army in gold.

A NEW DYNASTY

About a year before that pathetic appeal from Wellington had reached London a 33 year old Frankfurt ghetto-born German Jew whose father had been a cotton and wine merchant and retailer, a coin and antique dealer and a money lender, had taken British nationality. He had been a merchant in England for eleven years and had established his own bank. With some very astute dealing and excellent knowledge and judgement of the international money market which Napoleon was manipulating to Britain's disadvantage, he obtained the necessary gold from the East India Company, sold it at a handsome profit to the British Treasury, and offered to arrange the ticklish business of getting it to Wellington through his own bank. In collaboration with his father and brothers in Europe he devised an audacious scheme to run the British gold across France using a loophole which Napoleon had left open in the French customs system for the purpose of draining Britain's gold reserves.

Nathan, third son of Mayer and Gutle Rothschild, had launched N. M. Rothschild and Sons into the international banking arena in a quite dramatic manner. It was the first new string to a family bow which, with M. A. Rothschild und Sohne as the backbone, would call the financial tune across Europe for three or four vital generations. The family finance empire became more than just a string of banks. It provided personal and political power for the leaders of the family which was quite incredible and ranks among the major factors in determining the course of European affairs during that period. It also became a very important influence in helping to reshape the triangle of messianic faiths.

The former ghetto family owed its rise to power directly to Napoleon's efforts to eliminate the anti-reform power base of the Elector William of Hesse-Cassel whose hired armies had been used to prop up the crowned heads of Europe. The founder of the dynasty, Mayer, had been simply a moderately comfortable, innovative merchant until, through gaining William's confidence, he was invited to act as intermediary for the naval loan to the king of Denmark. The amount of money involved was big indeed but it wasn't the commission on that service which laid the foundations for Europe's greatest family fortune, it was the fact that through it Mayer Rothschild was already established as a reliable aid when William needed real help, about the same time that the family was smuggling gold to Wellington under Napoleon's nose.

But to pick up the threads we must go back again to 1795 when the French invasion of the lowlands had opened the Frankfurt ghetto and enabled Mayer to set up a warehouse for English imports in the main part of the town. Nathan moved from Frankfurt to Manchester, England, three years later to strengthen the family's trading business by bypassing French-controlled Antwerp with direct export-import capacity. Using loads of initiative plus the instinct for survival and determination to surmount obstacles which the Christian community seemed intent on force breeding in Jewish ghetto communities, he rapidly expanded the Manchester business to manufacturing as well as local and export distribution.

In 1804, in the wake of the Danish naval loan, Nathan moved to London to be at the hub of the money market and he had soon established himself on the stock exchange. This helped to stoke the whispering campaign against "the ghetto firm" which some of Germany's established bankers put around when Mayer gained ever increasing business on behalf of Elector William in competition with them. These whispers were prominent among those which came to Napoleon's attention in Frankfurt in 1805 and which prompted him to summon the Sanhedrin in 1806/1807. However the interdependence between Mayer and the Elector had by then become so great that force would have been necessary to prise them apart. From Napoleon's point of view it could have been counterproductive.

In October 1806 Napoleon gave William a simple ultimatum "join me, or go into exile, or join the prisoners of war." His fortunes propping up Napoleon's enemies left him no option. He fled to join his brother and brothers-in-law in Denmark. The bulk of his fortune which was not out on loan fell into the hands of Napoleon's officers and the bribery and other means by which he managed to retrieve most of it including his debtors' ledgers, makes fascinating reading.³² By the time Napoleon imposed his blockade of England and the Sanhedrin issued its pronouncements about a Jew and his fatherland Mayer Rothschild was debt collector and chief investor for the Elector-in-exile.

By a little touch of circumstantial good fortune Mayer Rothschild had William, his debtors and Napoleon all in the palm of his hand. Napoleon offered a little inducement for Mayer to hand over the Elector's debtors' ledger – he could remain debt collector and have 25 per cent commission on all interest he collected for the French Fatherland – but he couldn't force him, not even with a house search.³³ In any case to do so would have brought all of Europe's royal debt skeletons out of their cupboards and would have led to a renewed alliance against him. The Elector's debtors couldn't refuse to pay interest to Mayer for fear that they would end up exposed to Napoleon and, for much the same reason, the Elector himself could not question his debt collector. He could only ask him to invest it for him in fixed interest British securities and when Nathan chose to gamble with it, highly profitably, there was nothing he could do except be grateful to receive his fixed interest.

At the same time the Rothschild import-export business was simply converted from one of the biggest legitimate businesses in Germany into the biggest, most highly organized, most tightly secured and fabulously profitable cross-channel smuggling operation. The interest on William's loans flowed across the channel for investment in England as a steady stream of gold, together with import-export transaction payments, until the hazards of blockade-running prompted the Rothschilds to set up the first ever system of bills of exchange. They also became the leaders in international intelligence and communications and brought a whole host of other innovations to merchant banking as they commuted between the royal and noble houses of the ever-fluid anti-Napoleonic alliances. From 1812 to the collapse of the French Republic they handled Britain's subsidies to its continental allies and then financed the return of Louis XVIII to the French monarchy.

The Napoleonic Wars had lifted the Rothschild family enterprises from a comfortable business, with Nathan able to take ten thousand pounds Sterling with him to England in 1798, to the wealthiest bank in Europe with family assets of fifty million pounds Sterling. But the scale of the fortunes which were to grow from them is almost incidental. There were a number of other large Jewish family fortunes, dotted around Europe outside the ghettos, mainly in Britain, but most of them sheltered behind a low profile and simply shared the capital markets with the Christian family-controlled fortunes. It is the manner in which the Rothschild fortunes were established and managed and the consequences of their management which are of continuing importance.

Debt collection for Elector William coupled with subsidy running for Britain provided the most direct introduction to Europe's crowned heads and aristocrats which anyone could wish for and a ready-made base for the establishment of banks in Vienna, Naples and Paris as well as Frankfurt and London. They were managed separately but coordinated to provide an immense resource for the whole family. And by discriminating against his daughters, by specifying in his will that an interest in his estate could only pass to male members of the family, Mayer ensured that it would stay that way for a long time. Their money control was so sophisticated that they could regulate foreign exchange rates almost at will in spite of other market forces and they used this well proven capacity, or the threat of it, to support or undermine governments and to coerce them into particular policy decisions which coincided with their wishes. In this respect they demonstrated to the world the techniques and effects of exchange control which have subsequently been used with devastating results and with gross irresponsibility by many financiers and transnational corporations during the twentieth century. Quite apart from the question of deliberate policy decisions based on the family's philosophical or political outlook, the natural consequence of the relationships built up during the Napoleonic wars was that the Rothschild banks would become a prop for the monarchies of Europe. This meant in practice that Rothschild wealth propped up the unholy Holy Alliance and the papacy and was a symbol of reaction and suppression of republican or even democratic aspirations.

Between 1817 and 1824 the Rothschild banks raised major loans for Prussia, Britain, Naples (twice), Russia, Portugal and Austria. When they were excluded from a consortium to raise a massive French war reparations loan they showed they were not to be trifled with by sharply depressing the French bond market. They were not excluded from a second loan raising. When other British investors rushed to cash in on the largely British-inspired Latin American wars of independence Nathan Rothschild stayed clear, jointly set up the Alliance Insurance Group with Moses Montefiore and he was ready to prop up the mighty Bank of England with a massive transfer of gold from France when the bubble burst and over three thousand British businesses went bankrupt in double-quick time.³⁴

INFLUENCE? YES. VOTES? NO!

With thousands of millions of pounds passing through their control it has been inevitable that conflict between governments and competing interest groups would arise from time to time because of the investment and lending policies of the brothers, from competition for their favours and from conditions which they attached to their loans. Until the patterns of international money supply changed from those of the early nineteenth century and taxation policies evolved so that governments gained greater control over their banking systems, governments sometimes had to wait for a nod from a Rothschild before suppressing internal rebellion or waging external war. Such extraordinary personal power was bound to generate antagonism and give their enemies plenty of material to examine under the public microscope. If at times there appeared to be contradiction in their decisions or the use of personal power for sectional benefit then, firstly, it simply shows them to be no different to anyone else and, secondly, it brings us to the central point of the Rothschild saga. The family has remained staunchly Jewish in its faith.

While many prominent Jews, including Benjamin Disraeli who later served as Prime Minister of Britain, succumbed to pressure from the church and civil authorities and accepted Christian baptism in order to maintain their positions or to become eligible for public office, the children of Mayer Rothschild did not. All ten surviving children, five boys and five girls (with a spread of ages of well over twenty years and a spirit of cooperation developed from having to share a single bedroom in their ghetto home) were deeply influenced by the religious devotion of their parents. There was no question of their marriage to Christians, let alone conversion. In fact Nathan strictly forbade his children from contemplating marriage to a Christian and after a French prince, Edmond de Clary had sought to court Hannah he added a clause to his will disinheriting any of his daughters who married without their mother's or their brothers' consent. Five years later, in 1830, after a period of trauma Hannah finally received her mother's consent to marry a second Christian suitor, Henry Fitzroy, a brother of the Earl of Southampton. But thereafter she was treated with contempt by many members of the dynasty.³⁵

The family's attitude that Hannah was betraying the faith of her forefathers must be seen against the circumstances of the time and the family's efforts, spurned by the Christian church at large, to break down the barriers between Christians and Jews. She was seen as undermining the Jewish community's ability to argue for legal and social equality with Christians by playing into the hands of those Christians who opposed equality as unnecessary on the grounds that integration and intermarriage would eventually eliminate both the Jewish community and the need for equality. Such people claimed that the disappearance of Judaism through integration would confirm the claims of the church, militant, crusading and victorious, to be the sole representative of God on earth and therefore justify the use of the Inquisition to speed up the process. And on the Jewish side there were many who feared that integration would lead to elimination and betrayal of the purpose of Israel.

In both camps there were clear memories of the outcry when, sixteen years earlier, in 1823, Hannah's uncle Amschel Rothschild had used his influence to get an act adopted in Frankfurt permitting intermarriage not only between Christians of different denominations but also between Christians and Jews. Philosopher and statesman Johann Goethe reflected and also helped to perpetuate a widespread Christian attitude when he said that the scandalous law would undermine all sense of family morality and suggested that Germany could even end up with a Jewess as "principal Lady of the Bedchamber."³⁶ After all, the pope, Pius VII, had banned marriages between Catholics and Protestants only nine years earlier, in 1814, on the fall of Napoleon, as one of his steps backward to recover some of the Vatican's lost temporal power. If, as the bulk of the church did, one was to accept that there was a theological and not a political basis for that ban, then surely it was far more degrading to marry a Jew than a Protestant. These two streams of thought had brought sectarian bitterness to a new fever pitch and they coupled with the Jesuit-orchestrated growth of Catholic "revival" groups throughout Europe, plus the issue of preferential employment which was coming to the fore with worsening economic depression, to make Europe's social and communal waters very muddy indeed. When Hannah walked down the aisle with her Christian husband Europe was still wracked with violence following the arrest of the Catholic archbishop of Cologne for his refusal to sanction mixed marriages. A Catholic Professor, Johann Gorres, then inflamed the bitterness even further with his writings in which he drew heavily on the divisive theology of Athanasius to defend the Archbishop and the papal line.

In 1829, the year that Catholics had finally been given the right to sit in parliament and to hold military, judicial or public office in England, Nathan Rothschild had unsuccessfully petitioned the House of Commons for the same rights for Jews. As the head of a family conservatively estimated to hold personal fortunes of two hundred million pounds Sterling or more at that stage he was welcome to prop up the Bank of England, to finance Britain's military adventures or to manage the royal family's personal investments, but he was not worthy of a seat in parliament! He and others of his faith had to wait until 1858 for that right, another 22 years before they could enter university, and a further 20 years before the final restrictions were lifted.

Emancipation was a very slow process indeed, but England was about par for the course. The countries of Europe were each taking their own pace and while some had followed a more enlightened path others were still dragging the chain. At least emancipation was becoming a reality now that the Holy Roman Empire was a thing of the past. As in England and Germany, the Rothschilds elsewhere used their influence to speed the process but in doing so they found themselves in some very anomalous situations. At one time they were propping up the Vatican and, in so doing, they were suppressing Italian national aspirations at the same time. At another time the brothers were invited to open a bank in Vienna in spite of the fact that no Jew was allowed to own property in Austria. They had to report regularly to the "Jewish Office", they still had to pay a special poll tax for the "right" to marry and foreign-born Jews could only obtain short-duration visitors' visas. The last condition was waived for Salomon who was to formally establish the bank, but not for the others.

However anti-Jewish feeling was running so high in Frankfurt in 1819, with real fear of another wave of pogroms, that Salomon was happy to go to Vienna where he set about working towards the reform of those injustices. Among the early tasks with which he was entrusted by the Austrian government was to finance the Emperor's daughter, Archduchess Marie Louise, the blatantly unfaithful second wife of Napoleon, into the dukedoms of Parma, Piacenza and Guastalla in northern Italy and to arrange a suitable inheritance for her two illegitimate children. He did this by devious means which made the public treasury of Parma the ultimate source of the funds. The people of the region were not only stuck with a system they didn't want but they were unwittingly paying for it as well.

About the same time, 1821, revolution broke out against the Austrian-backed monarchy in Naples where the people were demanding a return to Napoleon's democratic constitution of 1812. The Rothschilds were called in again and the technique was much the same. A loan was raised in Naples, to be repaid from public revenue and to be used to finance an Austrian army of occupation to put down the revolt by the people who were to pay the army. The effect was dramatic and similar revolts which were brewing in Piedmont and Alessandria, near Parma, fell flat. The Austrian government was so grateful that in 1822 the five Rothschild brothers found themselves Austrian barons – without basic citizenship rights.

PAPAL STATES IN CRISIS

Then came one of the greatest paradoxes of the saga. In 1830 the papal states were suffering from the most backward and ruthless administration in all of Europe.³⁷ They were being propped up by Austrian forces. Christian Liberalism was gaining strong support among the ordinary Catholic clergy of Italy, but a man who was to lead a short-lived republican government in Rome 19 years later, Giuseppe Mazzini, was in prison for inciting rebellion against the pope. The movement had as its focal point the writings of a French priest, Felicité Robert de Lamennais, who was calling for the church to cut itself free from the reactionary powers and to form an alliance with all people who were striving for independence.

Lamennais had successfully predicted the French uprising of July 1830 which temporarily ended the monarchy again and with his cry that "Freedom must be fought for, it is never surrendered voluntarily”, he became a hero of the people.³⁸ But Prince Metternich, the Austrian monarchy and the other powers didn't like the sound of it. They put pressure on the Vatican to introduce reforms in the papal states and to quieten the dissident French priest at the same time. At first the Vatican did nothing. A whole series of regional revolts broke in each of the Italian monarchies, principalities and the papal states in 1831 with the Carbonari secret society and the ghettos in the centre of the fray. But more forces arrived from Austria and France and the wind was soon out of the dissidents' sails. The Vatican tightened its control and proposed local government by clergy, which the rest of Europe had long since firmly rejected.³⁹ Even Austria and France objected and threatened to pull out and leave the pope to fend for himself. Pope Gregory XVI responded in August 1832 with an attack on the views of Lamennais in the ghastly encyclical Mirari vos which was intended to justify papal claims to temporal power and the new local measures, and at the same time regain the support of Austria and the other powers. Loyal submission to princes, he wrote, necessarily follows from the sacred precepts of the Christian religion.

The pope might have stopped with such a restatement of the Divine Right of Kings, but he didn't. He went on to condemn the detestable insolence and malice of those who, incited by their vaunting and unbounded ambition for licentious freedom, use all their power to agitate against and upset the rights of rulers. Warning to his subject Gregory went on to attack the 'absurd notion' that freedom of conscience was to be claimed and defended as a right for all men. Freedom of opinion, he said, was the ruin of both the church and the state. Together with the abominable and detestable freedom of publication which some were zealously demanding, these excesses and contempt for sacred matters had corrupted youth and brought down nations!⁴⁰ Pope Gregory had done his best to isolate the Catholic Church from the mainstream of modern thought. He was building a new ghetto for Catholics instead of Jews. It didn't need walls and gates. Ignorance was enough. He was also preparing the ground to repel the challenges which were building up from the scientists and philosophers.

Charles Darwin, an English Protestant who had just graduated from Cambridge, having changed from theology to science part way through his course, had just sailed on the "Beagle" for a five-year stint as naturalist with an admiralty expedition around the world. Karl Marx, born into a German Jewish family with a proud Rabbinical heritage and at that time a youth of fourteen, was keenly reading French Rationalism at high school midway between Napoleon's Waterloo and Mayer Rothschild's Frankfurt. He was smarting from the memory of the Christian baptism which he had to endure so that his father could keep his respectable law post. Both Marx and Darwin would have been keenly interested in Gregory's outburst. However they didn't matter – for the moment – but the Rothschilds did.

Carl Rothschild had stayed to open a bank in Naples after the 1821 rebellion had been put down and it was Rothschild money which was financing the Austrian army of occupation after the 1831 fiasco and which was also needed to prop up the papal states in other ways. He was invited to an audience with the pope and was given treatment normally reserved for Emperors. It was in ludicrous contrast with the standard treatment for Jews. The viciousness of the persecution to which they had been subjected during the previous few years under Leo XII had been such that wealthier Jews who were able to do so had fled Rome and the financial stability of the papal states had been shaken. Leo had reintroduced discriminatory laws and restrictions which had been allowed to lapse. The system of papal informants flourished and the Inquisition was applied to Jews in Rome with unprecedented venom. Barbaric executions under a cruel papal legate were the order of the day and in Romagna alone some five hundred people were condemned in three months. So the meeting between Gregory and Carl was a case of olive branches, red carpets and a kiss of the papal ring.

Yes. The Austrian army would stay and the money for development projects to prop up the papal states would continue to flow. But there were to be special conditions. The Roman ghetto had to go and the Inquisition against Jews had to stop. The pope must give an assurance that he would work towards those ends.⁴¹ He did. So the Austrian army stayed until 1838. But the Roman ghetto stayed until 1848 when a democratic republic was proclaimed. It was the last of Europe's ghettos to fall. Of course Rome's touch of democracy was short-lived. French bayonets replaced the Austrian ones only a year later but at least the ghetto walls stayed breached.

Although the pope had shown that he could thumb his nose to an understanding with Carl, the Rothschild's ability to control Europe's exchange rates and to influence the stability of governments could not be disputed. When France was in the middle of another bout of revolutionary spirits the king gave them an almost absolute monopoly of state loan raising. Then, during the mid 1830s with the family's influence reaching a peak, Amschel Rothschild was secretary to the German Confederation of Frankfurt and was regarded as unofficial Treasurer to the Prussian government. Carl was said to be the unofficial overlord of the Italian peninsula and Salomon was the undisputed financial mainstay of the Hapsburg Austrian Empire. In fact the name Rothschild almost became synonymous with the title "Consul for Austria", with Nathan named as consul in London and James as consul-general in Paris.

However it was Nathan around whose entrepreneurial skill and political judgement the family had revolved for 24 years since Mayer's death. He was quick to recognize the opportunities resulting from the Industrial Revolution, in which Britain was still a clear generation ahead of the continental countries, and he moved swiftly to gain control of mineral resources whenever these were seen to be crucial to industrial growth. The Rio Tinto copper mines in Spain, Austrian silver, German ironworks, asphalt deposits in Yugoslavia and Le Nickel Penarroya all came under Rothschild control. Progressively a series of other major enterprises were sponsored or funded wholly or partly by the Rothschilds, including the Baku oil fields in Russia, uranium interests; Brinco of Newfoundland and possibly the most significant of all, the De Beers Consolidated Mines and Goldfields of South Africa Ltd which is intimately linked to the name Cecil Rhodes.⁴² With his capacity to determine almost at will where a major mining or industrial development would occur international competition for Nathan's favours was intense but sometimes the boot was on the other foot. Prince Metternich was outraged when he made a loan of six hundred thousand pounds Sterling to the Spanish Queen Regent as an inducement for her to grant him control of the Almaden mercury mines and, with it, a monopoly over all of Europe's supplies of the mineral. It strengthened her position in relation to the pretender, Don Carlos, whom Austria was financing in his run for the throne presumably with money borrowed through Salomon.

When Nathan died in August 1836 the stock markets of Europe slumped in a short-lived but very significant reaction. It was something akin to the well-orchestrated stock market shudders which every western country has experienced in the 1970s whenever a "leftish" government has replaced a conservative one or a pro-Arab government has replaced a pro-Israel one. The difference is that it was a spontaneous reaction because the hands of the most influential financier the world had known had slipped from the capitalist steering wheel just as it was being tugged at from all directions in a series of concerted challenges.

By that time the Rothschild empire had already given the world some excellent lessons in the conflicts of interest which unrestricted transnational financial and industrial operations cannot possibly avoid. It had also demonstrated the capacity for international financiers to manipulate the governments and the interests of people in sovereign countries. Its principals had learned well in their apprenticeship under the Elector William. But the powers of the world didn't want to learn. They were hell bent on taking full advantage of the rapid growth of capital for their own ends and they believed that by gradually refining the theory and practice of economic management they could always stay in front of any challengers, They need not negotiate while they held the whip handle.

Diversification of their interests across national boundaries had backfired on the Rothschilds from time to time and their reaction to each backfire led to still further personal and international complications. In 1833 when, after the first seventeen years of concerted Royal Navy action to close the Atlantic slave trade, the British parliament finally passed an act to emancipate all slaves in British territories and reached agreements with France, Holland, Spain and Brazil, the government was obliged to compensate slave owners for the loss of their units of productivity. It turned to Lionel Rothschild, successor to Nathan, who loaned twenty million pounds Sterling to finance the compensation payments. However a highly profitable slave trade continued in the United States which had changed its attitude and refused to discuss an antislavery treaty.⁴³ Slave labour was providing the basis for continued expansion of agricultural production and for the early stages of industrialization in light industries such as textiles, shoes and clocks.^{44 45} Britain was caught in a multi-pronged cleft stick. Its home-based capitalists and industrial employers wanted to see United States agricultural production increase to provide cheap cotton for Lancashire's mills, cheap tobacco for Bristol and cheap sugar and grain for everyone. Free trade became their catchcry. It was silly, they said, to refuse someone's cheap supplies just because they were produced by slave labour. (An interesting contrast to the argument used against cheap indentured Kanaka labour in Australia.) The navy patrols should be left to sink or swim by the ordinary commercial pressures of profit and loss, supply and demand, they said. Heavy losses which the navy was suffering added weight to their arguments.

A COMPENSATION PACKAGE

Of course the very same people wanted pressure put on the United States to avoid or prevent it becoming industrialized and competing on rapidly expanding world markets for factory-produced goods. Agreement for the USA to continue using slave labour would, they reasoned, delay its industrialization. They were right.⁴⁶ Drawn up in opposition to them was another strange alliance of convenience. There were the human rights activists, not necessarily churched Christians, who were concerned with the horror and human degradation of a higher death rate among slaves in transit than ever before. Disease, intolerable conditions, despair and cruelty all took their toll but added to them were the waves and the sharks as slaves were flung overboard, alive, to destroy the incriminating evidence whenever a British cruiser came in sight. There were the capitalists whose interests were mainly colonial and who claimed their enterprises were in danger because, in spite of the navy, slaves were reaching the New World in greater numbers than ever. Then there were the people with their eyes on Africa, opening up the Gold Coast and the Niger route, concerned that the native population was becoming so depleted that profitable production would be impossible.⁴⁷

The alliance, or at least realpolitik, won, with due credit and prominence given to the moral arguments, of course. The navy stayed at sea and from the mid 1830s interest in industrial and railway development in the United States sailed high with it. But the country didn't have a big supply of capital or a highly developed capital market. Foreign investment capital and loan funds were needed.⁴⁸ Naturally Rothschild was one of the first names to come to mind. The family either controlled or had raised finance towards several of Europe's key railways and in 1839 Lionel raised one of the first massive loans for industrial and railway development in the United States.⁴⁹ When the Civil War became imminent those funds appeared to be in danger and, unable to pull political strings to start and stop wars in the USA in the way that he could in Europe, Lionel intervened with loans for the anti abolition Confederate army. When it was defeated he lost heavily on both counts, a fact of minor importance compared with the complex effects of such foreign intervention in the war. But at least slavery in the United States was officially dead.

Abraham Lincoln ultimately signed a reciprocal search treaty with Britain in 1862. The civil war had been brewing for about thirty years but it was actually Lincoln's election as President in 1860/61 on an abolitionist platform that finally triggered it. Then, with the war threatening to reduce the nation to chaos, he aped Napoleon and used a proclamation of emancipation for slaves in the rebellious states as a means of undermining the Confederate war effort while he allowed slavery to remain legal in the non-rebellious slave states. Two years later, in 1865, and only a couple of months before the surrender of the Confederate army and his tragic assassination, he managed to steer through Congress an amendment to the constitution and a compromise bill which provided for compensation for slave owners.

Only Cuba remained as a major market for human beings. However its reunified and powerful neighbour was becoming belligerently self-righteous. It was no longer providing ships for the trade and it was jealous of a slave economy almost within hailing distance of its own ports. Added to that, the British navy was showing little respect for the Spanish flag, treaty or no treaty, and it was only a matter of time before the Spanish authorities also found it expedient to close the trade. Although the curtain did not finally come down on the recognized slave trade until 1929 when the last officially recorded slave caravan reached Mourzouk on the northern Sahara – within the memory of some readers – the Cuban trade ground to a halt with the Spanish legislation of 1869.

CHURCHES DIVIDED TO THE END

Even in the final act of the drama the church could not be uniformly proud of its role. Its fragments were being gloriously consistent with their inconsistency. Mainstream church leaders who actively campaigned against slavery were far outnumbered by those who either supported it or said nothing. The abolitionists usually came from the smaller denominations which were generally regarded as offbeat. From about 1761 the Society of Friends had excluded from its membership anyone who traded in slaves. Then, after the dynamic campaigning of the Wesleys, they were joined by the Methodists as the most consistent campaigners against the trade. In contrast, the Roman Catholic Church's official doctrine held that slavery as such was not necessarily evil and the majority of bishops opposed abolition in the Southern states quite forcibly at times during the Civil War. Several orders, chief among them the Jesuits, were large slave owners in Saint Domingue and Maryland. They might claim credit for being somewhat kinder task masters than most, but even pious references to Leviticus 25:44–46, widely quoted by Christians to justify slavery, cannot relieve them of condemnation.⁵⁰ The pro-abolition bishop of Nashville was forced to retire and the clergy of Baltimore Cathedral refused to read a prayer for the preservation of the Union.⁵¹

REFUGEES, GHETTOS AND RANSOMS

The flood of Irish Catholic refugees which reached the United States in the traumatic period of the five-year potato famine which began in 1845, largely with the aid of funds raised by the Rothschilds, compounded the crisis of the slave trade.⁵² The refugees came from oppressed rural working communities which had been pawns in Imperialist Britain's schemes of industrial and rural development. They enjoyed no voting rights or any other say in their own government. They had generally been denied any education except such forms of religious indoctrination which the authoritarian Catholic Church cared to offer in its attempts to keep them in religious subservience in much the same manner that the British government imposed political and social subservience.⁵³

That flood of Irish Catholic refugees merged with a flood of German Catholic refugees whose circumstances were similar except that they were escaping religious persecution as much as Europe's economic collapse. They arrived during a generation of hatred of foreign-born Catholics which had been fomented by Protestant elements. Convents and churches were burned and, in spite of the first amendment to the constitution, some of them had to suffer anti-Catholic state laws. They arrived hot on the heels of heavy slave-economy unemployment and joined a Catholic community with few priests, few schools or colleges, dominated by European orders, with its first bishop having been appointed only six years earlier and with a ghetto mentality developing rapidly.

With no understanding of the consequences and probably feeling that there could be little, if anything, more dehumanizing than their own condition, the Catholic migrants clamoured for Negro slavery to be maintained so that there was a group just one rung lower on the social scale.⁵⁴ The Catholic North American version of the ghetto had arrived. It was a consequence of the complex interplay of religious and political rivalries since the Reformation. It was based on and freely oozed the church's self-understanding and arrogant expectation of a miraculous return to a position of pre eminence through isolationism. It was soon to slide to even lower levels because of educational, political and theological blunders of appalling magnitude. At the same time, by rejecting the Southern slave population and by concentrating on buffering its European migrant adherents from the evils of Protestantism, it dug a deep gulf with heavy overtones of racism between itself and the even more depressed Negro community which would haunt it into the present era.

But there was another effect of the famine-induced mass migration which had not been anticipated. It was a shift in the demographic pattern and the political balance within the United States of America. Irish immigration, estimated at 2.5 million between 1800 and 1850, represented at least 12 percent of the total white population or 15 per cent of the fifty year increase but, allowing for a share of the natural increase during that period, the 'Irish origin' figure is more likely to have been between 20 and 25 percent during the critical period of the 1850s.^{55 56} In addition, newly arrived immigrants were seldom among the rural settlers who moved west. They stayed and sought work in the eastern cities and therefore had a greater impact in the urban areas than their numbers indicate. This was the basis of the North American Catholic ghetto attitude noted above and it also gave rise to 'the Catholic Irish voter factor.' In turn it provided the basis of the political influence of the Catholic bishops. However in 1858 President Buchanan was clearly under its influence when he met a delegation of Jewish leaders and, in turn, his refusal to respond to their request influenced the development of the Jewish community's structures for political and legal intervention.

We might be forgiven for wondering whether anything had really changed. Quite apart from its role in the slave trade which we have already noted, the Vatican had a thick file of decisions on slavery with which to demonstrate to the world its misunderstanding of humanity and the Gospels. A brief review of the record is all we need to confirm that the early shipments of African slaves to Europe was not the start of a new trade. It was simply a new phase. There was a substitution of slaves of another race for those of the home countries as well as an increase in the total supply of slave labour.

When white Europeans were being sold to the Muslims in Spain during the tenth and to North Africa from the twelfth to the sixteenth centuries Rome insisted that they should be either Jews or other non-Christians. But the profitability of the trade was high and as demand increased the merchants of Italy, Venice and Genoa took no notice and Christians were shipped in large numbers. Pope Clement V, reigning from Avignon between 1305 and 1314, excommunicated the Venetians en masse for ignoring him and selling Christians to the Infidels. Pope Martin V, 1417 to 1431, treated Genoese merchants at Caffa in much the same way with much the same response. Ten years later the laws of Genoese Gazaria expressly provided for the purchase and sale of both Christian and Muslim slaves. But long before that the Church had set up two orders for the purpose of ransoming Christians who had been bought by Muslims: the Trinitarians in 1198 and the Mercedarians in 1218. Does this suggest that there were two interpretations of baptism: one for Europeans and one for non-Europeans? The two orders claimed to have liberated over two million people – Europeans of course – in five hundred years. So why should the traders worry? They could not lose. Then, within a few years of the first voyage by Columbus, Isabella, acting with her full papal authority, consented to an order that only white slaves should be sent to the Americas so that, being Christians, they might convert and subdue their heathen Amerindian and Negro fellows already there. That order was soon allowed to lapse but a generation later licences were being granted for the sale of white women for use in brothels in the Caribbean. One such licence prohibited the sale of converted Muslims by specifying that the women must have been born in Castile and baptized as Christians before the age of ten. Such sales continued at least until 1692.⁵⁷

Possibly as a consequence of that trade, some Protestant missions and even the infant American government joined the two Catholic orders in the ransom business. Soon after independence the government signed treaties with both the Bey of Algiers and the King of Tripoli to formalize ransom arrangements. The Bey was to receive $US700,000 as an annual tribute to ensure the safety of Americans, (bribery came before gunboats in a simple demonstration of the scale of the operations at that time), but the king got only $50,000 and a hollow statement that “The Government of the United States is not in any sense founded on the Christian religion.”

CRISIS IN EDUCATION

By the time conflict over schooling policy in the young United States reached the stage of public controversy the American Civil War had erupted and the Vatican had locked itself into a position in which it could not or would not even set up a review of its historical development as the first stage towards doctrinal changes. This made it absolutely essential that it be able to run its own schools to avoid loss of adherents to Protestant denominations, to ensure continuity of its doctrinal “purity,” and to maintain its political authority in a rapidly evolving world community. The crisis was not restricted to any one country.

Before the Revolution made education in France a state responsibility it had been a public service entrusted to the church. Even though one of Napoleon’s Concordat concessions allowed clergy back into the schools to teach, the Vatican could see that its influence would continue to be eroded right across Europe and the USA through freedom of thought in the school room. When the pope's re-established Jesuit brainwashing teams were banned from France's schools in 1828 the issue was recognized as critical and it rapidly became exaggerated and emotive. The Catholic Church, defensive and divisive, campaigned vigorously for freedom of education. It found a ready supply of ammunition just across the channel where the establishment Protestant Church of England had thrown itself into its school building program with a vengeance, prompted by essentially the same motives: the political interests of its wealthy backers and the maintenance of its institutional influence.

The campaign was disastrously successful. Within a generation, in 1850 and under the influence of two years of rebellion across Europe, the Falloux Law was passed, allowing for the establishment of Catholic Secondary schools. Frédéric-Alfred-Pierre Falloux was President Louis-Napoléon Bonaparte's first minister of education and engineered the passage of the loi Falloux, under the guise of freedom of education in order to restore a great deal of the traditional influence of the Roman Catholic church. He later turned against Louis-Napoléon when he became emperor as Napoleon III but he continued to support monarchist and liberal Catholic causes.⁵⁸ In the first year over 250 new Catholic schools were opened. Within another generation there were more students in Catholic Secondary schools than in state schools and the church was campaigning to run its own universities again. A whirlwind of sectarian bitterness was unleashed which soon touched every aspect of European and colonial life. Then came the Syllabus of Errors and the pronouncement of papal infallibility which we shall come to shortly, and the Jesuits were expelled again, in 1880, under the new Republic. Two years later totally free elementary education was introduced and religious education in schools was banned, in order to reduce friction, but a midweek holiday was introduced so that parents could arrange, or accept, a day of extracurricular study under the auspices of the church of their choice. Much of the world followed suit.^{59 60}

During the early years of the schools controversy the concept of Christian Democracy was being developed in France just as in Italy. Its leaders, students of Lamennais such as Lacordaire, de Montalembert and Buchez, had a capacity to see how changes to the structures of government and social reform could be achieved within a framework of Gospel teaching by political action more clearly than the visionary genius who had been their inspiration.⁶¹ Their efforts suffered the same fate as that of the Catholic reformers in Italy and at the same time the Vatican tightened its hold on the French church. When Louis Napoleon was manoeuvring towards the Presidency in 1848 the Vatican openly supported him and in return secured his support for the reinstatement of the exiled pope and full authority to organize education as it saw fit. Being eager to gain the greatest political capital out of Napoleon's election, the Vatican turned more reactionary than ever.

Liberalism, freedom of thought and all ideas of democracy and republicanism were suppressed within the church and its schools became pools of religious and political reaction.⁶²

Miracles became the order of the day, faith and reason were said to be incompatible and Catholics were urged to wage war on all modern thought and philosophy.⁶³ It was as if the church was intent on forcing every thinking democrat to denounce it and to espouse the ideas of Karl Marx.

ENTER KARL MARX

Seven years earlier, in 1841, Marx had gained his doctorate in philosophy but because of his trenchant criticism of the religious institutions and attitudes holding sway in Germany, the churches made sure that he could not get a university teaching job. He turned to journalism and took to reading politics but his all embracing interest in economics was still some years away. His thinking was being conditioned by the rigid attitudes of the Prussian government which made political debate a dangerous pastime and by the close connection between religion and politics which combined to guarantee that any movement of religious criticism would quickly become secularized into one of political opposition.⁶⁴ He believed that religion was one of the main props of the oppressive Prussian state, that it had to be knocked away before any fundamental political change was possible and that it stood in the way of a cure for social evils.⁶⁵ But it was not until he moved to Paris in 1843 that he came under the influence of both the Socialist League of the Just and the French Christian Democrats.

Marx rejected fixed-form religion and in particular the revealed beliefs of both Jewish and Christian theism because of the practical consequences of their fixed doctrines and the attitudes which flowed from them. He does not seem to have taken much interest in the third partner in the Messianic triangle until his later years when Russia and Turkey were at war. It is interesting to ponder what his reaction might have been if he had been able to seriously study Muhammad in his student days. It is also interesting to ponder how his thinking might have varied if Charles Darwin had preceded him by a working generation instead of being his contemporary, older by nine years but later by eighteen years in publishing major works. He was in sympathy with the work of Darwin and identified a number of common threads in their thinking. He even sought the naturalist's approval to dedicate the second volume of Capital in his honour but Darwin refused. Apparently he feared a further backlash because of that common impression that it was unconcealed atheism.⁶⁶ But Marx had skated around the question of the Divine Creator. He generally avoided direct statements on this issue and he also generally avoided expressing the anti-Creator sentiments which the church consistently highlighted. He based his thinking in the overlapping streams of philosophy, science, politics and economics on the point at which man was an established being with a recognizable relationship to other things in the complex scheme of nature. He rejected as illusory attempts to begin any further back.

Marx wrote in 1845 that the first premise of all human history was the existence of living human individuals; that their physical constitution and consequent relation to the rest of nature was the first fact which had to be established; and that all consideration of history had to begin from a consideration of man and his natural conditions and surroundings and the way in which they had been modified by man in the course of that history. Marx went on to discuss the interaction of limitless influences in that understanding of history, concluding that “circumstances make men just as much as men make circumstances.” Failure to understand this led to “the antithesis between Nature and history”, and hence the belief that human nature can be known and understood independently of human history.

Men, he wrote, can be defined by their consciousness, by religion and by many other characteristics, but they first began to distinguish themselves from animals as soon as they began to produce their means of subsistence.⁶⁷ They are subsequently conditioned by the restricted development of their productive forces, and produce their political, legal, moral and religious ideas from the interaction of material and mental activity which is interwoven all around them. From this it follows that morality, metaphysics, religion and other social and political ideologies cannot retain their “appearance of autonomous existence.”⁶⁸ Rather, they reflect the partial and historically conditioned interests of particular groups, communities or classes. Each new class which aspires to a ruling position is compelled, in order to achieve its aims, to represent its interests as the interest of all members of society – or as ‘universal’, ‘timeless’ or ‘Natural’ truths. A new class therefore tends to appear at first not as a class but as a movement of the whole society because it is opposed to a particular existing class.⁶⁹ Failure to understand this led to a view of history in which only the political actions of princes and States had any influence; to all sorts of religious and theoretical struggles; and to the people of each historical epoch being forced to share (or act out) the illusion of that particular epoch that it is motivated by either “religious” or “political” considerations as if there are no others and as if there can be no variation in emphasis or understanding.⁷⁰

THE REAL CHALLENGE OF MARX' PHILOSOPHY

All in all Karl Marx philosophy was a major challenge to the belief in a fixed and final state of creation which churchmen and scientists had both clung to and which Darwin would not contradict until fourteen years later. It was also a major challenge to the supposedly fixed and final state of ‘timeless’ and ‘pure’ Church doctrine. It was no wonder the Church reacted with venom. But the barbs, or challenges, came thick and fast and Marx's ideas continued to develop in line with the philosophy of progress which he was trying to demonstrate. Within a few years of Darwin's Origins he wrote (concerning changing systems of production) that earlier systems of production are treated by the bourgeoisie, (professional, administrative and merchant middle classes), in much the same way that the Fathers of the Church treated pre-Christian religions.⁷¹ And in deriding the community's widespread reluctance to rethink long-standing ideas and systems he questioned whether members of society really knew any more about usury when their leaders said it contradicted eternal justice, equality, mutual interest and truth than the Fathers of the Church did when they said it was incompatible with eternal grace, faith and the will of God.⁷²

But though Marx's understanding may have led him to scorn religion and deride its role in society – with reasonable cause, if the bare facts of history should alone be taken as evidence – he was not the uncompromisingly Godless atheist conveniently portrayed by his critics. Professor R.C. Zaehner identifies the three main ingredients of religion – faith, a desire to 'belong', and a desire to 'escape' – and says that while Marxism may not be a religion, "all the ingredients of religion are there." He says, moreover, that "If by 'God' we understand not the God of Jewish, Christian, and Islamic revelation but the unchanging Being over and against all change, all mutability, must be seen, then the Marxist 'God' is the eternal law that governs matter, matter itself, seen as a whole, being the principle of unity and 'remaining eternally the same in all its transformations.'" Zaehner says that Engels was not much interested in what happens to the individual mind or soul at death and he found personal immortality 'tedious', but "the idea that the thinking mind, the highest evolute of matter, should forever be extinguished he found intolerable." He then quotes from Engels' Dialectics of Nature: "... Death is either the dissolution of the organic body, leaving nothing behind but the chemical constituents that formed its substance, or it leaves behind a vital principle, more or less the soul, that then survives all living organisms, not only human beings." And he adds: "... if matter is both indestructible and 'vital life-force' as Marx had already defined it, then this 'life-force' must survive as 'vital principle, more or less the soul ... "Marx and Engels' solution, Zaehner says, "is not to do away with religion but to do away with the social conditions which make it necessary." ⁷³

THE CHALLENGE OF JEWISH EMANCIPATION

Right across Europe the whole church, and not just the Vatican, was continuing to dabble in politics. The education question was only the tip of the iceberg. There was plenty of scope because new fronts were being opened up all the time. In the process, as it became more and more tangled in the affairs of the Middle East, Africa and Asia it also became more entangled in the affairs of its partners in the triangle. It didn't always find the circumstances to its liking. Unfortunately the emancipation of ghetto Jews, their new wealth and their considerable influence added a new dimension to Christian attitudes towards them. Jealousy. They were no longer just the fallen and rejected Jews of the church's misunderstanding who were condemned by God to perpetual punishment which, as exclusive agent for God, the church was perfectly happy to devise, provide in unrestricted measure and administer with that firmness of resolve which was supposed to characterize a Christian's faith. They were now highly successful competitors with a community of interest, a level of community cooperation, cultural cohesion, strength of faith and personal integrity which was the envy of the church at large. And now they seemed determined to antagonize the Protestant fragments by propping up the pre-Reformation fragment in spite of itself.

There were plenty of people to help the church impress on the world the "fact" that the whole world's ills were a consequence of the continued existence of Judaism and Jews. There were those Christians who accepted without question the church's view of itself. There were those for whom the church was a prop without which they were unable to face the realities of the world. There were those for whom the church's rites of baptism, confession, penance and indulgences were sponges to soak up whatever acts of inhumanity they cared to indulge in. But then there were also those who had no regard for the church at all, whose sole connection with it was through civil functions which the law placed in its hands to administer but who were perfectly happy to vent their spleen against an unwelcome competitor from the shelter of its umbrella.

Every bit of political or industrial trouble and every natural disaster provided an opportunity too good to miss to provoke an anti-Jewish riot or other outrage. For the working classes every example of capitalist excess or wage injustice became a part of the Jewish plot because a Rothschild, Oppenheimer, Pereire, Montefiore, Cohen or some other Jewish financier could be shown to be involved. On the other hand, for the Christian captains of industry and finance, every ripple of worker discontent or factory riot was equally a part of the Jewish plot because it could be linked to writers and social organizers like Marx.

Of course the church had to be in the act too and, in spite of the Vatican being propped up by Jewish money, every second effort to curtail ecclesiastical power was also linked with a Jewish plot. For one thing there was the direct and disproportionate involvement of Jews in the Garibaldi/Mazzini push to topple the papal states and to establish a Roman democratic republic. For another thing a fresh wave of Jewish reformation was sweeping Europe in the wake of Napoleon's unlocking of the ghettos. It was certainly stimulated by state financial support which was made available without discrimination to all religions, even including Judaism, from about 1830 in countries such as France, Holland and Belgium.⁷⁴ The Vatican was most unhappy about this.

In England the church was in another bind over money too. The Church of England did not take kindly to the dismantling of the long-running system of compulsory church rates in 1834, but several factors had combined to make it a political embarrassment. Nonconformist groups had gained wide public acceptance and were exercising more influence in the affairs of the nation than the national church. Catholic emancipation was becoming a reality. The rights of non-Christians were being pressed hard by Jews, largely because there were no other non-Christians to do it, and the government was becoming increasingly dependent, both directly and indirectly, on Jewish financiers for the support of major programs and the underwriting of its bonds. It was unrealistic to demand a property or income rate from such groups to maintain a national church with which they were in conflict.

The maxim that political stability comes from religious conformity had finally been laid to rest, but the politicians were still searching for a new one. Some of them thought they found it in "political stability comes from religious freedom and tolerance", but the mainstream churches were finding it rather unpalatable. The Reformation in Judaism was certainly being stimulated and helped along by factors such as these but it was mainly a spontaneous response to the new circumstances in which the Jews found themselves. When it was experienced within a Christian community this type of phenomenon was, according to the church, an influence of the Holy Spirit, but when it occurred within Judaism it was dastardly Jewish intrigue.

Picking up the work begun by Moses Mendelssohn just a couple of generations earlier, writers like Leopold Zunz set out to study Judaism as a science. Zunz had been irritated by Prussian government attempts to further isolate Jews and to show them to be a race apart by suppressing the use of local languages in Jewish services. New Jewish seminaries sprung up, beginning with one at Padua in 1829, and in Russia as well as in western Europe a new awareness of Jewish history inspired the people.

Napoleon had succeeded. Reformers, notably in Germany and England, discarded the long-held idea of a personal Messiah who would lead Jews into an era of Salvation. They preached a concept of the Mission of Israel which could only be accomplished through dispersion around the world. Samuel Holdheim preached that Judaism was completely divorced from race or nationality. Abraham Geiger developed that idea further and wrote of Judaism continuing to evolve, changing and renewing itself to match the circumstances of each succeeding generation. Jewish scholars and theologians had made a breakthrough of immense significance. It has been compared in importance with the work of Moses Maimonides six hundred years before. The new wave of scholars had realized – and they were prepared to admit – that their theology was neither absolute nor complete. Judaism, freed of the psychological bonds which had held it tightly, could now progress, continue to evolve, and play its part in leading mankind towards a clearer understanding of God. Towards salvation. It had taken a giant stride towards a new understanding of the Messianic message while the church was still tied down by those doctrinal chains of its own making. The Jewish community began to welcome and encourage converts again and in Germany some synagogues transferred the Sabbath from Saturday to Sunday.⁷⁵ The church didn't like it one little bit.

It was only to be expected that, as with previous reformations, whether in Judaism, Christianity or Islam, the effects would be mixed and that communities would divide over the issues, but there was a general modernizing of synagogue worship and liturgy coupled with a strong re-awakening of Jewish awareness. This was common throughout Europe and the Americas. It was also common in those Dutch settlements of Africa and Asia to which Jews had gone, via Amsterdam, after their expulsion from Spain and whose efforts had been an important factor in the development of the Dutch trading empire.⁷⁶

RUSSIAN SIEGE MENTALITY, AND EUROPE'S FALSE SENSE OF SECURITY

However the Western European fragments of the church were not alone in fearing this Jewish revival. In Russia in the second generation after both the partition of Poland and the incorporation of the Orthodox Church into the political machinery of the state the church suffered a dramatic drop in influence and support. It hadn't been much use to the people but now it wasn't much use to the Tsar either. Alexander I had already come under pressure from all sides. He suffered a backlash from the partition of Poland and he became fearful that the social, industrial and political changes sweeping Western Europe would sweep on and topple the Russian monarchy. This provided further encouragement for the belligerent Vatican to stick its fingers into Russian affairs. Alexander's successor, Nicholas I, therefore set about to once more isolate Russia from Rome and Western Europe. Reciprocal concessions which had been agreed with Rome were progressively dismantled and a buffer was to be strictly observed along the western border. That made necessary a tightening of controls over the Jewish communities which were thick along both sides of the border as well as in the Pale of Settlement. While their communications remained open and free movement was allowed the new enlightenment was still likely to come sweeping over the border.

The siege mentality took hold. Some six hundred regulations aimed at restricting Jewish rights were brought down in just thirty years under Nicholas, mainly linked to the New Jewish Statute of 1835, equal to all others between 1649 and 1881. The Pale of Settlement was reduced in area, increasing the population density in the remaining area alarmingly, and Jews were specifically expelled and excluded from a strip about fifty kilometers wide along the frontier. Synagogues were banned near churches; censorship was imposed; military conscription was extended to all male Jews from the age of eight years; taxes were imposed on meat slaughtered by Jewish custom and on Jewish religious candles but not on Christian ones; and Jews were again excluded from the public service.⁷⁷

But the lull of reactionary peace and unity which had gradually settled over Europe as the church, crowned heads and puppet princes of a dozen nations celebrated the departure of Napoleon Bonaparte was about to be well and truly shattered. Having tasted the fruits of the French Revolution people all over Europe were crying: "It failed. It's time for another one." In 1824, while a handful of Catholic thinkers led by Lamennais were trying to interest the church in the concept of Christian Democracy led by an enlightened papacy, the new French king, Charles X, set out to restore absolute monarchy through collaboration with a powerful but suitably compliant state church on the old Gallican model. He reduced the independence of the universities and the press and had one thousand million francs voted to compensate the nobility and religious orders for the chateau burnings and confiscations of the Revolution.

Lamennais blasted the monarchy for treating Christianity as an administrative instrument and not as the basis for the life of the nation. He wrote that being without faith, but being convinced of the need for some religion to strengthen its authority and ensure obedience, the government wanted to bring about a law which was considered divine and binding on all subjects with a church which commands the people but which is itself commanded by the government.⁷⁸ It was the response from the French hierarchy, and later from Pope Gregory XVI, already noted, which drove Lamennais against the papacy, against the monarchy and firmly into the socialist camp.

Six years later Paris erupted and Charles was replaced by Louis Philippe who managed to cling to his crown for eighteen traumatic years. During that time steamships developed from a frightening novelty to the accepted means of crossing the Atlantic; the Rothschilds and their competitors were building railways and provoking riots (and, later, civil wars)⁷⁹ in France, Austria, Italy, Prussia and progressively throughout Europe; and Europe began to overhaul the big technical and commercial lead which Britain had achieved in industrialization and mechanization. Great strides were being made in agriculture and medical science as well as in manufacturing technology. The new philosophy of education had already begun to release undreamed of human resources and mental capacity.

Again the church was in a bind. It was happy to claim the kudos for running schools, and the Vatican was again trying to wrest control of the university system back from the state in several countries, but all this scientific talk was causing uncertainty and undermining peoples' faith. It had to stop! Education was to enlighten the soul through literature, the arts, history and philosophy, provided of course that it didn't rock the boat. But the process couldn't be reversed. Those who were backing the church financially and politically had caught the thrill of the new approach to thinking and, besides, they could see a profit to be made from adapting scientific developments to their industries and commerce. If the church didn't like the new educational philosophy anymore then perhaps the state did have a role in education after all.

REBELLION IN THE AIR

The rumbles grew. At the same time population pressure continued to build up. Peasants crowded into towns looking for work and competing, (to the employers' advantage), for the jobs available in a host of new factories which were made possible by both new technology and new materials. Reshaping of the community into the classical two class system of employers and employees went on apace. In spite of general opposition from the churches, with notable exceptions such as the young Methodists, the industrial working class began to organize. At the same time the balance of economic and political power lurched heavily from the landed aristocracy to the new breed of industrial capitalists. Other groupings within the community tended to become blurred. Polarization increased and governments had to take the blame for everyone's troubles.

Those troubles included another round of disease epidemics as public hygiene broke down due to overcrowding and the inadequate capacity of sewerage systems.⁸⁰ Fortunately at least one dreaded virus disease, Smallpox, could be held in check due to those cursed scientific developments. In 1798 Edward Jenner had published his findings that inoculation of a human with cowpox gave protection against small pox. Now, as the Industrial Revolution was picking up pace, small pox vaccination, using refinements of Jenner's technique, was becoming an accepted fact of life. Accepted, that is, except for Roman Catholics. Countermanding a decision made under his predecessor, Pope Leo XII forbade smallpox vaccination. He couldn't understand it and it went against his theology of fatalistic acceptance of whatever, (within the inflexible confines of his understanding), God had made a part of man's environment. The resulting increase in misery and the death rate was of no consequence to him.⁸¹

Then it happened. Virtually every sizable city in Europe erupted in rebellion in quick succession in 1848. Not everyone was hell-bent on changing the system of government. All that most people wanted was food, work and dignity. And in any case the Vatican and the church at large were ramming down their throats that there was no other system. But in the wake of hunger and inflation prompted by shortages from the failure of two successive potato crops and the 1847 wheat crop as well, they could have neither food, work nor dignity. Soup kitchens became the common man's club where survival, the right to work and the need for changes in the control of supplies and markets were the main topics of debate.⁸² There had been trouble in Italy during 1847 but the rebellion really broke in Sicily on January 12th 1848. Within a matter of weeks the revolutionary spirit spread from there to Naples and on to Paris. The French National Guard sided with the rebellion. Louis Philippe abdicated in favour of his grandson and fled on February 24. Louis Napoleon lurked in the wings for a while, fomented crisis and staked his claim. Then he disappeared while the monarchy was pushed offstage and a Second Republic was proclaimed with a President still to be elected.

THE GAUNTLET: MARX' MANIFESTO

It was then, while Louis Napoleon, the Vatican and the capitalists of Europe were gloating over their reactionary alliance and the successful suppression of every reasonable human aspiration which the early stages of Europe's round of rebellions represented, that they all found the biggest gauntlet of the modern age thrown at their feet. It was Marx' Manifesto, written jointly with Engels and published at the beginning of March in a great rush. The little-known Communist League had asked Marx to write a declaration of principle for it for its first committee meeting in London two months earlier but he had not finished it. On January 26, with the smell of revolution thick in the air, the committee had sent him an ultimatum to finish it by February 1 or not at all. He just made it. The Manifesto was then rushed to a German printer in London and although it was late for the first round of rebellion in Paris it made the book stalls of Germany before the rolling revolution reached there.⁸³ The philosophy which would provide the basis for the government of well over half the people of the world in a mere four generations had been systematically spelled out. After having been arrested and expelled from Brussels Marx promptly returned to Paris to take up the post of director of the small central committee of the Communist League. As yet there was no Communist Party to really push the new political philosophy. In fact the League disbanded almost immediately without setting up a party and its members all went their own way to join in separate struggles right across Europe.

But the Reformed churches had become preoccupied with the Protestant work ethic and their moralist revivals which would soon have people tied up in introverted knots, while the Vatican was more interested in a more immediate challenge closer to home. They didn't stop to think. They just threw in their lot together to suppress that extra challenge. Garibaldi returned from exile in South America in April, only weeks after the manifesto was published, and, with Mazzini, he posed a real threat to the regime in Rome. The pope fled the city in November, after issuing dire threats against any Catholic who took part in any democratic institution, so Garibaldi and Mazzini moved in and set up a democratic government. Louis Napoleon became President of France in December. A few months later, with Pius still in exile, the writings of his former aide, Antonio Rosmini, were banned on the basis, it appears, that they could be read as a theological justification for democracy.⁸⁴ He may also have been too close to Mazzini's deeply religious but anti-Catholic nationalism. With a streak of Unitarian theology, Rosmini put the general welfare above race and religion and his writings soon provided inspiration for such diverse nationalists as the Welshman Lloyd George and Mahatma Gandhi of India who maintained that Orthodox Christianity was an "imperialist faith" which had "distorted the message of Jesus."^{85 86}

In fact, in the heat of the action in Europe both the Vatican and the Reformed churches found the social and economic writings of an Englishman, John Stuart Mill, much more palatable than those of either Marx or Rosmini, even though he also challenged some of the long-held assumptions about the right of privilege. Mill's formative years had been dominated by the austere and highly disciplined conduct and attitudes of his philosopher-economist father. Poets were regarded as enemies of truth; private affections were subordinated to public interest; and one's life style was to be built around the maxim "few acquaintances, fewer friends, no familiarities." However Mill gradually abandoned these ideas and adopted a more worldly view of human happiness. He focused on freedom of discussion, a hatred of sectarianism and an intense belief in justice. He exposed lapses in principle in parliament and the courts at every opportunity, and in his book on logic and the political economy published in 1843 he sought to show how all of the human sciences, including history, psychology, and sociology, were linked by causes in a way that they could all be explained. But then, shortly after Marx's Communist Manifesto was published, Mill's major work, Principles of Political Economy, was also published. He advocated peasant proprietorship as a remedy for the distresses and disorder in Ireland and then proceeded to a more thorough study of Socialist writers. He was convinced that the social question was as important as the political question. He refused to accept that property, devised originally to secure peace in a primitive society, was necessarily sacred as society moved into quite different stages of development. He separated questions of production and distribution and was not satisfied with a system of distribution which condemned the labouring classes to a cramped and wretched existence, in many cases to starvation. Although he did not come to a Socialist solution, he forced society and those who shaped it to take a fresh look at its foundations.⁸⁷

NO TIME TO PAUSE

From our point in time it is now quite clear that if the powers of the day, (being the church, the states and private capital), had been prepared to pause, to reassess what was happening and to adapt to the needs and aspirations of the community overall, the young revolutionary Communist movement would have faded away. Its purpose would have been achieved, not aborted, and Europe would have been living according to the basic tenets of the Gospel.

Unfortunately such was not to be. None of the three powers was about to concede any of its privileges or to review its relationships and preconceived ideas. In view of the treatment that had been meted out to both Lamennais and a British/American industrialist, Robert Owen, there was only a slim hope that, jointly, they would respond favourably to this new and total challenge.

Owen, the instigator of the 1819 Factories Act which first applied restraints on exploitation of factory labourers, had been rubbished as anti-Christian. The motive behind the attacks on him had been opposition to his active promotion of worker involvement in factory management and ownership which he applied in his own factories, but the reason given had been his criticism of the institutional church.⁸⁸ And as if the political and economic bonds between the three power groups were not enough to guarantee their joint attack on the Manifesto, Marx had continued his trenchant criticism of organized religion. He appears, quite naturally, to have been greatly influenced by his family's servile acquiescence in "conversion" from Judaism to Christianity and he contradicted the writings of earlier philosophers whom he had studied as he developed his own philosophy

In a critique of Hegel's philosophy he wrote that man makes religion and religion does not make man. It is his "self-consciousness and self-awareness" as long as he has not found his feet in the universe. Religion, he wrote, is the sigh of the oppressed creature, the sentiment of a heartless world and the soul of soulless conditions. Man, his state and his society, produce religion which is an inverted world consciousness because they are an inverted world. It is the opium of the people and its abolition is a demand for real happiness.⁸⁹

With growing support among revolutionaries for Marx' views the three power groups tightened their alliances. Quite clearly, they reasoned, if one went under they all went under. They wasted no time picking allies. It is probable that the prestigious name 'Napoleon' would have been enough to win Louis the post of President without outside help. However he left nothing to chance and with his reconciliation with the pope to support him he was swept into office in the plebiscite of December 1848.

In the meantime the revolutionary spirit had swept on across Europe. The northern regions of Italy and Hungary had joined battles with Austria which, although abortive at the time, brought Italy a step closer to unification. Vienna had risen, forcing Prince Metternich, the prime minister, into exile and gaining constitutional government for Austria. German unity had been achieved under a Frankfurt parliament only to be shattered almost immediately as the Poles, Prussia and Denmark each did their bit of boat rocking until Prussia eventually came out on top. The pope had even granted a constitution to the papal states in March 1848, under extreme pressure, but within a few months he had reneged on it. Thus he had gone into exile in November, prepared to ride out the storm until his newfound friend, Louis Napoleon, would be in a position to bring his French bayonets and put him back on his throne. Turmoil was the order of the day. Conflicting streams of nationalism, isolationism and socialism ebbed and flowed across Europe waiting to be dampened down by a supply of potatoes, jobs and a touch of dignity.

One of the revolutionaries who did his best to bring the rebellion to a head in Germany was among the foremost opera composers of all time, Richard Wagner. Fourteen years later he would have the young king Louis II of Bavaria, whose throne was among those he had sought to dismantle, as his patron and benefactor. But in 1848–49 Wagner wrote and distributed inflammatory leaflets, took an active part in the Dresden uprising, and was forced to flee when a warrant for his arrest was issued. Among his leaflets was the stridently anti-Semitic Judaism in Music, which he is said to have written under the influence of the philosopher Arthur Schopenhauer and in reaction to his early work being smothered by Jewish musicians and entrepreneurs who dominated music in Europe at the time. Many of Wagner's works carry themes or sub-themes of anti-Semitism, the best known being The Flying Dutchman and Siegfried, woven into a complex of German nationalism, international socialism, mysticism and a decidedly romanticized version of the Christian concept of redemption through love. It has been said that Wagner's anti-Semitism simply reflected the prevailing community attitudes in Germany at the time, but in his later years his works helped to rouse great animosity towards the Jews, especially after Bismarck signed a concordat with the Vatican and turned harshly against the Jewish community. The churches might not have liked Wagner's politics, but they were perfectly happy with his over-riding philosophy. Subsequently both Wagner's writings and music and Schopenhauer's anti-Semitic philosophy were also much admired by Hitler. They are regarded as among the source material for his own warped thinking. But that is looking ahead.

BUILDING GHETTOS IN THE NEW WORLD

Such was the situation in Europe and the issues swirling around the Vatican as the Catholic Church in the United States struggled to cope with its flood of Irish famine refugees. A poorly trained hierarchy busied itself with administration, real estate and construction of churches and schools rather than the people for whose benefit it was all supposed to be. Intellectual incompetence and rampant superstition enmeshed with its religious beliefs were the hallmarks of a church identified with socially and economically disadvantaged communities but holding the most reactionary and repressive political position.

As a community sub group Catholic workers had more need than most for organizations through which they could negotiate with employers and governments and they sympathized with radical labour movements. But the hierarchy feared that even non-socialist unions might wean workers away from the church and that recognition of them might alienate the church's financial and political backers. Liberty and licentiousness were said to go together. Workers were urged to acquire property and social standing through "economic virtue", or by any other means for that matter, and labour movements were condemned as "miserable associations."⁹⁰ The isolationist policies of the church, (with ecumenical activities, inter-communion and intermarriage all banned); its prohibition on Catholics taking part in democratic processes or industrial movements; the heavy burden of education costs which its adherents were expected to bear, and the pitifully inadequate standard of the education which was provided, all combined to make it difficult for Catholics to break the bonds of poverty or to compete as equals with the balance of the community.

The atmosphere of an un-walled ghetto became more marked as Catholics congregated around their schools, and interdenominational relations soon took on the character of Reformation Europe when The KnowNothing Party was set up. The party pushed for anti-Catholic legislation and provided a cover for hit-and-run harassment of Catholics so that anti-popey riots became commonplace in a number of centres.

THE SOUTH AMERICAN VERSION

But the situation in the United States must have seemed like a dream compared with life for the masses in South America which was rapidly becoming one immense Catholic ghetto. The process actually began as soon as Columbus began to lay out Hispaniola, but it really picked up steam when the Jesuits arrived in 1588. There can be no doubt that they sincerely believed that in totally reorganizing the lives of the Guarani Indians of the immense region of Paraguay, Uruguay, southern Brazil and northern Argentina they were improving their lot, reducing exploitation by the Spanish Conquistadores and steering them towards Salvation. However they knew little about what they were attempting. They were locking an entire population into exploitation and disaster and, above all, they were acting out the church's arrogant misunderstanding of itself and its role. So much so that they soon lost sight of their lofty purposes and assumed a role combining the characteristics of a kindergarten teacher, foreman-gaoler, priestly intercessor and profiteer.

Teams of Jesuits set up about thirty 'reductions' or mission towns. There were typically three or four thousand Guaranies in each, housed in three enormous barrack blocks which formed a square with the inevitable church. The population density and the availability of food and building materials before the Spanish and Portuguese arrived had not required a highly ordered life style but the Jesuits soon changed that. Regimentation replaced relaxation. The Guarani culture and life style was completely destroyed. Jesuit ritual and paraphernalia was substituted for the Indians' religious customs but their beliefs wouldn't disappear so quickly, so the Jesuits obliged with another round of syncretism.⁹¹ Enforced communal living replaced intimate family life. Long established systems of authority were simply crushed. The will of the Jesuits was paramount.

The Indians were herded in procession to the fields to the sound of music with a saintly effigy up front. Shrines, hymns and prayers interrupted the march at stated intervals. It wasn't considered important that no one understood what it was all about and that they continued to offer prayers to their recognized gods. They had been baptized en masse. Of course there was no need to teach them anything except a profitable craft and religious responses because, according to the Jesuits, they were childlike inferior beings who would never be capable of taking their place in a civilized European society. And besides that, education might make them subversive. But they provided a ready source of labour for "allocation" to the Spanish landowners and the reductions provided the first line of defence for the settlers against marauders.⁹²

They also provided an almost inexhaustible supply of slaves for Portuguese slave raiders who swooped down from Brazil either to supplement their own Indian and Negro slaves or to supply the lucrative North American market. No one seemed to mind if a few head disappear from time to time.⁹³ The Jesuit order grew immensely wealthy from the reductions. But it also became the object of intense jealousy among the settlers who were glad to add their complaints to the politicking in Europe and to see the order disbanded in 1767.

Unfortunately for the Indians, that was a case of out of the frying pan and into the fire. Many of them ended up in slavery, and many others as forced labour for settlers when the reduction system failed because of the incompetence of those appointed by the church to succeed the Jesuits. Some tried to return to their pre-Spanish community life style but they found it impossible to readjust after several generations and tragedy was often the result. In any case they were stuck in a situation of servile dejection which they were taught to regard and to accept as their only proper situation in life. The only thing they had to look forward to was life after death according to the fantastic formula of fear, penance, purgatory, retribution and (if the clergy saw fit), intercession which the church had strewn along the pathway to salvation.

The basic situation was little different anywhere in South America. The historical detail differed, together with the ratio of European adventurers to American Indians and African slaves and the attitude of the Europeans to intermarriage. This helped to determine, on a regional basis, whether or not harmony might be possible through assimilation.⁹⁴ But without exception it was the European minority in a reactionary inter-dependence with the Roman Catholic Church which rigidly controlled the land, productive capacity, the law, its administration and enforcement, and the exploitation of labour.

When independence came, fostered by British self-interest in the wake of the Napoleonic Wars, the people had not been prepared for representative government and authoritarian government by a few wealthy and powerful families in a position to grab power was inevitable. The Catholic Church, being the largest landowner throughout the entire Latin American region, was perfectly happy. Government by caudillos in an intimate community of interest with the church would certainly suit its local interests, but, glory be, it just happened to correspond with the theological line which the Vatican was peddling as well.⁹⁵ Then began the largest human migration in all history. The white population of Europe was increasing at a much faster rate than the population of the rest of the world. From about 22 percent of the total human population in 1800 it increased to about 35 percent in 1930, when the pattern changed dramatically. Between the time of the Irish famine of 1846 and the Great Depression over 50 million whites, almost all Christians, were scattered by the force of population pressure coupled with religious, political and economic conflict. And that mass movement had been made possible by technical developments which were also, in large measure, a response to those same factors.

CAUDILLOS AND THE CHURCH

The rate of migration during the first few decades has been assessed at about 377,000 per year and probably a quarter of that number set up home in South America.⁹⁶ Of those, the majority came from Italy and Spain. Some also came from England, Scotland and France and they were very often technically qualified bearers of capital funds to set up extractive or agricultural operations to supply the markets of Britain and France.⁹⁷ The caudillos and the Catholic Church must have been delighted. For the great majority of the people the immediate benefits of European-style employment were soon to be snuffed out by grinding misery. They became expendable units of labour in a system geared to profit a small local elite and its foreign capitalist cronies, to fill the bellies of Europe and to provide markets for the factories staffed by those bellies. That tight, closed circle led to the development of a series of export dependent, single-product economic regions and states which were subject to hiccups whenever a European capitalist or politician changed his friends or his enemies.^{98 99} But there was a second tight, closed circle as well.

The Catholic Church propped up the caudillos and the landowners propped up both the other two in return. At the same time they became increasingly dependent on foreign capitalists and heavy-handed military machines. Yes, it just had to happen. Those two tight, closed circles spawned a third. Exploitation of labour and corruption in government administration (which involved deals with foreign companies and the milking of government funds) went hand in hand with inadequate housing, health care, sanitation and education for the great majority of the people. These combined with high birth rates to produce misery, a mixture of discontent, fatalistic resignation and drug-like dependence on religious ritual. The whole lot led to further exploitation of labour and the continuation of the vicious circle. And the church was in it right up to the flicker of a candle. The scene was being set for a series of border and territorial wars over resources which were the direct consequence of the policy of making Latin America both export and import dependent on Europe. No serious effort was made to develop an integrated and self-sufficient Latin American economy. The strange alliances which propped up the caudillos just wouldn't allow it. It would have been contrary to their interests.

International borders took shape wherever the balance of greed and power between the caudillos dictated, with no concern for community of interest or pre-European ethnic considerations. In any case that had long since been swamped. Nitrate, tin, copper and oil each provided the motivation for territorial wars and the church's most productive intervention appears to have been aimed at avoiding the loss of its intimate relationship with each of the contending parties and at building religious fortifications on the mobile borders.

It does not seem to have occurred to the church in Latin America that its support for a nationally degrading system which would force its people to remain the exploited poor relations of the Western World would lead relentlessly towards mass alienation, reversion to pre-European religious systems, the embracing of alternative ideologies and bitter class struggles. Very few of its ill-trained clergy would have even heard of the name Marx. Nor does it seem to have occurred to the theologians and politicians of the Vatican as they continued their denigration and one-upmanship against their partners, the Jews and the Muslims, that they and the political and economic system which they were promoting would eventually force the people of Latin America into political and economic alliances with both the people of Islam and alternative ideologies. They certainly failed to see that under the impact of such alliances the whole Christian ship of state could founder. They were blinded by the same arrogant overconfidence in their presumed authority which had determined the course of Christian history since even before Constantine made his fateful bid for power with the aid of a celestial cross.

Thus, while Europe was wracked by rebellions, across the Atlantic, Americans of the USA were just gearing up for that special civil war of their own. They had already begun to flex their moralizing muscles when they warned Britain and Europe not to intervene west of the Atlantic any more by means of their Monroe Doctrine. It was not understood by the world at that stage that what the doctrine really meant was that the USA, a bustling young successor to the European heritage, wanted Latin America as its possession in much the same way that Europe once thought it had possessed America as well as Asia and Africa. Perhaps it wasn't understood by a lot of Americans either. The inspiration of their faith and the lustre of their independence had not yet been dulled by the accumulation of wealth and power.

In retrospect, those thirty years from Napoleon to Marx and the potato famine had turned out to be a very hectic period in mankind's struggle for communal and social evolution. The end of the second slave era was in sight even if it was in spite of the church rather than as a result of its efforts.

The Protestant work ethic had arrived to give new purpose and value to the life and work of the individual and to keep him in check, but papal efforts to cling to temporal power had deepened division and mistrust between Catholics and Protestants.

Latin America was achieving its independence but through its 'collaboration' in the process Britain had provided an amateurish guide to political interference in its affairs which the United States would follow in a much more sophisticated manner in the twentieth century. But Latin America was also set on course as the exploited poor relation of the Christian Western World and it was destined to eventually look beyond its Christian colleagues for survival and development alliances.

Absolute opposition to Napoleon's reforms among Europe's crowned heads had made possible the immense power of the Rothschild family which, in turn, had provided a springboard to Jewish emancipation. But it also firmly linked the Jewish community with power and privilege through its influence in the structures of Christian capitalism and through the propping up of the Vatican and the Papal states. And to add further dimensions it stimulated, firstly, a revival and reformation within Judaism and, secondly, repression of Jews on an ominous scale in a Russia which had been forced to revert to isolationism.

On the bright side, mass education had become a fact of European life, but not so much because it would be uplifting for humanity, but rather to prop up sectional political interests on both sides of the Reformation dividing line. And, in contradiction to the new approach to education, Catholic Christian Democracy was being harshly suppressed and the Vatican was hell-bent on imposing a ghetto mentality within its flock. We may well wonder what had happened to the Messianic message for mankind.

As the first half of the nineteenth century of the Christian Era gave way to the second half, the situation had a direct parallel in the situation when Constantine came to power and foisted Christianity onto the Roman Empire. In both cases the subject peoples had sighted the version of Christianity which they were expected to swallow. They had not spontaneously adopted it in place of their existing religious systems. They were simply going to be swamped with it by hook or by crook. There was also a parallel with the situation when the Roman Empire collapsed and again when Constantinople fell and Europe began to feel the squeeze. In each case the church had been given yet another chance to gain its political freedom, coupled with an unexpected opportunity to fulfill its responsibility by taking the Good News of the Gospel right around the world.

The years between the final collapse of the Holy Roman Empire and the beginning of massive European emigration had served to strengthen the position which Napoleon's sweep across Europe had forged. The nineteen hundred year old challenge had been reinforced. But at the same time the church had come abeam of the first of the two immense beacons which marked the climax of the long drawn out philosophical and scientific challenge to its doctrines and its self-understanding which had begun with Copernicus. The church had come face to face with the philosophy of Karl Marx. It was supremely confident. It had already repulsed many challenges. After all it was God's exclusive representative and it was endowed with absolute knowledge! Why should this challenge be any different to the others?

It was just as well that Judaism had begun a rethink and was on the way to a revival. The world had an urgent need for a safety valve. And while we have already taken a brief look at that revival in this chapter it was to become such an important factor in the trouble in the triangle that we must pause and look a little more closely at the early stages of revival and the reform movement within Judaism. In fact it bears remarkable similarities to the Reformation within Christianity and it was fraught with just as much dissent, and much internal bitterness, but there was no violence such as the burning of heretics and other dissenters.

JUDAISM: RENEWAL AND REFORM

There is a very definite sense in which Napoleon Bonaparte made possible both renewal and reform within Judaism when he threw open the ghetto gates and then threw away the keys, exposing the Jewish community to the outside world and enabling contact and interaction between Christians and Jews in a manner which had not been possible for many hundreds of years, but the early stirrings had already begun. Within four or five generations of Napoleon's Great Sanhedrin there would be three well established streams within Judaism superimposed over the long-established regional divisions of Sephardim and Ashkenazim. These earlier divisions had resulted from the response of Judaism to the Muslim environment in Spain in the case of the Sephardim, and to the repressive influence of Christianity in the Franco-German regions and, later, Poland and Eastern Europe in the case of the Ashkenazim. The new streams would be identified as Reform, Orthodox and Conservative Judaism but, they were all tinged with reforming zeal in their efforts to make the beliefs, liturgy and religious practices of their faith more relevant to contemporary society. They became rivals in their bids for influence within the Jewish community, especially in the United States and Germany, and they each developed their own religious and organizational identity although they were each responding to the same basic external pressures. The Orthodox stream has developed a reputation for vigorous support of Zionism and the consolidation of Jewish authority in Israel. The Reform stream adopted religious and social positions differing most radically from the traditional Judaism of Nineteenth Century Europe and is generally better known to Christians because of its greater openness and readiness to relate to and to work in cooperation with the Christian churches.

Unlike the Christian reformers who rebelled basically against the abuses of theology by the mainstream church, the Jewish reformers were concerned at the relationship between revelation, faith and the Jewish law, the practice of which had long dominated Jewish religious life. If the process of reform within Judaism can be traced to a single factor it may be the definitive codification of the Jewish law during the sixteenth century. Joseph Caro began work on a commentary of previous codes and their sources in 1522, five years after Luther posted his ninety five theses at Wittenberg, in an effort to simplify and standardize the interpretation of the Jewish law and it was published in 1542. Coincidentally Luther realized that his efforts to attract the Jewish community to Reformed Christianity had failed and he turned his wrath against it the following year. Two years later he wrote in anger to the Elector of Brandenburg when he re-admitted Jews who had previously been expelled. But while Caro's code may have had some influence in strengthening Jewish resolve against conversion it was soon attacked by Talmudic scholars such as the Rabbi of Friedberg, Hayyim ben Bezalel, who believed that the codification undermined the study of the Talmud and ignored differences between customs from one area to another.^{100 101}

During the next century or so the church-at-large continued to tear itself into more and more shreds as it struggled with issues of modernity, relevance and renewal, but the Jewish community was not expected to change with the tides of time. In the eyes of the same church-at-large its only relevance was to demonstrate by stagnation and declining numbers that it was no longer relevant. In its early history the church had adapted heathen practices (syncretism) as a mechanism to help it absorb whole new communities under its banner, but it conveniently forgot or denied that, even though Georg Calixtus and others were developing modified liturgies in the early years of the seventeenth century, drawing practices from each of the Catholic, Calvinist and Lutheran churches, in an effort to overcome some of the antagonism between them or even to re-unite them. The church had commandeered and simply used many heathen temples for Christian worship as it stormed through Europe under the imperial banners, and Synagogues in Spain had shown Muslim architectural influence for several centuries in the same way that many of those in central and eastern Europe were built after the style of Christian churches. However every move by the Jewish community to adapt Christian practices or to syncretise, whether in a bid to promote harmony with the church or simply to modernize its worship was met with opposition and derision and the church increased its anti-Semitic campaigns.

The use of organ music as an aid to worship, the Eternal Flame, and the lighting of candles in memorial services are all thought to have been adapted from Catholic practice for use in Synagogues during the seventeenth century. And just as the Christian reformers turned away from Latin to the vernacular for public prayer and for printing new prayer books, so Jewish reformers in Germany turned increasingly to Yiddish (Judeo-German) in place of Hebrew and then introduced high German. Long before that, Jews in Spain and in most Muslim countries had adopted the practice of washing their face, hands and feet before prayer in the manner of Muslims and Maimonides' son, Abraham, justified the practice on the basis that the Biblical instruction that 'You shall not follow their (non-biblical) customs' did not apply to Muslims. In fact Maimonides had personally ruled that Jews in Muslim regions should not use silent prayers of petition because the congregation's lack of attention when these were repeated aloud by the leader of the service gave Muslims the impression that Jews were not taking prayer seriously. Similarly, the prohibition of polygamy within the Eastern European Jewish communities is thought to have been adopted from Christian practice, because Jews in Muslim countries did not recognize it.¹⁰²

Such seventeenth century adaptations probably encouraged the return of Marranos to the Synagogue but in any case their return encouraged further adaptation and greater reliance on the Bible (because they had become accustomed to its use on its own) rather than the Talmud, and in either situation the church was not at all happy. The church still could not see that everything it did in order to strengthen its own position in relation to the Jewish community actually encouraged the strengthening of the ultimate cohesion of the Jewish community and helped to prepare the ground for Zionism and the trouble in the triangle. It did not matter whether it tried to suppress change to Jewish practices or encourage it; to encourage integration or prevent it; to utilize the personal or financial resources of the Jewish community or suppress their use; or to restrain or disperse that community. The end result was the same.

There were times when the church had legitimate reason for concern at trends within the Jewish community and their possible consequences, such as the upheaval which occurred when Shabbetai Zevi proclaimed himself messiah in 1665 and Shabbateanism grew around him. However it was not the church which resolved that crisis, it was the Muslim Sultan in Constantinople who gave Zevi two options: death or conversion to Islam. He converted to Islam. In any case that crisis was of greater concern to the Jewish community than to either Christians or Muslims and the divisions which it caused had a marked effect in stimulating other movements and the process of reform in Judaism. It coincided with a weakening of the Law as the primary bond uniting Jews and also with a widening gulf between Jews at opposite ends of the social scale. At one end of the scale the appointment of Jews as special advisers to national and regional rulers of Christian countries – the Court Jews – increased rapidly after the Thirty Years War. These people, leaders of their own religious communities, and their families were caught between the social freedom which was one of the benefits of their new-found influence, and the pomp and circumstance of their Baroque court culture on one hand, and their religious and leadership responsibilities to the tight-knit communities into which the church had forced them on the other hand. At the other end of the scale a breakdown in the traditional Jewish system of charitable support led to more people living in poverty, an increase in the number of Jewish beggars and a tendency for them to associate with non-Jews (and that meant Christians) in a life of crime and to neglect Jewish laws concerning diet, dress and culture.

THE RISE OF HASIDISM

In that environment the revivalist movement known as Hasidism was founded by Israel ben Eliezer (known as Baal Shem Tov or Besht) at Podolia in Poland about 1730. The movement adopted the mode of Middle Ages Hasidim – pious, elitist, saintly and sometimes spiritualist – with groups relating to any one of a number of charismatic leaders known as Zaddik (tzaddik). However it gradually coalesced, with a dominant group gathered around Besht, and the Zaddik or leader of each Hasidic community adopted the unofficial title 'Rebbe' which tended to identify him with the office of Rabbi while formally distinguishing between the two roles. Some were disciples of Besht. Others modelled their methods and conduct on his, and most of the communities soon adopted a dynastic court system with the role and authority of the Zaddik passing to sons or near relatives. When a Zaddik sent disciples to service neighbouring communities they often set up their own courts and large numbers of ordinary Jews were attracted to them by their apparent mystical authority. Their worship was centred on prayer rather than formal study of the Torah, and joy, humility, emotional responses and awe rather than fear of God. This posed a threat to the sober teaching of the Rabbis and undermined the authority of both the Rabbis personally and mainstream Rabbinical Judaism. But competition for authority and influence was really only a minor aspect of the opposition. There was seen to be a touch of messianism in the Hasidic response to a Zaddik, with the danger of heresy in its pantheistic understanding that 'all is in God', blurring the distinction between the holy and the profane, in contrast to the orthodox view that 'the whole earth is full of His glory.' Hasidism was said to be Shabbateanism in disguise. In particular, opponents of Hasidism rejected the concept of the Zaddik as an intermediary between God and man – the role claimed by much of the Christian church for its clergy – and the veneration of the Zaddik which, they claimed, bordered on idolatrous worship in some communities. As a result opposition to the movement grew. However, in spite of opposition it has been estimated that by about 1800 Hasidism, holding firmly to belief in saints as well as the all-pervading Divine Presence, and opposing Western mores and the learning of foreign languages, had “won over to its ranks almost half the [Jewish] communities of Eastern Europe.” Since then it has produced a very extensive literature which is studied together with the Bible, the Talmud and the Zohar. Its Rebbes are consulted on matters of business as well as family affairs and marriages, and its adherents eat from dishes tasted and blessed by them in the belief that they will receive material and spiritual blessings.¹⁰³ To outsiders, Hasidim are often recognized by their vigorous shoulder-clasping dances of joy, long locks and fur-trimmed hats.

MENDELSSOHN'S ALTERNATIVE APPROACH

The rise and eventual fall of Shabbateanism and the establishment of the more permanent movement of Hasidism were not the only developments which show the way in which the current of events in Europe was dragging Jews away from their faith, away from higher Jewish education, and into an environment in which they became more conscious of the burden of being Jewish. When Moses Mendelssohn published Jerusalem in 1783 (six years after discrimination against Jews was outlawed in New York and in the same year that the draft constitution for the United States of America prohibited all religious tests for public office) he was very conscious of these pressures. His call was not for reform of Jewish religious belief but for reform in the life of Jews and their relationship with the state. He believed that the human mind should not be constrained by ecclesiastical coercion and he urged the abolition of the power of excommunication in all religious communities. Concerning his own faith, Mendelssohn said that while religious offences had been punished in Israel the Torah was no longer a binding political document and Jews should only be forced to obey the laws of the states in which they lived.¹⁰⁴

During the previous twenty years, having received first prize for a paper on metaphysics from the Berlin Academy in 1763, Mendelssohn had attracted the admiration of a group of intellectuals who were establishing a movement known as ‘The Enlightenment’, or the Haskalah, with the aim of total emancipation or equal rights and education for Jews, and his writing soon provided the basis of the group’s philosophy and program. In 1769 a Swiss clergyman, Johann Caspar Lavater, sought to undermine Mendelssohn’s reputation by challenging him to prove the superiority of Judaism over Christianity, but in doing so he actually prompted Mendelssohn to devote his major effort to the Jewish Enlightenment and greatly stimulated the Haskalah movement.¹⁰⁵ Naftali Herz Wessely wrote what amounted to a manifesto for the movement; Mendelssohn published a German translation of the Pentateuch with a commentary by some of his colleagues; and devotees of the movement, known as Maskilim, opened the first school for Jews in Germany in 1778. Maimonides was the great hero of the Maskilim because of the nature of his expectation of the Messianic Age, and at first the majority of Rabbis supported the movement which spread rapidly to Galacia and Russia. However many swung against it when its influence led to secularism, desertion to Christianity, and support for Zionism after the 1880–81 pogroms in Russia as a means of solving the problems of Jews in a hostile environment.¹⁰⁶ The Prussian rescript of religious observance which was announced in 1792 was actually quite consistent with Mendelssohn's philosophy. However it weakened the authority of the rabbis and the Jewish religious laws which they administered, and the head of each family became responsible for whatever religious rituals the family would observe. It therefore had a major consequence which Mendelssohn had not anticipated. The Jewish community began to fragment because of that reduced rabbinical authority and there was deep disenchantment with continuing cooperation with governments.

Strong antagonism developed between the Haskalah and Hasidism movements and together with Elijah, the Gaon of Vilna, many Maskilim were among the strongest opponents of Hasidism. [The Gaon was an influential independent orthodox thinker who was opposed to philosophy being merged with theology and although he was claimed to be a supporter of Haskalah he refused to commit himself to that movement.] But there were contradictory ideas running through each of the movements and, according to Louis Jacobs, while religious motivation was rarely absent from the thinking of the Maskilim who were in reality "remote from secularism ... it is going too far to see the Haskalah as a religious movement."¹⁰⁷ Similarly: "After the Haskalah, there was no longer any need to argue that a Jew could be loyal to his religion without ignoring the values of Western Society. Zionism can be said to be a more Jewish version of the Haskalah and, of course, the State of Israel is a modern state in which the liberal values of the West are accepted without reservation."¹⁰⁸ However since the establishment of the State of Israel the ultra-Orthodox community has tended to revert to the attitudes of the pre-Haskalah days, supporting Hasidism, discouraging students from secular studies except for the purpose of earning a living, and encouraging only the study of the Torah 'for its own sake.'¹⁰⁹

In the same year that the Prussian rescript of religious observance was announced an unconventional rationalist who has been described as the first theoretician of Jewish religious reform, Saul Ascher, published Leviathan in which he disagreed with much of Mendelssohn's writing. Judaism, he said, is a religion of high principles, misunderstood by Christians, and not a theocratic polity or, as Mendelssohn put it, 'revealed legislation.' Ascher called for a reformation which would retain the dogmas which 'alone reflect its spirit and purpose' and bring contemporary adherents of Judaism 'spiritual satisfaction by binding them to belief in God without restricting their autonomy of will.' He appealed to Jews on the fringe of the community who were inclined to take the easy path out of repression by bowing to the state and the church and adopting Christianity to stay, to help reform 'the constitution of the religion', and to remain 'a people worthy of the Divine in all places and among all people.' However Ascher's appeal fell largely on deaf ears and the rabbinate remained loyal to the old constitution even though, under the rescript, they were gradually less able to enforce it. And even though governments wanted to weaken and limit Jewish religious authority they did not want to support or sponsor such a reformation because it may have invalidated some of their best arguments against removing restrictions on Jews.¹¹⁰ In fact a host of further restrictions were already in the wind and only a year after the Prussian rescript the second partition of Poland took place, the Russian Pale of Settlement was imposed and the third partition of Poland soon followed in 1795.

THE PARTITION OF POLAND

The progressive partition of Poland had begun as an exercise by Austria and Prussia in using other people's land as bargaining chips in a bid to buy off the perceived threat from Russia which was doing embarrassingly well in its expansionist land grab from Turkey, although, as we have seen, the Vatican had been stirring the pot in its bid to extend its influence as well. It continued when Poland rejected Russia's kind offer of protectorate status and omitted to make an alternative arrangement with either Austria or Prussia before doing so. It was completed when the Poles revolted in an effort to regain some of their lost territory.¹¹¹ But none of the parties quite understood the difficulties they would have in merging the complex social, religious and political structures of their slices of Poland into their existing structures. Poland was still special.

For two hundred years Poland's Jewish minority had been partly self governing under a series of legally recognized and chartered community councils which had substantial autonomy in social, economic and cultural matters under an oligarchy of wealthy and educated community leaders. These councils were subordinate to, but integrated into, the 'normal' Polish structures and the relationships were essentially cordial, with a degree of interdependence which reflected the flow of economic services, including credit and capital, from the Jewish communities to the ruling aristocracy. By the mid eighteenth century these community councils had been consolidated into two quite large units, the 'Council of the Four Lands' and the 'Council of the Land of Lithuania' and their responsibilities had grown to include collection of taxes, censorship, social and economic legislation and adjudication in disputes. But it was recognized that modernization of the system was necessary and that it should not be isolated from the regional and national structures in the way that it was. A program of reform began in 1739, continued with the appointment of Treasury Inspectors in 1753 and, in theory, was completed with the abolition of the councils in 1764. However such changes required time – as did the settlement of debts which the Council of the Four Lands had accumulated over a long period – and less formal structures were still in place at the time of the first partition grabs by Poland's three greedy neighbours. They each soon found that it was going to be harder to integrate their pieces of Poland and their additional Jewish communities into their existing structures than they had expected and they each adopted their own methods of accelerating the integration process. In spite of the long running prohibition against Jews entering Russia, Catherine II issued a declaration affirming the rights of Jews in the annexed territories. Maria-Theresa, in league with the pope, set about abolishing Jewish self-government in Austria and to ensure subordination to the central administration she introduced a government-appointed chief rabbi. Subsequently state schools for Jewish children and compulsory military service were also introduced. At the same time the government of what remained of Poland made further efforts at reform and modernization but it need not have wasted its effort. It was only a few years before the nation disappeared altogether in the circumstances noted above. Differences between the Jewish cultures in the three regions were slow to develop but they gradually became more pronounced, especially with the impact of the reforms in Judaism which were taking place in Prussia contrasting with the tight, oppressive control over the Russian sector which had become the Pale of Settlement.¹¹² At each stage of the partition the number of Jews who had to be integrated – or digested – together with the majority non-Jewish populations increased. The total number of Jews is estimated to have been about 800,000 by 1795 in a total population of between three and four million,^{113 114} most of whom were in the Eastern sector which was gained by Russia.

The remaining years before Napoleon assumed power in France saw a host of authors including Solomon Maimon and Lazarus Bendavid publish books and papers on the state of Judaism, the plight of the Jews, education for Jewish youth, and the need for either reform or retention of the status quo in both Europe and America, but a lot less practical action. As with the church, so with Judaism, Europe's religious divisions were perpetuated in the New World. Until 1795, (coincidentally the year of the final partition of Poland), every synagogue in the Americas had served all Jews, irrespective of whether their background was Sephardic or Ashkenazic, but that year a group of Ashkenazim set up a breakaway synagogue in Philadelphia and established a trend which soon became the norm. However the most noteworthy development was the establishment of the first Reform Synagogue, in Amsterdam, home to the largest single community of Jews in the world at that time. The establishment of that synagogue was a daring but short-lived attempt to adapt Jewish tradition to contemporary life. It was made possible by the full emancipation of the Jewish community in Batavia (Holland) which followed the Declaration of the Rights of Man and the emancipation of Jews in France and it was forced to close in 1808 after the restoration of the House of Orange.

RESPONSES TO THE GREAT SANHEDRIN

Napoleon's Great Sanhedrin in February-March 1807 stands as one of the great beacons along the rough passage to interfaith understanding, regardless of the spate of additional problems which it generated. The church remained determined to cling to its erroneous understanding of the relationship between Christianity and Judaism but the political environment had changed significantly and Jews everywhere were able to hold their heads high as equals with their neighbours when they debated the future course of their faith and their institutions. There was little discussion of religious reform at the Great Sanhedrin because the French officials who organized it, and Napoleon, were interested only in conformity and stability, not the finer points of religion. A year after the Sanhedrin a decree was issued establishing a Central Jewish Consistory for France with both rabbinical and lay members, along the lines of that under which the Protestant Church in France was administered, to supervise and modernize the affairs of the Jewish community. That body proved to be rather conservative and the modernization in France was therefore basically organizational. However another Consistory was set up in the same year for the Jews living in the French-controlled Kingdom of Westphalia when Jerome Bonaparte took control of it, and there the debate on religious reform soon became more vigorous and led, in due course, to the formal organization of the three divisions – Reform, Orthodox and Conservative – already noted.¹¹⁵

A Court Jew who was able to accumulate both wealth and influence in the service of the Duke of Brunswick, Israel Jacobson, was appointed head of the consistory and soon assumed the role of leader of an informal Reform Movement as well. A layman without formal rabbinical training, he was accorded the status of a rabbi and gathered notable thinkers around him as he sought to continue the work which Mendelssohn had begun and to dismantle the remaining constraints under which Jews had to live and work. He proposed the establishment of a Supreme Council for Jewry, based in France, but this was not agreed to, and, although all citizens were equal before the law under Westphalia's new constitution, the Jewish consistory remained subject to the Christian consistory. In 1809 it issued orders for the conduct of rabbis and services of worship and with these began a program of reform which continued for several years. Naturally these evoked some controversy, especially when they affected arrangements for the Passover, and as a result Rabbi Menahem Mendel Steinhardt, a member of the consistory, published a brief work, Words of a Letter, in 1812 which is regarded as the first attempt to provide a substantial legal and general justification for a program of modern reforms to Judaism. Responding to the question of why authorities in earlier generations had not attempted such reforms Steinhardt wrote that "our ancestors left us an opportunity to show our own abilities, ... (and they) were fearful that their rivals would mock them, ... but we, members of the consistory, because of the cry of the poor and of the Jewish soldiers, are not concerned on account of the scoffers and gossip mongers among our people."¹¹⁶

A journal, Sulamith, edited by two teachers of Judaism in Dessau, David Frankel and Joseph Wolf, became the literary voice of the Westphalia Consistory and carried what Meyer describes as "a popular and relatively coherent ideology of religious reform." They maintained the perspective that "being religious in a universal sense was what mattered most, not the divisions imposed by a particularizing history and conflicting traditions" and they often discussed religion in general without reference to either Judaism or Christianity. They published a view somewhat along the lines of the German philosopher Professor Immanuel Kant who has been described as the German philosopher who had by far the most widespread and lasting influence on modern Jewish thinkers,¹¹⁷ that the role of religious education was to enable children to realize on their own that "there is only one true religion as there is only one humanity and one God, and that all religions are but forms of it."¹¹⁸

Kant was born into and educated within a pietistic Lutheran environment in Prussia, studied both science and philosophy, and capped his teaching career with his appointment in 1770 as professor of logic and metaphysics at Konigsberg, the university at which he had gained his masters degree. His beliefs and teachings did not correspond fully with either Christianity or

Judaism, proving to be both an embarrassment and a source of ammunition for both faiths. He rejected Christian dogma and in particular the innate corruption of man, and undermined the church's teaching on the need for faith in things unprovable, teaching that all knowledge required a component derived from nature and is the result of synthesis between an intellectual act and what is presented to the mind from without. Put another way, he insisted that religious faith begins with action rather than atonement. Cause and effect relationships are not learned from our own experience but provide a basis on which we can make sense of our experience and of the world, he said, and some of the properties which we observe in other things are due to our own nature rather than the objects which we are observing. Applying this line of reasoning to our understanding of God, Kant said that traditional proofs of God were invalid. The human conscience assures a person of truths which reason is not able to establish, he said. A sense of responsibility or duty assures us of freedom, and belief in freedom can lead to belief in immortality and a Divine Being. Religion is the recognition of our responsibilities as divine commands. He discounted mystical experience as irrelevant, said that there is no need for a personal redeemer or a Saviour, or the historical tradition of Christianity, and that all that was required to be religious was to be moral. But put against that, he described Judaism as basically "a collection of mere statutory laws upon which was established a political organization."¹¹⁹ At the political level Kant advocated a world system based on free states.

Kant stayed essentially within the framework of theism and it is probably for that reason that his prolific writings did not raise the same level of antagonism from the church and the ruling elite as those of Karl Marx a couple of generations later. Kant (1724–1804) developed a philosophical approach and a world view significantly different to those which had prevailed for a long time, especially in the field of alternatives to the triangle of messianic religions. In doing so he provided a base for the thinking of Jewish reformers who placed divine commandment above salvation resulting from faith and other philosophers of the nineteenth and twentieth centuries, including Hegel (1770–1831), whose work in turn had a big influence on Marx (1818–1883). He therefore actually represents a challenge to the church of a similar magnitude to those of Marx and Darwin and it is no wonder that he was in trouble with the Prussian authorities in 1792, the year of the rescript of religious observance.^{120 121 122 123}

THE CONSISTORY

But our interest at the moment is in Jacobson and the consistory. In 1801 he had shown that he was far ahead of prevailing thinking when he opened an agricultural school in Seesen for poor Jewish boys and then, in a gesture of goodwill and cooperation, admitted Christian students as well two years later. In 1809 he introduced confirmation classes for Jewish youth patterned on the established Christian system with both religious and educational aims. Such classes had been introduced elsewhere six years earlier, but the consistory made them a responsibility of rabbis, requiring dialogue between the rabbi and his students on the basis of questions and answers and requiring a confirmand to recite Maimonides' Thirteen Articles of faith. This raised objections from many traditionalists because it touched on the questions of how the new confirmation ceremony related to a young Jew's Bar Mitzvah and what defines a Jew. Unlike a Christian, a Jew did not become a Jew by learning religious doctrines.

A school was opened in Cassel the same year, with the German language being used for some purposes, and a seminary for the training of rabbis and a temple were opened in Seesen the following year. The term 'temple' was chosen to reflect continuity with the tradition of King Solomon's Temple and the universality of worship, it incorporated some aspects of Christian church design, and organ and choral music, prayers in German and regular sermons were planned to make a definite social statement that Jews worship as do Christians. As a result the Brunswick authorities required the scale of the building to be reduced and the planned dome and bell tower to be deleted so that a mere Jewish synagogue would not be seen as more impressive than a Christian church. On the other hand the Reform Movement received a boost when an edict was issued in 1812 granting all Jews outside the Prussian capital equal rights with Christians except in appointment to state offices. However the Westphalian adventure in modernization of Judaism and interfaith cooperation came to an abrupt end in 1813 with the collapse of the kingdom following Napoleon's demise. The authority of the consistory and state funds were withdrawn, the leading rabbis were scattered to other parts of the country, and the seminary was closed. More German-speaking Jews took the easy path to retain their new social status by converting to Christianity and demonstrating their national allegiance by joining the German War of Liberation from France – the country which, under Napoleon, had brought about their emancipation. And efforts to reform Judaism as a national entity came to an end. The Reformers also had to change their emphasis to encourage change at the level of individual communities.¹²⁴

In the meantime the situation had become massively confused for the Jews further east because in 1807, when Russia made an error of judgement, attacked Napoleon's Grand Coalition Army and suffered defeat, the victor reversed the partitions of Poland and re-established the nation as a French protectorate, the Duchy of Warsaw, governed by the Elector of Saxony as its Grand Duke. But alas, semi-independence was to be short lived. It was Napoleon's turn to make an error of judgement and to pursue the Russians to his crushing defeat and exile, and in a case of winner take (almost) all, the Poles again lost their independence and the country was absorbed by Russia in 1813. The Vatican's aims had been thwarted again and the papacy would have to wait for quite some time before it could add another jewel to its crown.

ANOTHER ROUND OF REFORMS

In Berlin one of the city's most influential Jews, David Friedlander, had pressed for some years for more far-reaching reforms than either Mendelssohn had proposed or Jacobson had been able to implement. He gained some community support for a program of radically reformed services but there was strong opposition from the traditionalists and the matter became deeply divisive during the Franco-German War. Being unhappy with some of the compromises which were necessary to accommodate the divergent views and knowing that his controversial position made it impossible for him to exercise community leadership, he therefore withdrew from Jewish affairs for a time and no change occurred. However when hostilities ended in 1814 some of the reformers, styling themselves the Society of Friends and prompted by the arrival in the city of Israel Jacobson, sought approval for the conduct of a service with men and women sitting together for worship, a sermon and some psalms sung in German. As they may have expected, the rabbis and wardens refused permission for the use of the synagogue and the group planned to conduct its services in its own meeting place outside the authority of the formal Jewish community. Jacobson's home was used for some time until the number attending reached 400, when Jacob Herz Beer made modifications to his larger home to accommodate the crowds.

Although the traditionalists condemned the unorthodox services they did not try to stop them, but the matter soon came to the attention of the Prussian king, Frederick William III, who ordered them closed out of fear that they may attract Christians away from the church and cause further disruption. This forced the reformers and the traditionalists to negotiate over the use of the common synagogue for modified and greatly enlarged services, and when it was found that substantial renovations would be required the king approved the continued use of the Beer home until the work was completed. The matter was not resolved. The community split into two separate congregations and services were held in the Beer home for six years. Major changes were made in the structure of worship, with innovations in the use of language and the introduction of a new prayer book. References to a messiah or a personal Redeemer were replaced by impersonal references to "redemption", while the prayer of petition for the ingathering of Israel from the four corners of the earth and the re-establishment of the kingdom in its land was omitted. These changes naturally lead to increased pressure on the group and in 1818 it published a series of commissioned responsa to justify its actions and its modernized liturgy.

The following year, a group of young university graduates who had been supported in their studies by Beer, Friedlander, Jacobson and other wealthy Jews, and who were mostly involved with the new congregation, decided to put the study of Jewish culture onto a more structured, academic basis and to give expression to Jewish religious consciousness in the light of Hegel's philosophical principles which they had studied. They established a Society for Culture and the Scientific Study of the Jews, they looked for a more principled and consistent program of liturgical reform, they showed intolerance towards the compromises which had been made and towards hypocrisy and a lack of true religiosity, but they continued to collaborate with their benefactors for some time.

While the parent congregation had tolerated the break-away congregation and the Society, when plans were made to conduct similar services in centres beyond Berlin, starting with Breslau in January 1821, the traditionalists decided it was time to intervene and a government courier arrived from Berlin with an order prohibiting the service at the last minute. Later that year Frederick William III issued a further order prohibiting Christian clergy and public officials from attending Jewish ceremonies in case their participation “detracted from the status of Christianity and lead to an undesired rapprochement with Judaism.” A year later he sanctioned the establishment of the Berlin Society for the Propagation of Christianity among the Jews which the Minister for the Interior praised for providing “the only true religious improvement of the Jews” in the face of reforms which threatened to make them “even more dangerous to civil society than they were before.” The Beer home temple was then closed by government order in September 1823. However in the meantime reformers had become active in the Free City of Hamburg, drawing up a statute for The New Israelite Temple Association in Hamburg in December 1817 and opening a temple with ‘preachers’ and not rabbis in October 1818, and this soon became the new centre of gravity for the Reform Movement.¹²⁵

The Hamburg Temple also became the centre of controversy as the prospect of real emancipation in Europe raised questions about the traditional understanding of messianism and the return to Zion. Professor Michael A. Meyer says that: “Without question the omission and alteration of certain liturgical passages dealing with the messianic return to Zion was the most audacious innovation of the Hamburg reformers. It cast doubt on a central principle of Jewish faith firmly grounded in all layers of Jewish tradition. To deny hope of Israel’s reconstitution as a nation on its own soil and the rebuilding of the temple, it was felt, amounted to a denial of Judaism itself.”¹²⁶

Messianism was at the heart of both the relationship between Christianity and Judaism, and claims of conflict of interest and disloyalty to the countries in which Jews lived. It constantly raised the issue of exclusivism and the expectation that God would eventually exalt Israel above all the other nations. When emancipation in Europe, or the anticipation of it, made unnecessary or undermined the desire to return to Palestine it required the Jews to either reject messianism or to reach a new understanding of their fundamental religious belief. Judaism was thus in exactly the same bind over the question of messianism as was the church because of its self-understanding based on its different interpretation of messianism. No Jewish theologian could reject the concept completely or Judaism would be no more than a system of laws and morality based on historical experience and mystical intuition. But Kant’s view that belief in a personal messiah was not necessary to the acceptance of a divine plan was attractive, so the trend towards a belief in corporate messianism gathered momentum while some traditionalists sought to show that there was no conflict between an eventual return to Zion and love and loyalty towards the countries in which they lived or their rulers.

On the other hand Lowenstamm was one who stressed the universal nature of the Jewish vision. The messiah, he said, would bring peace to all the nations and his coming would be a blessing to all humanity. He turned to Christian and Muslim belief in a messiah to support his interpretation, simply noting that they were wrong in their belief that the messiah had already come, and he said the Jewish reformers lost all human credibility by substituting acceptance of European emancipation for messianic hope. However the messiah and redemption could come only by God’s will and at a time determined by God, he said, and Jews were not permitted to try to initiate the redemption or the return to Zion. On that basis Jewish messianic hope required political patience and no disloyalty or efforts to overthrow established institutions or systems of government. The debate between traditionalists and reformers became intense but there was no turning back. The reformers had developed a strong base in Hamburg and a competitive institution. The process of reform in Judaism bears a remarkable similarity to the pattern of dispute around Christian reform but there was one thing lacking. The violence. The Jewish traditionalists did not try to send their dissenters to the stake.¹²⁷

But now, still in the first generation of the nineteenth century, while its reformers were even seen as a threat to the church which again required state intervention, Judaism had to cope with a different challenge from within its own household. The writings of the seventeenth century Dutch Jewish philosopher Baruch Spinoza, who had been excommunicated from his community for his views, had been a primary source for Kant's thinking. As a result they had gained a new burst of popularity from which the church was eager to gain maximum advantage, especially as some of them had also gained a degree of acceptance among Jewish thinkers. Spinoza's assessment of traditional Judaism was so brutal as to portray it as almost irrelevant. Like the church, he saw Jesus' role in revelation as far more important than the Hebrew prophets. Christ was not so much a prophet as the mouthpiece of God with whom he communed mind-to-mind. Judaism was exclusivist, concerned mainly with material needs, and may have emasculated the minds of its adherents, while Christianity alone was universalistic and spiritual. A task for both mainstream Jewish writers and the reformers was therefore to counter the influence of Spinoza, Kant, Lessing and others who saw Judaism as simply a stage in religious development which would give way ultimately to one universal, rational and moral faith. Among those who rose to the challenge were Steinheim, Formstecher and Hirsch.¹²⁸

Steinheim, a strong believer in supernatural revelation, said that revelation does not simply reinforce what is already latent in the human spirit or gained from external experience and reason, but demands a complete transformation of the inner person or a spiritual rebirth. He showed some sympathy for ritual reform but he disputed the theology of other reformers and maintained that Judaism not only preceded Christianity but would also succeed it and win the struggle with paganism because it preserved original revelation in pure, unadulterated and pristine form.¹²⁹

In contrast to that, Formstecher saw the development of Judaism in terms of progressive revelation beginning with the Biblical prophets who were enabled by God to bring the unconscious content of their spirit forward to the level of practical awareness. He saw Christianity and Islam as agents of Judaism which it had sent into the pagan world as missionary faiths to provide continuing influence on universal human spiritual development. It logically followed, in his thinking, that paganism was a declining threat, that separation of the Jews was no longer appropriate intellectually, that it would cease to be appropriate politically once full emancipation had been achieved, and that beyond Judaism would be a completely universal faith rising above historical Judaism.¹³⁰

Hirsch, the third of the trio, saw Mendelssohn as standing at the beginning of a period in which German Jews were determined to acquire the culture of their age, and he was determined to show that Judaism, uninhibited by other associations, was the hub of religious philosophy. He rejected the idea that the God of Judaism, unlike the God of Christianity, is not directly involved in human history, and he maintained that in human relations with God, Judaism required neither the mediation of a priestly institution as in Catholicism, nor of scripture, as in Protestantism. Jesus, he said, stands within Judaism like Abraham and represents an ideal for humanity. Miracles and prophecy together demonstrate divine sovereignty and Sinai represented the ultimate revelation since it brought together miracle and prophecy. However revelation continued providentially until Israel, learning to imitate God as the model of freedom, had become fully aware of its destiny. That destiny, Hirsch said, involved untold suffering either as “divine chastisement” on account of Jews who failed in their responsibility to show the world that no one need sin, or to demonstrate that virtuous conduct, even under duress, was possible without supernatural grace. But Hirsch did not share Formstecher’s optimism for the future. Hatred of the Jews lay dormant, he said, and he was concerned that they had not remained loyal to their calling as a spiritual nationality rather than a denomination and resisted the temptation to assimilate. When the distant messianic age arrived Israel and all nations would be united in a single religion of human freedom and while sin would remain a possibility no one would chose it. Israel would, Hirsch believed, be brought to Jerusalem by the nations of the world, not to establish a state but to put into effect the Jewish national ritual as a symbol of its vocation. Judaism would be united with humanity in word and deed but it would remain particular in its mode of religious practice.¹³¹

Debate raged on. The reformers gained confidence So much so that in 1832 Rabbi Abraham Geiger, who had become the leader of the Reform Movement, even expressed the view that the dogmatic structures of the church would collapse and that a new faith more in accord with modern philosophy would rise from the ruins. Three years later the churches’ sense of insecurity because of internal discord became even more apparent when David Strauss published an attack on the validity of the Gospels. He described them as myths concocted to make Old Testament prophesies apply to Jesus in order to demonstrate historical continuity with Judaism which was thus succeeded by Christianity. Reform Rabbinical Conferences were organized, the first being held at Wiesbaden in 1837, and with the younger more highly trained Reform rabbis able to provide a new kind of spiritual leadership, more synagogues came under their influence progressively across central Europe. Both the church and the state authorities were concerned at the overall growing influence of the emancipated Jewish community and their inability to contain it, even if it was divided, and in 1842 Frederick William IV planned to reimpose separate corporate status on the Jewish community in Prussia. This would have meant re-establishing the ghettos complete with rabbinical courts with their power of excommunication in a bid to regain conformity and stability.

THE CRISES OF ACCULTURATION

However, concurrent with the growth of the Reform Movement, acculturation had become an increasing problem for the Jewish community. Historically the drift across the boundary of faith from Judaism to Christianity had been the result of coercion and repression orchestrated by the church. But in the age of emancipation when logic might suggest that the drift would stop, it continued. Jews on the fringe of the religious community and with little commitment to Talmudic teaching or discipline, especially those with higher education who were in social and professional contact with the privileged Christian classes, had become so Germanized or Europeanized that they became ambivalent towards their Jewish origins and ancestral loyalty. They found it easy and convenient to slip across the boundary into either nominal or practicing Christianity. Because the reformers had deliberately modernized their services of worship and encouraged fraternal goodwill and contact, their camp was affected more by the drift from acculturation than that of the traditionalists.

But in addition to those who crossed over there were others who, caught in the cross currents of growing anti-religious feeling or continuing anti-Jewish sentiment, rebelled against the constraints of their Jewishness and their career opportunities which remained restricted because of continuing discrimination. Small but significant numbers of men in these situations gathered to exert pressure for more and faster reforms and in Frankfurt an association calling itself Friends of Reform was set up. It drew little support from the established Reform Movement – in fact we are told that most Reform leaders attacked it severely – and it was short lived, but it left its mark by trying to substitute an alternative ritual for the practice of circumcision and by circulating a brief statement of principles which caused dissent in other areas as well. The statement had three clauses. The first recognized in 'Mosaism' (the term Judaism was not used) the possibility of an unlimited further development. The second noted that 'the collection called the Talmud', rabbinic writings and Judaic statutes 'possess no binding force for us either in dogma or in practice.' The third touched the very sensitive issues of Messianism and Zionism. "We neither expect nor desire a messiah who is to lead the Israelites back to the land of Palestine; we recognize no fatherland other than that to which we belong by birth or civil status."¹³²

These developments coincided with and, in all probability, helped to provoke the moves to reimpose ghetto status, but they also stimulated efforts by academics such as Sigismund Stern to explore ways in which reformed Judaism could be recognized as a living limb of the organized state with world historical existence alongside Christianity. In March 1845 a small group, which soon grew to over 300 people and assumed national aspirations with the title The Association for Reform in Judaism, signed 'an Appeal to our German Coreligionists' for support for a synod which would give form and substance to 'a new Judaism.' They said: "We want faith; we want positive religion; we want Judaism." For several years the association's influence spread and related groups adopted reform services in several centres, but it was distracted and, in a sense, swamped by the revolutionary events of 1848. The Prussian authorities tolerated it but refused to grant it independent status. Its rabbinical leadership changed, Rabbi Samuel Holdheim opposed the idea of a national synod and in 1850 the association became simply The Jewish Reform Congregation of Berlin.¹³³

Outside of Prussia the speed of Jewish emancipation and the influence of the Reform Movement varied greatly. In Austria, where the monarchy, in league with the church, was intent on assimilation and fearful of the modernization of Jewish services, there had been strong determined to keep Jewish numbers to the minimum while exploiting Jewish wealth and management skills to the maximum. The first stages of emancipation therefore did not come until shortly after the revolution of 1848. A reform-minded Jewish preacher, Isaac Mannheimer, was elected to the Constituent Assembly and pressed strongly for various social reforms, including the elimination of the death penalty except in cases of treason and mutiny, and succeeded in having the special Jews' Tax discontinued. His personal influence became so great that other congregations began to adopt his modernized Viennese Rite.¹³⁴

Denmark had already felt Mannheimer's influence when he studied and taught there and with the appointment of a somewhat like-minded rabbi a reform style synagogue had been built in 1828.¹³⁵

France, the seat of political emancipation, was an enigma. Its heritage of anti-clericalism, resulting from its history of church-state conflict, left Judaism somewhat debilitated and neglected, and when after 1831, it enjoyed state subsidies together with the church the strength of the consistorial system meant that it could ignore or stifle the more radical moves for reform which had succeeded in Hamburg and Berlin. It became so adapted to the dominant Catholic religious environment in which the mass was still conducted in Latin that moves to introduced Jewish prayers in the vernacular did not succeed for a long time. However the strength of the consistorial system which discouraged radical reform also meant that when moderate reform was introduced the process was smooth, a matter of consensus, and without controversy.¹³⁶

In Hungary the revolution of '48 brought a series of contradictions. Its Jews looked for the emancipation which had been denied under Austrian influence but instead, because of the zeal of some of their young reformers, they suffered vicious pogroms and exclusion from the Hungarian Army until July 1849, just before the rebellion was put down by the Austrians and the Russians. Only two or three years earlier a small group of young reformers had organized Vienna-style services, in Ofen, causing some dissent within their community. Then, when they established the Central Association of Hungarian Israelites in July 1848 and the Magyar revolutionary authorities required certain guarantees about the nature of their services, they refused to give the guarantees as the price for emancipation. They said, in effect, that they wanted the same total religious freedom as Christians or none at all. In 1852, in an atmosphere of re-imposed conservatism after Austria had regained control of its empire, the authorities closed the association's temple and made it perfectly clear that Jews were expected to return to their own traditions.¹³⁷

Italy's peculiar historical circumstances made it most unlikely that there would be any strong move for the reform of Judaism in that country following the round of revolutions in '48. It was the seat of Catholicism, the point or origin for organized programs of harassment against Jews, its church provided the theological basis for rejection of Judaism and opposition to emancipation, and it was a focal point for complicated financial, political and social relationships between the Vatican and various strata of Jewish society. Meyer is therefore able to report that Judaism remained 'classical' in its impermeability to change, esteemed and venerated by most Jews, but practiced fully by very few.¹³⁸

Across the Channel in England circumstances were quite different to those in Europe. There had been no ghettos, a much lower level of oppression, a greater degree of tolerance and more social contact between Christians and Jews. If the words and actions of Isaac D'Israeli are any indication there was also a lower level of commitment to Judaism among its adherents. D'Israeli, a Sephardic emigrant from Venice and a prominent academic, remained a somewhat indifferent Jew throughout a life of contradictions. In 1813, at the age of 47, he declined an invitation from the board to become a warden of the Bevis Marks Synagogue in London then, three years later, while remaining Jewish himself but clearly wanting to maximize his son's opportunities for advancement, he had his son Benjamin, aged 13, baptized into the Church of England. Benjamin adopted the name Disraeli, worked in a legal office, turned to writing, then in 1837 entered parliament at the fifth attempt. In due course he served as prime minister twice and is regarded as the founder of the modern British Conservative Party. In the meantime the requirement for Jews to swear a Christian oath to gain citizenship had been cancelled in 1826 and there only remained the withholding of rights to political office (until 1858) and restricted access to key universities.

Orthodoxy was basically unchallenged within the British Jewish community and there was no general ground swell for modernization of worship. However, in line with Evangelical fundamentalist veneration of the scriptures as the absolute word of God, the London Society for Promoting Christianity among the Jews attacked the role and influence of rabbis on much the same basis as the early reformers in England attacked the papacy, and this lead some Jewish Biblical scholars to press for more reliance on the observance of the Laws of God alone in order to offset the Christian campaign. This lead in turn to criticism of 'overly timid political leadership in British Jewry and to pressure for minor reforms in the conduct of synagogue worship. In 1833, during the years of his son's campaign for office, D'Israeli senior trenchantly criticized some of the basic tenets of the faith. He wrote that all the laws of Judaism, both biblical and rabbinic, were human in origin and therefore open to repeal or amendment as the times demanded. He called for English Jews "to educate their youth as the youth of Europe, and not of Palestine; let their Talmud be removed to an elevated shelf, to be consulted as a curiosity of antiquity, and not as a manual of education. ... Let [Christians and Jews] only separate to hasten to the Church and to the Synagogue." He said that only the genius of Judaism's philosophical foundation was unchangeable.¹³⁹ However the greatly influential Moses Montefiore and the Board of Deputies (recognized by act of parliament in 1836) refused to recognize the West London Synagogue for some years after its minister, David Woolf Marks, the leader of the Reform Movement in England, introduced the first significant reforms there in 1840.^{140 141 142}

ALEXANDER'S PROGRAM FOR CONVERSION

The generally oppressive situation in Russia has already been noted, but there were several other important developments as well. In a bid to encourage conversion to Orthodox Christianity (rather than the reform of Judaism) Alexander I granted Jews access to public schools under his 1804 Constitution of the Jews which was otherwise restrictive, curtailing both land rights and opportunities for business ventures and access to the professions. Then his national development programs and his 'Jewish problem' were both complicated immeasurably by the devastation of his Napoleonic War and the 'opportunity' to absorb most of the area of Poland which had not been annexed during the three partitions, lost to Napoleon and then recovered. Twenty one years later, in 1835, that whole area was all formally declared to be within the Pale of Settlement. In the same year the government began funding Russian speaking rabbis, appointed under a Crown Rabbinate program, who were to be the only ones recognized by the government. They were expected to lift Jewish ritual and worship out of the archives and into the nineteenth century. However they had to face congregational elections each three years as well as fulfilling the government's program and the demands of the two requirements were barely compatible. The generally older informally chosen rabbis retained community support because of their knowledge of rabbinical law, their piety and their understanding of community traditions and the Crown Rabbis therefore found it extremely difficult to introduce change. The opening of two rabbinical seminaries in 1847, at Vilna and Zhitomir, aggravated the situation by generating mistrust instead of goodwill. In the meantime, in 1840, under the guise of promoting modernization and secular education, the government of Nicholas I undertook a large scale school development program within the expanded Pale of Settlement and commissioned a German rabbi, Max Lilienthal, to promote it. However he soon realized that the government's main aim was still conversion and not enlightenment and in 1844 he fled to the United States.

Coinciding with that program, in 1840 Nicholas I also founded a 'Committee for establishing means to reform the Jews of Russia.' This appears to have been an admission that his other programs, including the setting up of a Crown Rabbinate in 1835, had failed or that they had not produced the results he was looking for. He could certainly say that he had tried, but the modernization of Judaism in Russia would have to wait. It had come about in the West under the influence of developments in philosophy and science and in an environment conditioned by vigorous Protestantism in Germany and resurgent Catholicism in France. In Russia the dominant influences were stagnant Orthodoxy and political hostility towards all religion and philosophy under a resurgent monarchy which was hell-bent on preventing any further incursions from the west. The Jewish community therefore found greater comfort in the traditions of Orthodox Judaism which they understood, and in the prospect of either emigration, socialism or Jewish nationalism, rather than in any other 'ism' which their government might foist on them.

But as the second half of the nineteenth century dawned there was no one who was at all worried about the plight of the Jews except the Jews. In the wake of the round of revolutions the churches and their allies seemed confident that, together, they had stifled the challenges from both Napoleon and Marx and they no longer seemed very worried about the resurgence of Jewish faith. It would be a short-lived phenomenon and modernization and assimilation would surely take care of that. They were certainly not conscious of the fact that the pressures which they had set up had changed the population dynamics of the Jewish community yet again, that further dramatic changes were about to take place, and that in just one hundred years those changes would usher in changes in the relationships between the world's great religions – permanent changes. There was simply no room in their self-understanding for such a concept.

Volume I

Part 3

EXPLOITATION AND OPPRESSION: THE NEED FOR A SAFETY VALVE

CHAPTER 15

LET'S FIND A NEW HOME

Most people tended to forget about the Jewish question during the upheavals of 1848/49. The ordinary people had too many pressing personal problems to worry about, like survival, and the three interdependent domestic powers, (church, state and capital), were too busy pursuing a policy of divide and rule in order to cling to their positions of power and privilege. They successfully isolated the rebellious urban industrial population from both the rural peasantry and the urban non-industrial population in order to put down rebellion in many centres. By forcing these groups to identify sectional interests and then to become identified with those particular interests they unwittingly set up a pattern of urban/rural tension and conflict in community affairs and industrial negotiations which has ebbed and flowed but has never completely disappeared in westernized cultures ever since. In addition there was a distinct feeling across Europe that 'religious liberalism' had encouraged a sinful revolt against the proper and lawful authorities, so both 'the state' and 'the church' were eager to cooperate and to reinforce the concept that the state was Christian. Thus, in spite of justifiable criticism of its affairs, the church soon reasserted itself as the main ideological prop for conformity in matters social, political and economic, and the resurgence of autocratic government followed as a matter of course.

So most people forgot about the Jewish question for a while. But not all. Lionel Rothschild and his brothers had been elevated to the British peerage, with the lowest rank, Baron, by Queen Victoria in 1838, two years after she came to the throne at about the same time that Nathan Rothschild died. Their elevation was out of gratitude for their father's support in channeling loans from the Elector of Hesse to Victoria's relatives and, no doubt, also to ensure their continued support. ¹ Lionel's friend Benjamin Disraeli, who had been baptized at the age of 13, saw real prospects for effective Jewish emancipation in Britain if someone of the baron's prestige and calibre could be elected to parliament. To start with it would provide a direct challenge to the Christian oath of office required of all M.P.s as a means of preventing Jews from taking their seats in the house. The banker baron agreed to stand as a Liberal candidate for the City of London seat in 1847, just when he was busy supervising the Irish famine relief funds.

HUMANITY DIVIDED BY BELIEF ...

He won. But although the House of Commons passed a bill to allow him to take his seat he could not do so. The bill was thrown out by the House of Lords after drawn-out debate which ran well into 1848 and which brought out once more all the religious bigotry and sanctimonious humbug which underpinned the church's doctrinaire view of itself. The bill was an insult to the honour and glory of God, according to the Earl of Winchelsea. As long as the British Government was to remain Christian the Duke of Cambridge would not, he said, consent to admit a Jew. To sit in parliament was not a right but a trust according to the Bishop of Oxford. He warned the House that Jews, being people of an alien race secretly conniving with other nations, would betray that trust. Later in the debate, after Louis Philippe had abdicated, with the Prussian king fleeing from Berlin and with the pope under threat in Rome, Lord Ellenborough plumbed new depths. He referred to nations convulsed by Providential warnings of famine and distress. He said that Britain could only escape such calamity by Heavenly aid. And then came his punch line. Their Lordships should not offend the Heavenly Father by abandoning the exclusively Christian character of the British parliament.²

A person of lesser mettle may have thrown in the towel and quietly attended to his own business. But Lionel Rothschild was made of stern stuff and he was acutely aware of the importance of the decision. It was not until he had been elected seven times, with all the cost and emotional strain involved, and not until after ten attempts had been made to get a bill passed that the House of Lords relented and agreed to a compromise arrangement which allowed him to take his seat in parliament in July 1858.

... UNTIL THERE IS A £ SIGN

An independent observer might wonder at the reason for the eventual change of heart after the trauma of the Lords' debate over that issue and compare it with their change of mind on the slavery issue when the future of British investment in Latin America had been at stake. Perhaps there was another factor. The Crimean War.

As the potatoes had begun to grow again after the crisis years, the power brokers of Europe had returned to their pre-revolution complacency, the pope had returned to Rome and the three chief players – Church, state and capital – had each quite happily tried to convince themselves that the “spectre of Communism ... haunting Europe”³ would quietly fade away. Continuing emigration at about 400,000 people per year from Europe to the big wide world which lay under its heels helped to relieve the population pressure, to ease or camouflage the deep-seated tensions and to encourage the complacency. Some of the German states which had granted Jews full equality with Christians during the crisis period soon lost sight of the purpose of their liberalism, re-imposed restrictions and, in doing so, encouraged further Jewish emigration to the United States. Few people seemed to notice that there was therefore a disproportionate percentage of Jews among the migrants leaving Europe. If they did, they probably did not care. They might have even thought that it was an advantage to be diluting Jewish influence in Europe. It is very doubtful whether they realized that there was a subtle shift in the balance of Jewish population and that if the drift continued there could soon be a significant concentration of Jews in the United States and that the centre of gravity of Jewish influence could even move from Europe to America. So what? At the same time the departure of many of the Jewish reformers reduced the rate of reform in Europe.

And also at the same time the colonial powers steadily tightened their grip on their overseas territories, stepped up resource extraction from them and sought to control the trade routes to them. Britain was in firm control in India; France was becoming dominant in South East Asia; and Austria and Russia were enjoying a strange but cordial alliance under the umbrella of the Christian Concert of Europe which was bearing down heavily on the Muslim Ottoman Empire. These things combined to make the Eastern Mediterranean and the Black Sea a region of strategic importance again and therefore of latent conflict.

But none of those powers was eager to admit an expansionist interest in the region even though they each wanted a diplomatic foothold which could be turned to advantage very quickly. The church's interest in Palestine as the Holy Land gave them the opportunity they all needed. The roles were reversed for once. Instead of the church riding in on the backs of governments and commerce, the governments rode in on the backs of their national fragments of the church. Every encouragement was given to the establishment or expansion of Christian missions and in some cases the mission head was also the government's diplomatic or consular representative.

The British had actually pushed straight on to Jerusalem after they had intervened to help Turkey defeat Napoleon's army at Acre, (using French guns captured at the Battle of the Nile). Then it was only a short time before they replaced the French presence in Egypt to establish a military base as well. France had to be content with Syria and the North Coast of Africa. Austria had its access to the Adriatic and Russia had its Black Sea ports. But because of Turkish control of the Bosphorus and the Dardanelles Russia could not be confident of access to the Mediterranean.

That uncertainty didn't matter so much while most of Russia's trade with the west was via the Baltic and while it was adopting a restrictive and somewhat isolationist political stance. But when the famine struck in 1846 Britain repealed its discriminatory Corn Laws to attract imports from Europe. In doing so it unleashed tensions it probably didn't fully understand although they ought to have been anticipated. Russia suddenly found it had access to a large export market which could be supplied from its black earth belt in the south and it dramatically increased production. This involved re-deployment of serf labour on a large scale as landlords rationalized their estates on the English and German models and introduced crop rotations with a much more scientific approach to agriculture.⁴ The impact within Russia was rapid and enormous and with heavy dependence on the Black Sea to reach its new export markets, and to sustain that remarkable burst of development, it had to have secure trade routes.

... OR THE NEED FOR 'TOLERANCE'

Russia, with Tsar Nicholas I at the helm, turned its eyes once more towards Constantinople which stood astride the Bosphorus. But it was quite out of the question to try a frontal attack on the capital of the Ottoman Empire. He would work his way round the western coastline of the Black Sea. Searching for some justification for an expedition which would be more acceptable to the world than "national security", which really means political and economic expansion, he picked on religion. He declared that he was relieving the Christian communities in the Danubian Provinces from the maladministration of the Muslim Sultan whom he had dubbed "the sick man of Europe."⁵ To provide a bit of latitude for bargaining with both the Sultan and the western European powers he insisted on being recognized as the legal protector of all Greek Christians in the Ottoman Empire and on control of the Christian Holy Places of Palestine.

An operation via the shorter western coast of the Black Sea rather than right into the heartland of the Ottoman Empire via the more isolated and mountainous eastern approach was clearly easier from a military point of view. However there were also other very practical and pressing political reasons for Nicholas to move via the Danube basin. While he may not have expected enthusiastic support for his move he was probably reasonably confident of a free hand against the Sultan. In the circumstances, being no better informed on all the politicking than their western European counterparts, the Russian people were understandably surprised at the scorn and venom with which their Christian coreligionists reacted.

The British Government suddenly found untapped reserves of religious tolerance and reaffirmed its friendship with the Sultan and his worthy Muslim subjects. It was a simple case of "they protesteth too much." Britain's government was being even more hypocritical than the czar. At least he was recognized by the bulk of the Danubian Christians as the titular head of their faith. Britain was happy to buy Russia's wheat but it didn't want a Russian presence on the Mediterranean north coast. It might creep around the coast to Palestine, Egypt and the Red Sea route to India! France couldn't let Britain steal a march on it in the delicate balance of interference in the Ottoman Empire and joined Britain in support of the Sultan. Then both the Vatican and the Rothschilds decided they wanted a piece of the action too. The witch's brew was being stirred for bigger things in a couple more generations. But to piece it all together we have to retrace events and follow them forward again.

It was in the Balkans that Mariology had developed, had become firmly entrenched as an aberration in Christian teaching and intimately enmeshed in superstition until it became a major factor in the development of doctrine and a cause of division within the church. Athanasius had frequently used the expression "Theotokos" to describe Mary and the expression had been a major irritation to Emperor Julian. Then it was in Constantinople that the Nestorian controversy broke in 428, leading directly to the Council of Ephesus and the formal adoption of the title in 431. The next few generations saw the rapid growth of shrines; of other titles such as "Mother of Mercy"; and the introduction of feasts such as that celebrating "the return of the veil", the "visitation", the "purification" and the "conception." Then just as the Jewish Khazar Khanate was blocking the Muslim Arabs from pushing past the Caucasus Mountains into Southern Russia between 724 and 737, the ghastly ideas that Mary had maternal power over God, that God obeys Mary in all things and that “her name is more necessary for our protection than our breath is to our life” were all gaining currency in the Balkans.⁶

Eastern confusion over the Trinitarian misconceptions which Muhammad had criticized, and which had formed the basis for his most bitter attacks on Christianity just four generations earlier, had sunk to great depths but there was even deeper water ahead. After the split between Rome and Constantinople the Balkans had become the melting pot for every sect, heretical group being hounded by Rome, and the remnants of the original Arian (Unitarian) Christians as well as the major Catholic and Orthodox fragments of the church. The ordinary people cannot be blamed for the absolute religious confusion which resulted. The blame lies squarely with the clergy and the hierarchy of the competing Christian factions. Then came Islam with the fall of Constantinople. The liturgy and practices of both religions tended to merge, to coexist with and to be influenced by the varying forms of Judaism which came in from the Khazar Khanate, Spain and Central Europe after the Crusades. Judaism was enjoying tolerance under Islam in a European country for the second time.

After all of that merging and syncretism the Orthodox wing had frozen its doctrine and beliefs at what it understood to be the “perfect” position which had been reached at the time of the split, when its leadership shifted to Moscow. However change or evolution of the theology of the western wing had continued, both before and after the Reformation. With some aspects of Mariology this occurred largely in the Balkans, as might be expected, and tension between Catholic and Orthodox clergy in the region was a simple fact of life. But as in the case of the fantastic extension of ideas on Mary’s conception, such changes were usually imposed on the whole of the Catholic wing as doctrine, irrespective of where they evolved. The concept of the Immaculate Conception was popularized in England during the twelfth century, along with the idea that Mary was the equal or the “spouse” of Christ as well as being his mother. The University of Paris had been obliged to support it in 1449. The feast in honour of the concept was added to the Catholic calendar as an optional extra in 1476, and in 1708, (in the middle of Protestant Sweden’s occupation of Poland and just before the decisive battle of Poltava), it was confirmed as part of the Roman Rite calendar but not of the Orthodox calendar. Such was the position at the time of the incorporation of the Russian Church into the state structure, the partition of Poland and the beginning of the Napoleonic Wars.

In the meantime the churches of the Balkans had one by one gained autonomy within the Ottoman Empire. Their patriarchs owed puppet-like allegiance to the Sultan, resulting from a peculiar system of manipulated elections, but they recognized the Tzar as titular head of their churches. As a result, when Russia captured the Crimea and Azov, on the River Don, from Turkey and swooped across the Caucasus to raid the former Khazar territory of Azerbaijan there was jubilation among Balkans Christians.

... OR THE HINT OF A DROP OF OIL

In fact that swoop across the Caucasus by Peter the Great in 1723 marked the opening of a new chapter in history. Peter sent a master of refining to take possession of the oil supplies of the Khanate of Baku, to arrange for its transportation up the Volga to Moscow and to grant concessions in Baku for private individuals to produce oil from hand-dug wells. The first petroleum war had been fought and won. Russia had entered the petroleum age at the expense of the independent Muslim Uzbeks, a people of Turkish origin. Western Europe and the United States of America, although further along the road to industrialization and mechanization, were still dependent on whale and animal oil for lighting and heating, and on coal for their newfangled steam generation. But Russia's advantage was short-lived. Within a few years Persia was in control of Baku and the whole Azerbaijan region.

Then came the French Revolution, Napoleon, and Britain's foothold in Egypt and Palestine. Russia occupied the Danubian Provinces in 1806 but then had to relinquish much of them only six years later. At the same time there was a scramble to establish Protestant missions in Syria, Palestine and Egypt. Russia, (through the Orthodox Church), and the Vatican, (through its links with the Maronites as well as through orders such as the Lazarists who succeeded the suppressed Jesuits), were not to be left in their preferred positions in a part of the Ottoman Empire of such vital strategic importance.

Prominent businessmen in Britain, including William Wilberforce, sprung to the aid of the newly formed Church Missionary Society, (C.M.S., established in 1799), the British and Foreign Society (1804), and the London Missionary Society (L.M.S. 1795). Others such as the Baptist Missionary Society (1792) do not seem to have attracted the attention of establishment businessmen in the same manner but basically the interests of Britain's aristocracy took it in the same direction as the fervour of the evangelicals. There was a clear-cut marriage of convenience. The societies openly joined in British and European expansion abroad as a cultural aspect of that expansion, in the wake of territorial, political and commercial expansion, and as a symbol or as evidence of the ascendancy or superiority of Britain and Europe.⁷ Before long an offshoot of the L.M.S. was established to work among the tiny enclaves of fanatically religious Jews which had again congregated around Jerusalem and elsewhere in Palestine and Syria.⁸ It became known as the London Jews Society, (L.J.S.).

Even before the first L.J.S. team had arrived to set up a mission, an American mission, organized by the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Mission, had arrived, been refused permission to operate in Jerusalem, and settled in Smyrna under the protection of the British Consul.

UNREST IN THE NEAR EAST

It didn't take long before political intrigue, falsified reporting of activities, subterfuge in property development in contravention of Turkish directives, commercial and consular manipulation, poaching and competition for converts, and warped school programs were well under way on all fronts.⁹ Feuding between the sects was common and bloodshed in the Church of the Holy Sepulchre was apparently not uncommon.

When the L.J.S. rented a former Jesuit property at Antoura in Lebanon to set up a school a storm broke around it. The Maronites insisted that the Turkish authorities close it and some years later the Lazarists reopened it. About the same time a Protestant translation of the Bible was introduced. A papal bull was immediately issued forbidding its use by Catholics. That was followed by circulars from the Propaganda Fide and an anathema by the Maronite patriarch. When they were followed by an order from the Ottoman authorities banning the import of Bibles and Psalters from Europe because they caused apprehension, disturbances and disputes, it provided more ammunition for rabble-rousing fund raising anti-Muslim outbursts back in Europe. It is hardly surprising that converts from among the Jews and the Muslims were few, that interfaith relations were strained to the limit and that both of the other members of the triangle, confronted on their home ground, took strong action to support their adherents and to discourage conversion.¹⁰ Still more ammunition for rabble-rousing fundraising anti-Muslim outbursts back in Europe.

While that was the complex situation in Palestine and Syria, the C.M.S. also had missions working both with the Copts in Egypt, (part of the Ottoman Empire), and in Ethiopia as well. It seems that their most lasting achievement was to strain relations between the Vatican and the churches of those countries. This contributed towards Italy's later Ethiopian adventures by ensuring Vatican support for them on the basis of achieving religious unification. Meanwhile, in Europe, several quite separate communities were struggling to gain national independence. Those of direct concern for our plot are the Greeks, the Hungarians and the Poles. The same great powers were doing their bit of self-interest stirring including, of course, the Vatican.

In 1821, just as the Protestant Bible controversy was being generated in Syria and Palestine, the Christians of the Morea peninsula region of Greece rose in revolt, demanded independence from Turkey and, in the act, slaughtered between 10,000 and 15,000 Muslims. The well-established and bloody feud between the two religious communities had plumbed new depths. The Sultan, conceding the loss of Morea, retaliated by executing the patriarch of Constantinople. Three days later the body was dragged by a mob through the streets and thrown into the sea.¹¹ The Christians of Europe, fed laundered versions of the events no doubt, were incensed. How dare the Muslim infidels treat a Christian clergyman like that even if he was Orthodox! It was enough to justify a crusade. Britain, France and Russia combined at Britain's initiative¹² and the Turkish and Egyptian navies were defeated in the Battle of Navarino six years later. Two years later, in 1829, a Greek monarchy was established, of course. Christian Greece had gained its independence from the Muslims. It was just like the good old days! There wasn't much of the Muslim Ottoman Empire left in Europe after that. Perhaps one more good push might do the trick.

But what sort of Christians were the Greeks to be? The several churches valued their semi-independence under the Sultan with traditional links with both the Russian Orthodox Church and the tsar. Naturally the tsar wanted the church unified under him. He wanted his foothold in the Mediterranean and his navy had, after all, helped the Greeks gain their independence. On the other hand the Vatican had also been active and it was again finding Balkans theology very attractive. However the Greek hierarchy and politicians didn't find the Vatican's modern Ultramontanism any more attractive than its earlier versions of unification.

The wheeling and dealing began in earnest. The Vatican needed a bargaining point. Unrest and nationalism was on the increase in the partitioned Polish territories which had been absorbed by Prussia, Austria and Russia during the generation before the Napoleonic Wars. The French Protectorate of the Duchy of Warsaw which Napoleon had established, (mainly at the expense of Prussia and Austria), had been carved up again in favour of those three neighbourly powers at the Congress of Vienna. Russia had won hands down and the tsar had found himself with an extra three and half million subjects. The majority of them were also subject to the Roman Catholic Church but there was a sizable minority of Jews. They were unruly and restless. In common with the Slavs of Eastern Europe and the Northern Balkans they were inspired by Greek independence and they were being incited to rebellion by all those Jewish malcontents in the Pale of Settlement who were eager to join them in a reunified Poland. They couldn't expect much support in their independence struggle from their coreligionists in Austria (almost entirely Catholic) or Prussia (somewhat less than fifty percent Catholic) because those countries had again been party to the carving-up process, but in 1830 they did rebel. The result was the loss of their semi-self-government that had been granted by Alexander I under the most liberal constitution in Europe while he was in a mood to see decentralized authority as fashionable and advantageous.¹³ It had been more like a carrot in advance of good behaviour than a reward for it and recognized the independence and liberation of the peasantry which Napoleon had imposed.

The final trigger for rebellion had been Tsar Nicholas' demand for a Polish army with which to invade France and Belgium. It took Russia nine months to suppress the rebellion and six thousand of its leaders, largely Jewish, were forced into exile in the countries they had refused to invade. Every Polish appeal for help from those and other countries was ignored. A gaggle of semi-secret societies implicated in the rebellion, including Freemasonry, were forced underground and the Catholic and Uniate groups appealed to Rome. The pope and the tsar sat down for tea together.

NO CHEER FOR THE POPE

Whatever hope they may have had for support from the Vatican soon evaporated. Their struggle would be long and grim. Their two successive long-reigning popes, Gregory XVI and Pius IX, were too interested in using noninterference in the Polish independence question as a bargaining point to gain union of the Roman Catholic and Russian Orthodox Churches to worry about a bit of misery.¹⁴ The papal proposition to the tsar, put simply, amounted to “you can keep Poland if you hand your authority over the church to me.” The re-establishment of the Greek monarchy and the reorganization of the church in Greece provided a good starting point.

But the pope missed out. A program to forcibly convert the Roman and Uniate churches to Russian Orthodoxy was initiated immediately. It took eight years to complete. In 1833, only four years after the establishment of the Greek monarchy and only a couple of years after the Polish rebellion had been put down, the Greek parliament declared that the Greek church would be independent with a Holy Synod based on the Russian model. Some 400 monasteries with less than six priests were closed and a crash program to upgrade the education and status of the clergy was announced.¹⁵ The Oecumenical Patriarch in Constantinople retained control of the churches in Serbia, Bulgaria and the Danubian Provinces of Rumania with his peculiar two-way links with the sultan and the tsar. At the same time Russia and Turkey signed the Treaty of Unkiar Skelessi under which Russia guaranteed Turkish independence and the defence and security of Constantinople in return for another piece of the Caucasus, control of the Black Sea and the straits, and the right to provide continuing protection for the Orthodox Christian Churches throughout the Ottoman Empire.¹⁶

Dismayed, but not about to surrender, the pope tucked the Polish card back up his sleeve to play some other time. He didn't have to wait long because the intervention by Britain, France and Russia to excise Greece from the Turkish Ottoman empire had further weakened the imperial base and upset the power balance within the empire.

The sultan had held to the basically non-belligerent philosophy of “whatever will be, will be.” It was a natural consequence of the Muslim belief that God is in ultimate control of events but Europe's constantly sparring, bitterly competitive and population-pressure sensitive Christian powers took it to be a sign of weakness. They had made every post a winning post by means of the gradually evolving Protestant work ethic and their rapidly expanded schemes of mass education. This meant that economically, militarily and politically the great powers of Europe had pushed ahead and widened the material and political capacity gap which had already developed because of the pattern of historical circumstances.

The ‘right’ to protect Orthodox Christians throughout the Ottoman Empire which Russia had scored was not a simple or a minor issue. It indicated the extent to which its Christian neighbours in Europe had grown to overshadow the Ottoman Empire. It was a question of domination rather than decline. The ‘right’ implied freedom of access wherever Orthodox communities were settled, commercial and taxation privileges and even the jurisdiction of Russian consular courts over Orthodox Christians. Such privileges in defined areas had been granted to several countries while the Ottoman Empire was at its peak, largely to encourage preferential trade. France had been given them in relation to Latin-speaking Christians and Britain's rights were extended after it had intervened to help stop Napoleon at Acre.

But Britain and France saw Russia's demand in a different light. The Orthodox churches were strong in Jerusalem and Russian influence and competition increased. To offset it Britain obtained the sultan's permission to appoint a resident consul in Jerusalem. It was the first of the three interested governments to do so. He arrived in 1838. Only a few months later he received instructions from the Foreign Office to provide diplomatic protection for Jews generally, in spite of the fact that many of them had come from Russia and were therefore Russian subjects.¹⁷) The prompting for this instruction, which must have been known to be provocative rather than conciliar, seems to have come from both the L.J.S. and influential Jewish friends of the British government who had much more legitimate reasons for their approach than the society.

The sincerity and effectiveness of the instruction was put to its first real test the next year, 1840, and it did not stand up under scrutiny very well at all. On February 5th the superior of the Franciscan convent in Damascus, Father Thomas, and a servant disappeared mysteriously. A confession was extorted from a Jewish barber by means of gentle Christian torture that a ritual murder had been under consideration. That provided the pretext for several arrests and a bit of good old fashioned inquisitorial torture. A general massacre seemed imminent but not the intervention of the British consul. When news reached Europe and America protest meetings were held and even Christians were stirred to attend. Sir Moses Montefiore, knighted by Queen Victoria for his services as Sheriff of the City of London, left promptly with a French Lawyer and an authority on the East to intervene. Mehemet Ali met them in Alexandria and issued an order for the release of survivors. Then in Constantinople the sultan received them and issued an edict confirming the inviolability of Jewish persons and their property throughout the Ottoman Empire.¹⁸ Jewish self-help through direct diplomacy without reliance on the responsible sovereign powers such as Britain was an established fact. Montefiore became the hero and feted idol of the entire Jewish community and a symbol of Jewish dignity. For the rest of his life he was in great demand to intervene wherever persecution threatened world wide. So much for protection from the British consul. Like it or not, the Christian powers were, by their action and inaction, continuing to reinforce the Jewish sense of community and the Christian attitude that Jews were "different."

DIPLOMATS IN CLERICAL GARB

The politicking was hotting up and generally the missionaries worked hand in glove with the consul although there were times when they were a serious embarrassment to both him and the British government. In one instance the consul was instructed not to promote or assist in schemes of interference with the Jewish subjects of the Porte which the bishop might engage in. The appointment of the bishop was in fact the offspring of a political marriage of convenience.

He was an appointee of the Church of England but also acted for the Prussian Protestant Church under an arrangement sponsored by the Prussian king and the British government.¹⁹

It was at this time that English churchmen such as the Earl of Shaftsbury, social reformer and President of the British and Foreign (Bible) Society, began to spread the notion that the time was ripe for the Jews to return to Palestine. It was presented as an aspect of Christian mission but it was argued in terms of politics, finance and commerce.²⁰

It was also at this time that the English missions caught onto the idea of building hospitals in Jerusalem for the second time around. The singular failure of their efforts at converting Muslims, Jews, Orthodox Christians or denominations linked with Rome led them to look for other means of attack. Hospitals were promoted with the blatantly false claim that they were a peculiarly Christian service, together with the equally false notion that nursing and medicine administered by a Christian is different from and mystically superior to that administered by non-Christians. Muslims and Jews were enticed into using the service and the twelve-bed "much superior" Christian hospital. They were then subjected to evangelical propaganda. The mission made no secret that the main purpose of the service was to bring those using it under missionary influence and instruction. The rabbis boycotted it, threatened the equivalent of Catholic excommunication against any Jew who used it and refused Jewish burial to a woman who died there. Instead of being a valuable humanitarian service the hospital became a focal point for conflict. Unable to attract patients, the mission threw open the clinic and dispensary, free, to people of all communities on one "public day" each week. The embarrassment which this caused for Muslims soon led the sultan to open the military garrison clinic twice a week for free personal attention by the garrison doctor for every person regardless of religious affiliation. Public hospitals had thus been born out of trouble in the triangle.²¹ Unfortunately even more trouble was brewing. Self-indoctrination for propaganda purposes led Christians to believe the story being used in Jerusalem and it became the basis for the recruitment of medical missionaries in every African and Asian country.²²

But there was another approach taken to evangelism and conversion as well. The belief was fostered by the clergy that converts to Christianity automatically gained British protection. To become a member of the Church of England was to be made English! The first person to be ordained an Anglican clergyman after conversion from Judaism applied to the Consul in Beirut for a British passport on that basis. His application was refused and he was left to carry a Turkish passport. The bishop retorted sharply that English law required a clergyman of the church to be an English subject irrespective of where he was born.²³ The church and the state just had to march together.

A CHANGE OF ALLEGIANCE IN EGYPT

By that stage Muhammad Ali, a Balkans-born Albanian Muslim who had caught the infectious, ruthless and ambitious spirit of Napoleon and the Italian and Balkans independence struggles, was taking a very close interest in events in Jerusalem. He had risen from the post of local tax collector in Albania to run a tobacco merchant business and served successfully as a junior military commander in the Ottoman Balkans army. Having caught the attention of his seniors it seems he was sent to Egypt as a sort of military overseer to chase out the French in collaboration with the sultan's civilian governors. But when the English chased out the French instead Muhammad Ali confronted both them and the governors until they all backed out, leaving him as Pasha of Egypt, Victor of the Sudan and a competitor of the sultan who had sent him to Egypt in the first place.

It is probable that with Muhammad Ali's Egyptian-based forces coupled with his Turkish home-based forces the sultan would have put down the Russian-backed Greek uprisings without British and French intervention. Certainly Ali expected control of Crete, Palestine and Syria as a reward. When events were not working out that way he took the matter into his own hands, made war on the sultan, pushed his armies all the way back through Syria which he had unofficially occupied on his way to the Greek wars, and was stopped short of capturing Constantinople by Turkey's Russian protectors.

In 1839, just before he died, the Sultan tried to push Ali out of Syria and Palestine which he had held onto anyway, but he was heading for another hiding until Britain, France and Russia intervened, this time in competition. At the same time, moving via the Indian Ocean, Britain occupied Aden to drive a wedge between Ali's Arabian and African territories and to control the approach to the Red Sea and the existing overland trade routes across Egypt. Out of the Treaty of London, agreed a few months later in 1840, Britain emerged as the clear winner. It had turned the tables on Russia which it replaced as "protector" of Turkey and controller of the straits to the Black Sea but it had also outsmarted France in the Egyptian stakes. Ali was confirmed as hereditary Pasha of Egypt but he was expected to vacate Syria where France would become the dominant power, and Palestine, where Britain enjoyed that position. He was to get the coastal enclave of Acre as a consolation prize.

But Ali didn't feel inclined to withdraw. France backed him.²⁴ Officially it was showing its gratitude for the sympathetic attitude and policies which he had adopted towards Christians and Jews. In fact France had some very special plans for the area. It wanted to strengthen its foothold in Syria and it wanted to be certain of Muhammad Ali's favours in the near future.

One of Napoleon Bonaparte's first decisions when he reached Egypt had been to examine the feasibility of reconstructing or replacing the long-lost canal from the Mediterranean to the Red Sea. The original canal had been started about the time of Abraham. It was probably completed by the Ptolemeys, extended by the Romans, neglected by the Byzantines, reopened in the early Islamic era by the Arabs, and finally filled in by the first Abbasid Caliph as a defensive military measure about 775 C.E.²⁵ Napoleon's 1799 survey showed that although there was a thirty three foot fall from the Red Sea to the Mediterranean a canal could be built but, being preoccupied with Europe and pushed out of Egypt by Britain, he was not in a position to act. The next serious studies were made in 1834 and enthusiasm among officials in France was running high in 1840 when the two competitors were deciding Muhammad Ali's fate. War between Britain and France over the issue was averted because Britain's bluff was stronger than France's resolve and Britain forced Muhammad Ali back to Egypt where it said he belonged.²⁶

SHORT TERM ACCORDS IN FAVOR

Four years later, in 1844, the tsar visited England and apparently thought he worked out an understanding with the British government about their common interest in the region. His view of that understanding was that Turkey had to eventually vacate its European territory, west of the Bosphorus, and that it had to be content with its Asian territory east of the straits. There are as many interpretations of that visit as there are historians, but it is reasonable to assume that he did have such an understanding. However Britain adroitly avoided disclosing its attitude to a Russian presence on the rim of the Mediterranean and the tsar went home happy. Possibly the British interpretation was that there was no great urgency in the situation anyway.

However the potato famine changed that only two years later. More eager than ever for quick access to the East, France stepped up its canal studies. Britain repealed its corn laws, triggering the accelerated development of Southern Russia, and the political upheavals of 1848 were just around the corner. Part of that action had been an heroic uprising in Hungary aimed at national independence from Austria, and the Viennese uprising, led by the intelligentsia, which brought the downfall of the Metternich regime. That was followed by the establishment of popular parliamentary government, the granting of a constitution for all of the Austrian Empire except Hungary, the abolition of peasant servitude and the thrill of an imminent and thorough transformation of the Austrian autocracy.

Unfortunately the thrill was short lived. The revolutionaries had not bargained for the resilience of the autocracy, the deviousness of the tsar or the attitude of the Vatican. The Hungarian Diet wanted to introduce Magyar, the language of the ethnic majority, for its debates in place of Latin. That would never do! Next they would want it for the mass and then they would demand a Greek-style independent church! Ethnic conflict between the Magyars and the minority Croats, Serbs, Roumans, Ruthenes and Slovaks was soon stirred up to put an end to that idea.²⁷ There was so much heresy, Balkans-style theological confusion and the subversive influence of both Islam and Judaism that the use of the vernacular would aggravate the problem – or so the reasoning ran.

Coupled with that was the love-hate interdependence which the Austrian monarchy and the Vatican had been unwilling to break. In Italy everyone except the pope was working towards his own particular version of national unity and Vatican diplomacy was becoming even more rigidly reactionary. The pope clung to his belief that he had to have temporal authority to validate his claims for spiritual authority around the world and he therefore clung desperately to control of the papal states. He still had some units of the Rothschild-negotiated Austrian army in Rome, until they were called home to stem the crisis in Vienna, and he had to support the monarchy against such rebellions in case he had to call for further military aid. The siege of Rome was imminent and his hands were tied completely. He couldn't openly support the Northern Italian states in their independence wars against Austria or he would lose his shield, although he did try to persuade Austria to give up its territorial claims voluntarily after his cabinet had defied him and joined the war in support of the north.²⁸ Obviously if he didn't appear to give them some support he further alienated the Italian people and invited an attack on the papal states. Similarly he couldn't support the Hungarian uprisings or he would most certainly lose his shield, but if he didn't support them he forced them to turn to the Russian Orthodox Church. However the Polish question did seem to have some potential again because another round of democratic rebellion had broken out in 1846. The pope would again turn a blind eye to the suppression of that Free Poland movement if Russia didn't stir up trouble for the Vatican in Hungary.

But how the plot thickened. The tsar intervened instead to help his Austrian friends put down the Hungarian revolt. This helped to very quickly recentralize power in Austria and to restore its predominant role in the German Confederation at Prussia's expense, but not for long. About the same time the pope fled into exile. It looked as if every Catholic Church would get its independence and its own identity by default through the collapse of the papacy and the demise of the papal states. It also looked as if, as a bargaining point, the Polish question had evaporated. Adam Mickiewicz built up a Polish legion in Italy and published a moderate socialist paper, "La Tribune des Peuples", in Paris. Then Marx and Engels, (writing in "The Newspaper of the Rhineland" which was financed by wealthy landed interests in the Prussian-controlled Poznan region), declared the national liberation of Poland to be the most important task of the workers' movements in Europe.

However the pope's alliances held and before long he was reinstated in Rome by the armies of Napoleon III and the Russian backed Austrians who had also done their extra bit of Polish annexation, claiming Cracow in the interests of national security (naturally without opposition from the pope) as soon as the rebellion had begun. The Polish question was back on the agenda.

BRITAIN HAS A CHANGE OF HEART

The international situation seemed to stabilize a little but not for long. It was time for Tsar Nicholas to turn his attention to the Bosphorus/Dardanelles trade route to the Mediterranean. He proposed a deal with Britain which seems to have been in line with his understanding of 1844. He would occupy Constantinople while Britain sought "compensation" from Turkey in Crete and Egypt. Britain, scared of his growing influence, refused. The government again found those loads of religious tolerance which had been so well concealed by C.M.S. and L.J.S. propaganda and reports coming out of Jerusalem. The Turks were no longer sons of the Arabian impostor and false prophet who had exercised his tyrannical sway to snuff out the truth of Christian enlightenment. Muslims were no longer prone to treachery, fraud, and cruelty, and the Ottoman Empire was no longer the stronghold of Satan, dominant, vile and deluding myriads of the European race. All of a sudden the Anglo-Ottoman alliance was a thing of beauty and not a part of a process to soften up the Muslims for more friendly intercourse beyond the bounds of commerce.²⁹ The first C.M.S. missionary to the Eastern Mediterranean region, William Jowett, was based on Malta and commissioned to diffuse Christian truth among Jews, Muslims and pagans of the region. He was instructed that Providence had placed Malta in Protestant Britain's hands not only to extend Britain's political greatness but so that it could inherit the missionary position of the Roman Church and extend the influence of Christianity and the nation through a zealous and learned English dignitary.³⁰

Confused by Britain's attitude, the tsar decided to act alone. He renounced his scheme of cooperation with the other powers, issued his ultimatum to Turkey and occupied the Danubian Provinces, only to be told by Austria to leave. The emperor's fear of Russia as a neighbour in control of his access to the Black Sea via the Danube, his probable knowledge of the resources about to be tapped in the region, and his commitment to the pope weighed more heavily than any gratitude he may have felt for Alexander's support in propping up his throne and empire. The sultan refused a compromise solution "offered" by Britain and France, declared war on Russia in October 1853, and neatly locked his "protectors" into what could have been a defensive war against Russia via Rumania. But Britain and France decided on an offensive war via the Crimea and laid siege to Sebastopol in September 1854. At the same time Napoleon III of France agreed with the Northern Italian states that as a move towards Italian unification he would withdraw French troops from the papal states within two years. In return, and to strengthen their future negotiating position, Piedmont and Sardinia threw their armies into the Crimea in support of the French and British offensive.³¹ The Vatican was in deep trouble.

However Napoleon III's attention was firmly focused on Egypt. France had certainly been outsmarted by Britain a decade or so earlier when it grabbed Aden, but circumstances had changed. For much the same reasons that the Abbasids had filled in the old canal, Muhammad Ali had not wanted a canal across the isthmus. He had wanted internal canals and roads to boost agricultural exports and he had wanted modernization and industrialization. He had also wanted strong armed forces for his expanding sub-empire but he had not wanted Europe's powers to be able to move their armies and navies freely through his territory. When he died in 1848 and his reactionary anti-European and strongly anti-canal grandson Abbas I became pasha, Britain offered to put a railway across Egypt and the first stage, Alexandria to Cairo, was opened in 1852. But Abbas was murdered and succeeded by a younger son of Ali, Said Pasha, in 1854. Pro-French and weak-willed, he immediately came under the charm and pressure of France's engineer-diplomat, Ferdinand de Lesseps. Within a matter of weeks, while Britain, France and the Piedmontese, supported by a contingent of 20,000 Egyptians sent by Abbas I, were laying siege to Sebastopol, Said signed a concession permitting France to cut a canal from the Mediterranean to the Red Sea. Britain, its turn to be upstaged, opposed it. Presumably the sultan was not consulted.

The Siege of Sebastopol continued. After all it was the integrity of the Sultan's Muslim Empire which the Christian powers were supposed to be fighting over. It had nothing to do with control of trade routes or keeping Russia out of the Mediterranean, or so the world was told. But the choice of the Crimea for the offensive, largely a British decision, has several interesting aspects. That approach drove a wedge into Southern Russia between the Caucasus and the Balkans. It blocked Russia's export trade routes most effectively and it provided a shorter route towards Moscow. But it was in an incredibly difficult environment. In the circumstances a drive towards Moscow was hardly a serious option and the choice of an easier war zone could have brought the sparring parties back to the negotiating table with less casualties and more quickly. However there was strong support for Russia in Rumania from the Orthodox Christian communities still struggling for independence from Turkey. Any powers defending Turkey against Russia in the Balkans would have been seen as the oppressors. The Vatican, of course, wanted to see a Christian power replace Turkey in Rumania but not Russia. It wanted the Rumanian Church's links transferred from Moscow to Rome, but there wasn't much scope for negotiation over Poland or any other issue, especially as Napoleon had served notice of his intended desertion. Or perhaps there was.

In 1840, while the Hungarian trouble was at its height and before he fled from Rome, Pius IX had started proceedings towards a formal definition of the concept of Mary's immaculate conception. His move had gained strong support in Italy and the Balkans, of course, although there had been opposition from bishops in England, Germany and France, including the archbishop of that hotbed of Gallican opposition to papal authority, Paris. Pius thereupon proceeded to an immediate proclamation of the dogma of the Immaculate Conception, in December 1854. It was strongly attacked by the Russian Orthodox Church and Protestants generally but it was greeted with enthusiasm in the Balkans and that was where it mattered. Russia's claim to the allegiance of the people through its church was weakened.

Russia finally abandoned Sebastopol in September 1855, a year after the siege, and with growing discontent within Russia to the conduct of the war the new tsar, Alexander II, sued for Peace. With Britain wanting to keep French, Russian and Egyptian interests and interference in the area to a minimum the Turkish Empire was given another lease of life. It was not required to vacate its European territory. The sultan promised some reforms in the Balkans and the powers all agreed to guarantee the privileges of the Danubian principalities. That gesture was probably aimed at Austria as much as at Russia and Turkey. The Black Sea was to be a zone of peace with Russia agreeing not to build any naval bases in the Crimea, and with warships of all nations barred from the straits in time of war.

But then there was Said's concession to France for a canal. In a separate deal not directly linked to the Peace of Paris he granted a second act for the Suez Canal Company to operate the canal, construction of which had already been agreed, for ninety-nine years from the date of its completion. The company was to be an Egyptian company based in Paris but participation in the project was to be invited from other countries as well. Britain snubbed the project and discouraged anyone else from being involved, especially the Russians who, being deprived of a major Black Sea port, wouldn't have much use for it anyway. The outcome was that French interests took up 52 percent, investors from twelve other countries took up four percent between them and Said Pasha was left to take up 44 percent. Work began three years later, in 1859. When the canal opened to shipping in November 1869, Britain's attitude changed dramatically.

STILL MORE RELIGIOUS DOUBLE TALK

The religious double talk continued, naturally. The British government held to its new line that Islam was respectable and that Muslims were fine, God-fearing people, while the English Christian missions continued their denigration of Islam and their efforts to undermine the Turkish authorities. The independence struggles by the Christian majority in the Balkans also continued and the Danubian Provinces were united as Rumania only three years later, although they remained loosely within the Turkish Empire for another twenty years. Their new independent church was organized Greek-style and it retained its links with Constantinople and with Moscow. It didn't swing across to Rome. The kind, benevolent and ever-tolerant Christian powers of Europe guaranteed Turkey's security against all comers. Their message was clear even if their double talk was muted and concealed from the uninitiated by a few well-chosen words. There was to be no resurgence of Muslim power through the annexation of Turkey into a new Islamic power block centred on Egypt, or anywhere else for that matter such as Persia or Arabia.

Yes, from the point of view of gaining control of the Orthodox Church, the Vatican's initiatives had failed again, but it had helped to foment more trouble in Russia. Confidence in the institution of the church within Russia had, as already noted, fallen markedly during the three generations since its formal incorporation into the state structure and antagonism towards the clergy had increased steadily. But, in contrast to the general position in Western Europe, the vast majority of Russian peasants and serfs had seen the church merely as a vehicle for their religion-based superstition and not as essential to their beliefs. The institution could disappear and as long as they observed its sacraments, fasts and rituals, such as repetitious crossing, the peasants would be saved to pass into the nether world – or so it appeared from popular attitudes. Both Biblical history and the message of the Gospel were lost on the people completely. The influence of Orthodoxy had gradually weakened to be purely superficial and as brittle as the monarchy's capacity to protect the peasantry from the attacks of people of competitive faiths. In popular belief, the institution of serfdom existed in much the same relationship to the monarchy as did the church. It was widely seen as incompatible with Russia's claim to be a civilized power but it was tolerated in the belief that it provided internal stability and external power. It was also tolerated by the serfs in the belief that they were supporting the tsar in his efforts to turn over all the land to them and that he was being frustrated by the landlords.³² On top of that the church had continued to favour serfdom even after the seizure of its land when it was apparently no longer dependent on the system itself.

Russia's humiliating defeat in the Crimean War by countries which did not hold to either of two institutions put the skids under both of them. The war had been fought, supposedly, so that imperial Orthodox Russia could take care of fellow Orthodox Christians of the Greek persuasion struggling under a Muslim regime. But it had been defeated by an alliance of Muslims, Christians of a different hue, and Jews.

Southern Russia and the Crimea still carried clear signs of the Jewish and Muslim cultures which had both been firmly established there under previous regimes, and the crisis of confidence in the Russian church had been most pronounced there. Then the institution of serfdom had been extended and reinforced in the south as grain production was boosted and serfs from other areas had suffered a great deal of hardship in those few years leading up to the war. The Pale of Settlement had even been adjusted to include the Crimea in 1835 so that development would be encouraged. It also helped to absorb Jews who were being "re located" out of the fifty kilometer Polish buffer zone which was proclaimed at the same time. Of course the key city of the peninsula, Sebastopol, could not be contaminated. Jews were excluded from it even though it was within the proclaimed pale.³³

A PROTEST AGAINST DISCRIMINATION

But the humiliation of Russia's defeat was all the more bitter for its aristocracy to swallow because the British and French invasion had been financed, quite openly, by the Rothschilds as a protest against Russia's discrimination against Jews. Britain's war loan of sixteen million pounds Sterling had been jointly underwritten by Baron Lionel Rothschild and Amschel Rothschild. Yes. It was the same baron who was a confidant of the royal family and prime ministers, who had been elected several times to represent London's central business district in the House of Commons and who had still not been permitted to take his seat. The Lords – or at least the majority of them – were finally convinced that he had earned the right to sit and that, in due course, the right might even be extended (in a sense of Christian charity, of course) to other Jews as well.

Amschel Rothschild was head of the Frankfurt branch of the family, a friend of Bismarck, Prussia's Consul-General and Solicitor in the cause of Jewish emancipation. France's war loan of seven hundred and fifty million francs had been largely raised by Baron James Rothschild who was banker-in-chief to the restoration of Louis XVIII and Austria's Consul-General to France. He had agreed to raise the war loan in spite of his widely known conflict with Napoleon III who had just dismissed the National Assembly and assumed the role of dictator, and in spite of his having plotted the collapse of France's cooperative bank, the Credit Mobilier, which had been hailed as a remarkable development for ordinary people.

Bismarck, Prussian representative to the Diet of Frankfurt at that stage, reported to the Prussian Government that the House of Rothschild was profoundly affected by a government's attitude towards the Jewish problem. There were occasions, he reported, when its policy was determined by matters other than business considerations.³⁴ The friendship between the Prussian king and the Russian tsar was very close and it therefore appears very likely that the policy of the Rothschild family did have a big bearing on the Prussian Government's decision not to enter the Crimean War as an ally of Russia. Certainly Bismarck had not needed to search far for situations to illustrate his report to his government. Two such situations had occurred in the opening months of the conflict between Russia and Turkey and before Britain and France entered the war against Russia.

In the first, the destruction of the Turkish fleet at Sinope and the Russian blockade of Turkey's Asian territories soon resulted in food supplies running short in Syria and Palestine and, forced by the dominant communities to bear the brunt of the shortages, the Jewish community at Jerusalem was reduced to semi-starvation. When it appealed to Baron James Rothschild for help, Albert Cohen, tutor to the baron's son Edmond, was sent to assess the situation. On Cohen's recommendation, Baron James decided against the distribution of food or cash. This would have perpetuated the relationship between the British Christian missions and the Jewish community and it would have also played into the hands of the British representatives and the racketeers who controlled the food supply. He decided instead to build an institution which would get the Jewish community out of the clutches of the Christian missions. He financed the James Mayer de Rothschild Hospital. The first link between the House of Rothschild and Palestine had been forged as a direct consequence of the actions of the Christian missions and political powers.³⁵

... THEN STILL MORE DISCRIMINATION

But a far more important illustration occurred in Austria at about the same time. Popular pressure for new restrictions on Jews reached another peak. There was widespread reaction to the role of Jews in the Italian wars of independence against Austria, fueled by the clergy and coupled with jealousy at growing Jewish economic strength since the dismantling of the ghettos. The government responded by suddenly passing a law to again bar Jews from acquiring property. However it exempted Baron Salomon Rothschild, by a special statute, because of its remarkable financial and diplomatic dependence on both him and Baron James who was its Consul-General in Paris. Of course in doing so it highlighted the situation, gave credibility to the claims of the bigots, deepened interfaith division and certainly failed to placate the Rothschild family. The family formed a syndicate and drove down the value of Austrian bonds on all the European stock exchanges. The government got the message very quickly and repealed the new law.³⁶ More fuel for the fire. It didn't take very long for bitter enemies of the Rothschilds, like Austria's ambassador to Paris, Count Hubner, to point out that the country's own Consul-General, with whom he had to work closely, was the ring leader of the syndicate which had set out to undermine the national economy. The point was not lost on the tsar, Napoleon III, the British government or the pope anymore than it was on Bismarck. Neither was the fact that the family had consistently declined invitations to open a bank in Berlin.

The fact that Jews who were sometimes conscripted, sometimes impressed in British naval style but very often kidnapped by military agents or "choppers",³⁷ had served with just as much distinction in the Russian army in the Crimea as any other Russians, could have eased the tensions. However anti-Jewish bigots had a ready-made scapegoat for their country's defeat.

Out came the well-trying conflict of interest arguments and accusations of a fifth column which had worked to undermine the internal war effort, to keep the country's friends out of the war and even to finance the war against it.

Tsar Alexander II who had succeeded his brother Nicholas I in the middle of the war knew that he faced the task of large scale social reconstruction as well as that of rebuilding Russia's relations with the rest of the powers. With serfdom discredited he set out to dismantle it. He took the first step immediately peace was signed by restricting hereditary benefits to only the top four ranks of the civil service instead of seven. Four years later the legal system was overhauled and rural courts were introduced. Then came the big step. On February 19 1861 the status of serfdom was abolished. At the stroke of a pen 38 percent of the Russian population, or 22.5 million out of a total of 60 million people, were released from the absolute authority of their landlords. They could vote at local elections, they gained the right to take legal action against others and they gained the right to own land. But they still paid a soul tax which other classes didn't and they remained attached to the land which they worked, having to obtain the permission of their commune before they could travel widely or shift. Where the commune system was not already known it was introduced. About the same number of people were bonded to the land as State peasants but in other respects they were free and not serfs in the sense of being subject to the absolute authority of their landlords. The emancipation proclamation therefore had little effect on them except that the serfs were elevated to about their level. Only one in five of the population, (12,000,000), were free to move and to buy and sell as they wished. They were the hereditary dvorians, clergy, burghers, independent farmers, the Cossacks and some other groups.³⁸

Unfortunately control of most of the land remained in the hands of the privileged few and the provisions for former serfs to buy their land were complicated and burdensome. This meant that although the intention behind emancipation of the serfs was farsighted the application of the policy fell far short of its target. After the flash of initial delight the former serfs found themselves trapped in a spiral of economic decline. Delight gave way to despair and, after just one generation, national crisis.³⁹

ALEXANDER AND LINCOLN SHARE COMMON AIMS

Alexander II had read the religious connections very clearly before he succeeded Nicholas and promptly acted on his assessment of that also. He ended the forced military conscription of Jewish youth, he curtailed the brainwashing and harassment of Jews in the army by the state church, and he opened the state schools to them. Those steps alone were of great importance but he took two other decisions of even greater political and social importance. He allowed Jews to settle beyond the pale, and he enlisted them in rebuilding Russia's banking system and in a crash program of industrial and railway development because of their connections with Western European banking houses. Jews moved strongly into the professions and new business opportunities although probably 95 percent remained in the pale.⁴⁰ It was all too good to last.

At the same time that Alexander II was achieving legal emancipation for Russia's serfs Abraham Lincoln was setting out to do the same for the slaves of the United States of America. While the history, politics and effects of tied labour exploitation in the two countries were quite different the basic problem was the same and there is no doubt that each of the leaders took heart from the progress of his counterpart in spite of their very different heritage. And in spite of protestations to the contrary the dominant power brokers of the young American republic were just as hell-bent on economic and territorial expansion as were their counterparts in the old world. The American equivalent of the Crimea was its Mexican adventures and the circumstances, participants and motives which became mixed in them were only a little less complicated.

Mexico, having thrown off its European masters, had become an anti-slavery republic of sorts with little means of preventing colonial encroachment from its northern neighbour. At the same time Britain's trade and slave actions against the United States had helped to build up tensions between groups for and against a slave-based economy in the republic and the role of some of the fragments of the church, notably the Vatican, has already been mentioned. Although most of the industrial development and immigrant settlement was taking place in the predominantly abolitionist northern states, the effective power balance tended to swing in favour of the anti-abolition states when Missouri joined the union in 1821. This prompted a more organized abolition campaign and the establishment of an American anti slavery society in 1833. The next generation saw tensions build to explosion point.

Arkansas, slave-holding territory, joined the union in 1836 and the American colonists encroaching into Mexican Texas, also slave-holding, claimed their independence the same year. They then agitated for annexation which they were "granted", together with membership of the union, in 1845 and the US thus gained a pretext for the annexation of New Mexico as well "in retaliation" for Mexico's attempt to recover Texas by force during 1846–1848.

Few people would have expected Europe's famine-induced rebellions which were in progress at the same time to couple with Ireland's famine and send a flood of immigrants and refugees across the Atlantic in search of a home, food and work. When it did, the rapid opening up of the farming regions of Iowa, Wisconsin, Minnesota and Oregon led to their admission into the union as non-slave states and the political balance lurched back in favour of abolition. But to expect such a basic issue to be resolved by means of the ballot box was to expect too much. Every refugee, every worker, every capitalist, every economic theorist and every politician held strong views that his future and the future of the USA depended either on the continuation of Negro slavery or on its abolition. Then there were those people who insisted that it was either an issue of human rights or religious belief, or both. As we have seen they were not all on the same side either, but they succeeded in bringing out the personal and community guilt complexes and in keeping emotions running high even if, numerically, they had limited impact. The region of Kansas, not then a state, split down the middle, became engulfed in its own mini civil war and provided a prelude for what lay ahead.

Tension continued to rise over the next few years so that by 1860, while Alexander II was carefully canvassing his serf emancipation proposals to avoid a frontal clash with Russia's landowning nobility, Abraham Lincoln was campaigning for the office of President of the USA on an abolition platform. His election in November that year, albeit on a minority vote, strengthened Alexander's position when he announced his decisions two months later and there was no violent backlash. But Lincoln wasn't so lucky. By the time of his inauguration on March 4th 1861 South Carolina had led a group of seven states out of the union to form the Confederate States of America and "the Confederates" had seized federal property, funds and equipment within their borders. When Lincoln called for the establishment of a federal army to defend the union another four states withdrew, joined the confederates and, in doing so, guaranteed that the war would be long, bloody and divisive.

It has been suggested that it took Lincoln four years, 600,000 dead Americans and his own assassination only a few days after peace had been signed to achieve in principle what Alexander appeared to have achieved at the stroke of a pen.⁴¹ Of course that doesn't tell the whole story. Russia's turn was still to come. After all Alexander had an autocratic, long established monarchy propped up by a despised, sacramental church and a nation which had been buffeted and demoralized by armies stung into action by means of crusading religious zeal. Against that Lincoln had a dynamic young democracy inspired by reformed Christian thinkers intent on fulfilling theology.

The healing process in the United States has been long and slow. However that fact tends to be camouflaged by the dynamic growth which followed the Civil War. In a mere four generations the USA grew materially to dominate the world. It has had within its grasp the means to lead the world forward and to achieve the dream of the founding fathers of fulfilling theology. Unfortunately it has fumbled the pass. The growth, prosperity, influence and authority which it experienced during that one hundred years fueled the popular belief that the people and policies of the United States of America were morally superior to the mere mortals of the rest of the world and that through some God-given power they would maintain their dominant position. Presidents and prelates have been happy to prop each other up in sickeningly repetitious play on their own and the nation's Christian principles.

There was a stage when it looked as if the United States was tearing itself apart European-style and that two or more smaller nations would replace it to compete between themselves and to reduce the effective economic and political competition with Europe. At that stage France, Britain and Spain joined forces to take advantage of America's troubles. They joined the Mexican adventure, helped themselves to a few spoils and tried to help along the process of American self-destruction at the same time.

But France aimed to set up a puppet empire in Mexico with an Austrian archduke, Maximilian, on the subordinate throne and Britain and Spain got cold feet, backed out and left France to stew in its own juice. When the Civil War ended the USA was in no mood for tomfoolery. It suddenly found it loved the Mexicans in the same way that Britain loved the Turks. It invoked the Monroe Doctrine and told France to go. It did, but Maximilian didn't. He clung to his Divine right until his unwilling subjects gave him the bullet. The whole abortive exercise helped to generate more friction in Europe. It contributed to war between Prussia and Austria, and then the one between France and Prussia which toppled Napoleon III from his throne, ushering in the Third Republic. Finally it helped to unify Italy and, temporarily, end the temporal rule of the papacy. The Piedmontese army was able to invade and capture Rome immediately after the somewhat delayed French withdrawal in September 1870 (to defend Paris) which had been promised to draw Piedmont into the Crimean War 16 years earlier.

COMPETITION IN ASIA: CHURCHES PROVE USEFUL

In the meantime Britain let its guard drop and its real motives behind the anti-slave-trade naval actions were exposed for what they were: economic and political gain. Britain's establishment joined forces with the Confederate slave-holding states and helped to finance, organize and recruit for three "privateers" which blockaded the ports of the northern union states.⁴² The government, which was supposedly blockading the Confederate States to end the slave trade, turned a blind eye. Trade with the East was booming because of the blockade of American goods, especially cotton goods for Europe, and the possibilities in Japan were immense.

Of course the British government needed some pretext or cover to justify an increased interest in Japanese affairs. So did France in China and Indo China. There was none better than the church! To put these two approaches in perspective we have to go back to Europe's hunt for resources and the church-universal attitudes, coupled with the Reformation, which followed the capture of Constantinople by the Turkish Muslims.

In 1542, the same year that Francis Xavier arrived in Goa, the Portuguese had established Europe's first direct trade links with Japan. Seven years later Xavier rode in with them to set up a Christian base at Kagoshima on the island of Kyushu. Other bases were soon established and except for the fact that the Japanese were said to be of very good manners, poor but not shameful, more honest in not thieving, desirous of knowledge and not as submissive as the people of Goa, the approach to settlement and conversion was very much the same.⁴³

CIVILIZATIONS IN CONFLICT

Twenty two years later the base at Nagasaki was taken over by the Jesuits. They soon grew fat through acting as bullion brokers between Japan and China, exchanging large amounts of Japanese silver for Chinese gold. They also grew numerically strong through anti-Buddhist political intrigue in collaboration with Oda Nobunaga who traded patronage and protection for Jesuit support. By 1582 they could boast 75 priests and 150,000 "converts." And yet after only another five years the dissension which was so well known in Europe and Latin America had found its way to Japan through the influence of the official Jesuit 'Visitor', Alessandri Valignano. Perhaps inquisitor may have been a better title. That was at the same time that Akbar was trying to reconcile the four faiths of India. It had taken only a few years for the faction fighting between the competing Roman Catholic missions, including the Dominicans and the Franciscans, and Protestants who had arrived by then, to become so disruptive that an edict was issued expelling all foreign Christian missions from Japan.

That was 1587. But not everyone went, and a Catholic seminary was opened in 1593. Four years later six missionaries and twenty converts lost their heads and the generation barrier had hardly been broken when, in 1614, an edict was issued to confirm the earlier one. A touch of systematic persecution and execution was added to see that this one was obeyed. Being fairly expert at it from very long experience, the Catholic missions reversed the process and began to persecute Buddhists who were silly enough to stay around converted communities, and Protestants. Just another generation on and in 1638, following a rebellion which cost 37,000 lives, not only the missionaries but all Europeans except a few Dutch traders were expelled and Japan totally sealed its borders against travel between Japan and Europe. By that stage the Christian population, estimated at 300,000 at the turn of the century, was thought to be effectively eliminated, or at least frightened into reconversion.^{44 45}

Two civilizations which had a lot to offer each other became almost totally isolated and antagonistic because of the church's misunderstanding of itself and other faiths. Under a succession of ruling groups Japan rigidly applied a policy of Chinese and Dutch traders only, and even they were allowed only in Nagasaki Harbour in strictly controlled numbers. Japan reverted to a feudal system of government and land ownership and became locked into it. From the time of the Napoleonic Wars when the European powers, Russia and America were all jockeying for trade and naval supremacy it repulsed repeated approaches out of fear of a repeat performance of the Christian affair.

Then in the 1830s Britain's naval activities, officially aimed at stopping the Atlantic slave trade, began to cause the USA more and more difficulties. At the same time the push west towards the Pacific coast was picking up steam. The USA already had some whalers operating in the Pacific and the idea of expansion beyond the ocean had a magical appeal. Europe had done it. Why shouldn't America? It would offset Britain's naval tactics and secure at least a diplomatic advantage by way of retaliation. It was worth a try. The US Government sent four diplomatic missions to Asia between 1835 and 1849 but they were all firmly rejected. The government looked on helplessly at first while Britain and France imposed their trade treaties and territorial claims on China and Indo China, and then it finally decided to force an entry into Japan before either of them did.

COMMODORE PERRY'S INTERPRETER

Commodore Perry arrived in Edo (Tokyo) Bay in July 1853 complete with seventeen castaway Japanese as a bargaining point, and a missionary as an interpreter, of course. He left without an answer but he was back again eight months later with a quarter of the US navy and a landing party of 500 troops. That time, March 1854, he left with a trade treaty. Japan could no longer resist. In quick succession it signed trade treaties with Britain, (October 1854), Russia, (February 1855) and Holland. As a result the USA had lost some of the advantage gained from its initiative in gunboat diplomacy, but not all, and Britain and France played into its hands by declaring war on China in 1856 as soon as they were free of their commitment in the Crimea. The church obliged with the justification. A French priest had been murdered and China would pay dearly for such an outrage!

America's consul took full advantage of the British/French action and in July 1858 he extracted a comprehensive, preferential trade treaty from Japan. It provided for the exchange of diplomats of ministerial rank, extraterritorial privileges for Americans resident in Japan, and a defence pact to protect Japan from British action such as that against China. Again Japan couldn't resist and within a matter of weeks it had accepted similar trade arrangements with Holland, Russia, Britain and France. However it stood firm on one condition. No Christian missionaries.

In spite of that condition which their trading partners had acknowledged, it comes as no surprise that the Japanese very soon found themselves reluctant hosts to all sorts of foreigners admitted under the new treaties and that missionaries were among them. A "new era" began in 1859 with four American Protestant and one Roman Catholic mission in action and an Orthodox priest, attached to the Russian diplomatic mission, soon followed. After more than two hundred years of isolation it was natural that friction built up rapidly. The political stability of Japan was undermined and the old order began to crumble. Power shifted rapidly and centralized in a few powerful hands. The Shogun came under pressure to expel all "foreign barbarians" and even though he knew that it would be impractical to enforce, he set June 25, 1863, as the final expulsion date. When the domain of Choshu tried to close its straits to foreign shipping by artillery bombardment it was enough to make Britain, France, Holland and the USA to bury their differences, momentarily, anyway. They sent a combined fleet to destroy the forts and demand a $US3,000,000 indemnity which was later postponed in favour of even more favourable trade treaties.⁴⁶

In the meantime, the American Civil War had moved into top gear, the US Government was preoccupied with its troubles at home and Britain had a fairly free hand in the Japanese sphere. Making the most of an incident involving the death of a British traveler, and capitalizing on the persecution of a Christian community which had been found to have links with the early Kagoshima missions, the navy pounded much of that city flat and sunk the Japanese ships in port. It didn't matter that Britain had no connection with the Kagoshima mission, that no British nationals were involved and that it was a question of relations between two cultural groups within the Japanese community. They were Christians and that made it Britain's business. Or at least it was an excuse to intervene. So impressed were the Japanese authorities with the display of naval power that they turned to Britain for naval aid and the ships which became the training ground for Japan's modern navy.

JAPAN'S DRIVE FOR RELIGIOUS IDENTITY

But Japan was on its knees and totally humiliated. Civil War was unavoidable. In 1868 the Shogunate fell, the emperor assumed many of the functions of the dictators, a new constitution was adopted, and a crash program of modernization and industrialization as well as military and naval expansion was begun immediately. It was the only way to achieve the capacity to resist such crushing western domination. The Japanese swallowed their pride, dropped their opposition to western influence and the church was allowed back in business. That part was very simple. The British Government simply imposed a condition that no country could have a British diplomatic or commercial mission unless it had a Christian mission as well. After all, Britain may need another convenient excuse for either diplomatic or military intervention and, besides that, it was good domestic politics. Passports for Christian Arab clergy or not, there could no longer be any denial that Protestant Christianity was just as much an appendage of Western culture as pre-Reformation Christianity was of the Holy Roman Empire.

But more humiliation was to come for Japan before it adopted a new religious position of its own. In view of the apparent influence of the Christian church the chief order of Buddhist monks, the Sangha, which had been closely associated with the old social and political order, became a scapegoat for the nation's troubles. A reign of persecution started and Ryobu or Double-aspect Shinto, the syncretic amalgam of Buddhism and Shinto which had dominated the faith of the nation for about a thousand years, was abolished.⁴⁷ Shinto in its simplified form, based on the mythology of the creation of Japan, was declared the state religion and enjoyed a great revival. Japan was simply following the victor's example. Britain had confirmed again, with great determination and with gunships at the ready, that there was a normal, formal and strong link between state and church. In its case it was Christianity. No Christian missions, then no trade or diplomatic missions either. That linkage could not possibly have been stated any more definitely. Britain could therefore hardly complain if Japan's reaction was to formally establish its own state religion. Not Christianity. Shinto. Acknowledgment of, and reverence for the emperor in the revised emperor-centred Shinto became the trigger for heroism and fanaticism in the Japanese way of life and service.⁴⁸ When he came out of seclusion at Kyoto in 1869 and took Tokyo as his imperial capital Emperor Meiji's new role was enhanced, or perhaps sanctified, by the British regimental band accompanying him in procession past the foreign settlement to the tune 'British Grenadiers.'⁴⁹

To Europeans, accustomed to a history of horrendous religious persecution and violence, it should be somewhat surprising that within only four or five years all religious persecution had stopped and in 1875 freedom of religion became official. However the emperor's role was further enhanced by the success of the westernization program which took effect with great speed under the new constitution which he had introduced. The ban on travel beyond Japan was lifted and as many students as possible were sent abroad to study all professions, sciences and trades. However a program of intense indoctrination of the masses in State Shinto and the mythology of the divine origins of the country and its rulers was used to encourage devotion to the land and its imperial institutions.⁵⁰

Twenty years after the big shake-up, in 1889, Japan strengthened the link between religion and state further by writing Shinto into the new Meiji Constitution which was modelled on Bismark's constitution for the Second German Reich which had been introduced in 1871. Article III of the Meiji constitution read: "The Emperor is sacred and inviolable." The Japanese had simply lifted it straight out of the German Christian doctrine on the Divine Right of Kings which held sway on both sides of the Reformation divide, except that it had been weakened somewhat in Anglicanism by the confrontation between James II and the Church of England. According to that doctrine a monarch in the hereditary line of succession has a divine and indefeasible right to his kingship and authority, and for a subject to rebel against him is the worst of political crimes and even a sin against God.⁵¹ The Japanese must have felt they were in very good company, and the words of the constitution did not say that the emperor was divine or a personification of God. However in a commentary which was published later to help people understand the new constitution the concept of the central role of the emperor as a descendant of the chief goddess, Amaterasu, was given heavy emphasis. Part of that Meiji commentary has been translated to read: "The Emperor is Heaven-descended, divine and sacred; He is pre-eminent above all his subjects. He must be revered and is inviolable ... Not only shall there be no irreverence for the Emperor's person, but also shall he not be made a topic of derogatory comment nor one of discussion."⁵² (Emphasis added.) The church had long claimed divine authority for its Popes by virtue of their being successors to Peter the Apostle and therefore Christ's personal deputy on earth, and by the laying on of (very human) hands. That claimed authority was in turn a substantial basis of the Vatican's policy of Ultramontanism, or the control of the church in every country under the Roman figurehead, and the authority to invest, and to exercise authority over, imperial and subordinate monarchs.

Observers not committed to one faith or another may well find it difficult to distinguish between the practical theology involved in the Meiji Commentary, or the Tibetan Buddhist concept (recognized by one stream of the faithful) that the Dalai Lama is the reincarnation of the Being of Compassion, or that Christian belief in the transmission of authority through the laying on of hands in the ceremony of priestly ordination. In any case, the person of the Japanese emperor became the subject of adoration.

But by using the expression 'Heaven-descended, divine and sacred' the Meiji commentator had actually jumped ahead of the Vatican – by just a few years. It was not until 1929 when Pius XI was addressing the clergy of Rome on the occasion of the signing of the Lateran Treaty that he caught up with Japan by describing the person holding the office of Pope as "holding the Divine Commission and being the Divine Representative, (who) cannot be subject to any earthly sovereign."

By the end of the century eighteen nations had concluded treaties with Japan but, as was China, the nation was indignant because of its inferior status in treaty relations. For the next fifty years it was the prime objective in Japan's foreign policy to revise the old treaties or to negotiate new ones on the basis of equality and reciprocity. It objected to the heavy heel of the European powers and it knew from first hand experience exactly how all of the European colonies in Asia felt.⁵³

After World War I ultra-nationalists published an Outline for the Reconstruction of Japan and during the years after the Great Depression their philosophy, cloaked in State Shinto, became anti-West, anti-liberal, anti-socialist, anticommunist, anti-democratic, anti-parliamentary, anti-League of Nations and anti-disarmament but strongly imperialist, authoritarian and committed to totalitarianism at home and the use of force on the Asian continent.⁵⁴

PASSPORTS FOR FRENCH 'MISSIONARIES'

The position over on the Asian mainland, in China and Indochina, had been much the same as in Japan during the second half of the 19th century. One of the clauses of a treaty which France had extracted from China provided for French missionaries to rent and purchase land and to put up buildings on it in all the provinces of the country. To take full advantage of that treaty Napoleon III issued an order in 1860 that all Roman Catholic missionaries were to carry passports written in both French and Chinese. The French text carried the facts. The Chinese text stated that the bearer was French irrespective of his actual nationality. And it was apparently remarkably easy to get a French missionary's passport delivered personally to the intended bearer by the Consular Agents for France. So much for a commitment to Christianity. If the British could do it, the French could go one step further.

The cynical misuse of treaty powers, including intervention in civil and criminal legal proceedings under "protection" clauses as well as the property clauses, encouraged converts with a wide range of motives. The credibility of the church and Christianity was undermined in the eyes of both people of other faiths and the authorities who were powerless to stop such abuses for a long time. But numerically the Christian population mushroomed together with the number of missionaries. The procedure set up by Napoleon III continued until 1888.⁵⁵

Napoleon III had learned well from his more famous uncle as well as from the British. When he approved the concordat with the pope, Napoleon Bonaparte had declared that Christian missions should be re-established in Asia, Africa and America and that the sanctity of their dress would conceal their political and commercial investigations. In 1805 he ordered that the three French Catholic Missionary orders be reconstituted and revitalized, with state money of course.

But France's fortunes in South East Asia had already been linked with the influence of the church for some time. During the early 1680s, while Dutch interests were forcing the British out of Java, French Jesuit influence at the court of the King of Thailand had led to him severing nasty Dutch Protestant commercial connections. Direct representations by the church resulted in "protective" French troops being garrisoned at Bangkok and Mergui and France's plans for domination of the state took a big leap forward. But the situation changed suddenly. In 1688 the Francophile Minister for Trade was executed, the king died and violent anti-European reaction swept the French out of the country.

During the previous couple of generations the Jesuits had also set up missions in North Vietnam and so they consolidated there. Their history and relations with the authorities in Vietnam had been just as checkered as in Thailand, but one positive contribution which they had made to the life of the country had been the reduction of the Vietnamese language to writing in the Latin alphabet. This had established a tradition of French interest in the region with Christian and French literature readily available in the local language. Even thirty years before the French expulsion from Thailand the church claimed 300,000 adherents in Vietnam but, being based on its usual assessment methods, the figure must be taken with a pinch of salt.⁵⁶ However when the Tayson uprisings occurred in 1771 the church seemed to have backed a loser in the royal houses of Nguyen and Trinh. The ruling dynasty fell in 1777 in a mini prototype of the impending French Revolution. The Tayson brothers divided the country into three semi-autonomous regions with themselves at the top and Saigon, Hue and Hanoi as their capitals. They didn't want the church. It was not linked into the new system and its influence fell, so a refugee priest of the French Society, Pigneau de Behaine, teamed up with the exiled heir of the Nguyen family, Anh, and began plotting his return.

In 1787 Pigneau took Anh's son to Versailles and got Louis XVI to support an adventure to put Anh on a throne. The prize was to be a treaty between Cochin China and France, and an open gate to Eastern trade. Louis needed anything which would bolster the monarchy's ailing coffers. During the next few years, while French anti-monarchists were tearing France apart and dismantling the church, Pigneau's French "volunteers" were helping Anh tear Vietnam apart to establish his monarchy and to assert the authority of the church. In 1802 Anh proclaimed himself Emperor GiaLong of a "unified" Vietnam. French troops continued to build his forts and ports, Pigneau continued to run his foreign affairs, the Catholic Church gloated over its new status and Vietnam became a closed book as far as Protestant representation of any kind was concerned.⁵⁷

58

THAILAND: THE PROTESTANT OPTION

Then came that American interest in the Asian Pacific region in the 1830s and Thailand was swamped by American Protestant groups wanting to take advantage of the French vacuum. Congregationalists arrived first, (1831), then Baptists (1833) and Presbyterians in 1840. Polite and friendly the Thai people certainly were, but they were also resistant to evangelism. They were perfectly happy with Buddhism. Either the sales pitch for the new religion with its complicated definitions and beliefs had to be a lot better, or the sledge hammer had to be a lot heavier before they would buy. Of course the continuing fiercely anti-foreign attitudes of the king and the Buddhist priests didn't make their tasks any easier and the Congregationalists withdrew in 1849, after eighteen years, without one Thai baptized. It was another ten years before the Presbyterians baptized their first Thai convert.

America had achieved a commercial treaty in 1833 but it had little to show for it other than the incitement of further French and British competition. The French continued to be rebuffed but when two British hatchet men cum diplomats, (Bowring and Parkes), arrived in 1855 to soften up Thailand (after the seizure of Lower Burma) before going on to start another war with China, the king got the message and signed a very unequal treaty. It was a signal for a repeat of the Japanese situation. One in, all in. Treaties with the other powers followed in quick succession.⁵⁹ Naturally the one with France, signed in 1856, provided for the return of the French Catholic missions. Their methods achieved the usual high rate of conversions compared with the Protestants and it wasn't long before all the fun of the games was on again.

Each of the foreign powers knew that there were bigger fish in the region but Britain was in a stronger position to dominate a partnership approach to both China and Japan, so France was prepared to accept second prize and concentrate its efforts in South East Asia. Taking advantage of the strong Jesuit base in Vietnam Napoleon III set his sights on Indo China. But the native Christian rebels who the missionaries had said would come swarming out of the jungles did not appear when two thousand French troops, supported by one thousand Spaniards from Manila, swooped on Tourane (DaNang) in September 1858. The pretext for the invasion was that Tu-Duc, succeeding to the throne set up by Pigneau's 'volunteers' and holding to his Confucianism, had tried to break up the Christian missions and communities. An alternative interpretation is that the Jesuits had prompted his reaction when they set out to undermine him because he wouldn't play the game to their rules.

However dysentery, cholera, scurvy and typhus all took their toll in the jungle, heat and tropical monsoon conditions which the French and Spanish troops were not accustomed to. Unable to advance a mere fifty miles to capture the capital, Hue, they moved south and seized Saigon in February 1859. But it was not until after the joint Anglo-French subjugation of Peking in 1860 when the French were able to throw in more forces and to take advantage of internal rebellion in Tongking Province that Tu-Duc was forced to sign the Treaty of Saigon. France was ceded the three eastern provinces of Cochin China and secured promises of more trade. It also got a vague protectorate over Vietnam's foreign relations and, naturally, guarantees of 'religious freedom.' Spain, for whatever reason, got a financial indemnity.⁶⁰

For its part Vietnam got proof that it had a well developed fifth column in its midst, even if the local content hadn't been as effective as the missionaries had imagined. Back in Europe the church had been very vocal about Jewish fifth columns and equally vocal in denying its own behind the scenes involvement in undermining governments in countries such as Britain and France when it was in conflict with them. Then Napoleon Bonaparte had shown, through his Sanhedrin, that Jews had less reason than Christians to organize fifth columns and now his nephew had obliged, with his Jesuit missionaries' help, to demonstrate openly that the Christian Church quite happily organized fifth columns.

We cannot trace the ghastly net of intrigue, the shift in rebellion from Tu-Duc to the French, continuing religious manipulation and savage colonial repression which went to fashion twentieth century French Indo China, but the die had been cast. In any case we have caught up again to Napoleon III's passport directive and the affairs of Mexico, Prussia and the half-dug Suez Canal which were diverting his attention from Asia. He had to apply his Christian principles in other areas.

THE STRUTS OF CHRISTIAN BELIEF

Meanwhile, in 1859, just as the "new era" was opening for Christian missions in Japan, two developments occurred which, on the surface anyway, had nothing to do with the church. Charles Darwin published The Origin of Species in England and an oil well was drilled at Titusville in Pennsylvania, USA. In fact if the church had stuck to its task of spreading the Good News of the Gospel instead of setting itself up as the be-all-and-end-all then both developments would have seemed quite natural. After all they were quite natural. They would have simply contributed towards humanity's communal evolution and towards its material progress without a ripple of dissent. But the church knew everything. The oil well can wait a while but this is the point at which to examine the impact of Darwin's work and we must again retrace our steps to pick up a few threads.

The pre-Reformation church had put heavy emphasis on outward displays of religion through complex rites and sacraments. The Bible was not available to ordinary people. It could only be interpreted for them by the exclusively inspired clergy and in any case the church said it was its sacraments, or its 'works', and not an understanding of the Gospel which got a believer through the mystical barrier and into heaven. As we have already noted these attitudes, coupled with Rome's resistance to reform, encouraged many reformers to put an equally heavy emphasis on the need for a personal knowledge of the Bible, on its historical accuracy or "inerrancy" and on the coexistence of the church with the Gospel from the beginning of time, irrespective of the history of the people of Judaism and the errors of the pre-Reformation church in the intervening period.^{61 62} It followed that the Reformed churches put the emphasis in the ordination of their clergy on the ministry of the word before the ministry of the sacraments which they reduced from seven, the number recognized by the Council of Trent, (or possibly up to thirty depending on the interpretation applied), to a basic two, namely baptism and communion.

In fact there is no uniformity in belief within or between churches about what defines or constitutes a sacrament or its status in the divine design. Some of the schisms during the pre-Reformation period occurred because of disputes over sacraments, and many theologians went to the stake holding firm in their efforts to rewrite sacramental theology as we have already seen. Substantial progress has been made in two directions since the rise of the ecumenical movement and, more so, since the Second Vatican Council. The first is in encouraging tolerance or the acceptance of diversity in theology. The second is in the adoption of common liturgies (the orders of service and the forms in which ideas will be expressed). But the major questions have not yet been tackled effectively and denominations and movements still form, dispute and divide over such issues.

Is a sacrament an action taken or a rite invoked simply in response to Christ's teaching? Is it a matter of reverence and remembrance or recognition of Christ's personal or divine sacrifice? Is it symbolic of certain relationships between mankind and God? Does it carry mystical or magical effects unique to either the church's capacity to intervene in human affairs or bestowed by God through the Holy Spirit? If so, is it repeatable? Or is it a gateway to heaven or salvation available exclusively to adherents of the Christian church? If any one of these concepts can be affirmed for a particular sacrament does that mean that the other concepts are excluded, especially in the case of baptism or the Eucharist? If there is only one correct answer, how do we tell which branch of the church is correct, and what does the answer mean for the others? Can there be more than one 'correct' or 'proper' answer or response? If the Christian church does have an exclusive gateway to heaven and salvation what does it say about God's relationship with all of non-Christian humanity? Or, perhaps more to the point, what does it say about the church's pathetic handling of such a position of privilege? But if the church does not have an exclusive gateway to heaven and salvation what does that say about its self-understanding, the development of its doctrine and dogma, and the development of its sacramental theology and liturgies? In particular what does it say about the relationship between the church, Christ and God?

These questions, and a host of others which can be added, all lead back inevitably to the church's self-understanding and the doctrine of the Trinity. Unravel the contradictions in the possible combination of answers to those questions and you may just unravel the church. The church would then have to start all over again. But that is a proposition which neither the Reformers nor the continuing Roman Catholic Church were any more prepared to consider when they took sides and took up arms against each other over the issue of the sacraments or the Word than they had been at any time since the Council of Nicaea. It is a proposition which the church must now tackle. When it gets the fundamental answers right the supplementary matters such as forms of worship and liturgies will be easy to resolve. The trouble in the triangle will simply get worse and the pressure greater until it does. We shall, of course, come back to this issue in due course but we are now at the point of Darwin's challenge.

Some of the Reformed churches had elevated 'The Book' to a level of importance similar to that which Muhammad had given it, (Torah and Gospel together), just one thousand years earlier, but they adopted a somewhat different emphasis. Taking an extreme view, the Second (Baptist) Confession of 1677 described Holy Scripture as "the only sufficient, certain and infallible rule of all saving knowledge, faith and obedience." Nothing was to be added at any time to its total revelation either by supposed new revelations or by the traditions of men.⁶³ If that were taken seriously by an isolated community it would inhibit its religious understanding in a manner much the same as happened when the Orthodox Church moved to Moscow and froze its theology. In a sense the Church of Scotland had gone even further with its side swipe at Rome in the opening chapter of the Westminster Confession of 1643/47. It declared that God's former ways of revealing His will, creation and revelation, had ceased and that this "maketh the holy scripture to be most necessary." It declared the Old Testament to rank equally in authenticity with the New Testament, that they were, together, the final point of appeal and that any interpretation of scripture could only be made by cross-reference to other parts of it. Then came the punch line. "The supreme Judge by which all controversies of religion are to be determined, and all decrees of councils, opinions of ancient writers, doctrines of men, and private spirits, are to be examined, and in whose sentence we are to rest, can be no other but the Holy Spirit speaking in the scripture."⁶⁴

The greatest tragedy behind those sections of both the Westminster and the Baptist Confessions is that for the majority of people who accepted them, God's authority, power and action were effectively anchored in the past. If revelation had stopped then it followed that, subject to a touch of guidance if the Holy Spirit could make itself heard, the church had been left with absolute authority.

ABSOLUTE FACT?

Quite naturally such statements had not resolved the question of Biblical inerrancy for the church-at-large. If anything they had fueled debate, especially over the status of the Old Testament. The church got itself deeper into that long-standing bind. It had already defined itself into a corner from which it could not move without starting the whole process over again and it had also canonized the Bible in contradictory ways. Either the whole Bible was inerrant or the church was not what it claimed to be. So the Bible was inerrant. That shifted the debate a trifle to the issue of whether, as a document, the Bible was historically absolutely accurate or whether it was partly record and partly revelation which was open to interpretation. In self justification the bulk of the church came down on the side of absolute accuracy. That is hardly surprising in view of the doctrinal bind it was in and the ordination vows taken by the clergy.

Even today there are plenty of scholars and writers who will admit that a person can be a Christian without accepting Biblical inerrancy and then proceed to claim that denial of inerrancy is dangerous. Evangelical fervour will fail in future generations if we forego inerrancy as a belief now, they say.⁶⁵ Rather brittle bricks with which to build a universal church. If that is the case today after several generations of dynamic developments in science and philosophy we cannot be surprised that the church clung to such views in the first half of the nineteenth century.

A literal approach to the Book of Genesis naturally leads a reader to wonder when the world was created and to accept that every living creature was created complete and in its currently known form. However for Jewish believers this had seldom been a problem. For them the Torah, both its written and oral portions, were timeless even though they were received at particular points in historical time. It was a guide which included the fundamental law by which Israel had to live or take the consequences.⁶⁶ It was a living thing and although there had been several Talmudic controversies it had not been canonized in the Christian church's sense. Israel and Judaism were defined in the sense that their roles were understood through the Torah but the institution and authority of Judaism were not anchored to it in the way that the church had anchored itself to definitions, Biblical canons and doctrines. Israel's mission was seen as a matter of eternity. It was no more related to a particular point in time or to a particular action than was the Torah. The Torah was therefore utterly incompatible with frivolous things like trying to date future events or past history. And as well as that the Jews were very conscious of the fallibility of human nature. Successive generations had tried to pass on both the oral and the written traditions with as much accuracy as they could achieve, but they knew that errors of fact could creep in. The essence of faithfulness to the Torah was therefore prayerful interpretation and understanding of, and adherence to, the law rather than unquestioning acceptance of historical "facts" handed down from an era in mankind's evolution when he was not in a position to fully understand their import. But once the Reformed churches put the Torah into every person's hands as the canonized Bible they had to face up to that problem, and debate over things such as the date and mechanism of creation and the basis and authority for sacraments was to be expected.

A DATE FOR CREATION

About a hundred years after the Reformation broke over Europe a vice-chancellor of Cambridge University tried to calculate the date and time of creation precisely from Biblical sources. Few people seemed to think it strange and a lot of people, clergy included, took seriously his answer of nine o'clock in the morning on October 23rd 4004 BCE (He would have based his calculations on Greenwich Mean Time, of course!) At the time of the mad rush for education which was triggered by the Napoleonic Wars the standard approach to the issue in England was that creation could probably be dated a few thousand years BCE and that all species were created complete. The standard references for school and university study were William Paley's Natural Theology (or evidences of the existence and attributes of the Deity) which had been published in 1802, and the Bridgewater Treatises. These had been financed from a bequest of Stg 8,000 pounds by the Earl of Bridgewater for the purpose of demonstrating the power, wisdom and goodness of God as manifested in the creation by using all reasonable arguments.⁶⁷ The church and its aristocratic and industrialist backers were rushing to churn out a good supply of capitalistic monarchists imbued with the Protestant Work Ethic and antagonistic towards any revolutionary tendencies. The most likely motive behind that bequest to the Royal Society therefore appears to be much like that behind a lot of commercially sponsored 'research and promotion' today: "Here's the money to produce some results or other evidence to show that what I want to sell is good."

That line was being peddled in spite of works by earlier scholars and writers which tended to point to alternative interpretations. Studies in archaeology and palaeontology had already shown that some species of animals had existed previously and were then extinct and Malthus had published his Essay on Population in 1798. He had written that the growth of population will always tend to outrun food supply unless it is checked by either voluntary restraints or external forces such as war, disease or famine. He was later misrepresented by those who wanted to show that humanity could be improved by the elimination of those who were unfit or undesirable and who used up part of the world's food supply, but the idea of evolution had been triggered and would soon be discussed and denigrated in high places.

THE DARWIN-WALLACE CHALLENGE

Then Charles Darwin and Alfred Wallace contributed to the debate with papers prepared for a meeting of the Linnean Society in 1858. They had both reached the conclusion, by different paths, that all species of animals, including humanity, had evolved by natural selection and had not been created in finished form. The reaction was immediate and bitter but the two men had worked long and hard at the issue. They knew quite well what the implications were, they were confident that they were correct and they would not retract because of ridicule by the church and their fellows. Darwin pushed ahead to complete The Origin of Species and it was published the next year. The first printing sold out in a day. Reactions varied greatly.

Some scientists were concerned about the need to review a whole host of existing scientific theories and attitudes and the implication that they had been wrong in their own research and teaching until then. Because of that the older members of his profession attacked Darwin bitterly for faulty scientific method and speculation. But younger members took up his theories and began to build on them.

Many of Britain's aristocratic New World estate owners and its racial bigots were concerned to exploit the implication which they read into Darwin's work that selection may have produced people of inferior stock in Africa and Asia. Through it they hoped to revive the slave trade which they could see would close altogether if the Union States defeated the Confederate States in the Civil War which was just getting up steam in the USA. Others took the view that the new race morality developing in Britain was spurious and that programs to assist black Africa or to enforce racial justice and equality were therefore a misdirection of effort and resources.

But the church was concerned to protect its position and the Church of England was in the most delicate position of all. Its hierarchy reacted sharply with vigorous efforts to discredit Darwin. Bishop Wilberforce, (son of the C.M.S. cofounder, Bible Society president, M.P. and antislavery crusader), who had founded Cuddesdon Theological College only six years earlier, took up the issue in a public debate with the biologist T.H. Huxley at the British Association in 1860. His sarcastic and derogatory attitude provoked Huxley to remark that he would rather have an ape for a grandfather than a man who misused his gifts to obscure important scientific discussion by rhetoric and religious prejudice.⁶⁸

The basic problem or crisis for the church was the very clear challenge to its credibility and its authority. It saw it as 'Darwin or the church.' If Darwin was correct then the church had been peddling lies about creation. If it had been peddling lies about creation then how authentic was the Bible on which it pinned its existence and its claims for authority? It could see its doctrines all thrown out the window and its formal constitution under threat. Furthermore, if creation was either spontaneous or circumstantial and not the result of some grand design, then even the existence of a creative deity would be questioned. It was. The church could adopt the Jewish attitude to the Bible and toss away the Biblical inerrancy which it had spent so much time and effort enshrining but what would that achieve? Its policy towards Judaism and Jews would be shot to ribbons, it would be admitting that a very basic doctrinal error had been proven, and where would it all end? The church was already having difficulty raising funds for its Jerusalem missions, Sir Moses Montefiore was the darling of the mob and the Lords had even allowed that man Rothschild to take his seat in the Commons on July 26th 1858, less than four weeks after Darwin and Wallace had addressed the Linnean Society and if the Jews were proven right on such a basic issue then what about the Muslims?

Then there was the "establishment" issue. The Church of England had survived the upheavals between church and state on the continent during the post-reformation period largely through isolation but also partly through walking a theological tightrope.⁶⁹ It had juggled the theology of Rome, Luther and Calvin to get a hotchpotch which was seen to put it in a balanced or middle-of-the-road position which avoided the institutional crises of Europe. It also produced the High Church-Low Church orientation of the English community. However an effect little recognized at the time was that the Church of England was assuming the role and posture of the Orthodox church in Russia. It was the highly nationalistic church of England and it was intent on propping up the English system without any outside interference, Roman or otherwise.⁷⁰ Strangely enough it then managed to avoid its own revolution during the industrial revolution and the French Revolution due to two factors. Firstly, the impact of Wesley and Methodism while they remained within the Church of England. Secondly the fact that Methodism, by then effectively separated, and Evangelicalism gave comfort, support and courage to those whom God appeared to have abandoned through the Church of England's absolute identification with an establishment which was hostile to the poor, unclean, moral aliens of the working classes.⁷¹

72

However events were catching up with it and it was under intense scrutiny. The repeal of the Test Act in 1828, and the passing of the Catholic Emancipation Act the next year marked a loosening of the state/church strings. The government's hesitant acceptance of the re-establishment of a Roman Catholic hierarchy in 1851, based on an Archbishopric of Westminster which was vigorously opposed by Lord Russell, confirmed the drift towards religious impartiality and threatened "autonomy" or, more crudely, the requirement for financial self-support in competition with other religious bodies. The church had been fighting the trend quite strongly, notably through the Russell-led anti-Catholic campaign and the anti-Jewish debate in the Lords, but having lost that battle it was determined to hold onto its formal links with the crown, diplomatic privilege and a preferred position with the government in relation to its competitors and the community, not only in Britain but in the colonies as well. The Ecclesiastical Titles Bill of 1851, (repealed in 1871), threatening penalties for competition between hierarchies and aimed directly at Rome, was one such effort.⁷³ ⁷⁴ Some related issues were actually before the Commons when Bishop Wilberforce took up debate with Huxley. Darwinism was a most unfortunate jolt to the system which, by undermining public faith and support for any religion at all, added a new factor in the overall debate about an “established” church.

Darwinism aggravated the feeling of a lack of continuity and purpose in man’s affairs which the philosophy of Scotsman David Hume had generated. It also destroyed the intimacy between man and other creatures in nature over which he had been created a little superior, according to the church and its Bible. But it also gave even greater credence to the writings of Marx and Engels. The hierarchy heaved a sigh of relief. Saved! The establishment still needed the church. It didn’t matter much how many pews were vacant now.

BRITAIN’S ‘UNIFORMITY’ AND THE POPE’S ‘ERRORS’

Parliament passed an Act of Uniformity in 1862 setting out essential systems of church discipline and requiring the Book of Common Prayer, complete with Athanasius and prayers for the queen, to be used in all churches for morning and evening prayers on Sundays. Three years later, in 1865, it passed the Clerical Subscriptions Act which, although it weakened the role of the sovereign in the church, confirmed the status of the Church of England as the established church.^{75 76}

By that time Pope Pius IX, having real difficulty clinging to his temporal powers in the papal states and with his political philosophy under attack from almost every quarter, had lashed out at the critics of his church/state links in the pathetic Syllabus of Errors in December 1864. His frustrations had got the better of him when, three months earlier and just ten years after his previous promise to do so, Napoleon III had again promised to take his troops out of Rome. However Napoleon’s promise proved almost as hollow as the first time. Although he needed his troops for some of his own wars rather than to prop up the papacy he could not withdraw them for long because the pope could still pull too many strings in France.

Pius concluded his outrageous attack on almost everything progressive in political, cultural and academic endeavour with condemnation of the ‘error’ that “The Roman Pontiff may and ought to reconcile himself to, and to agree with, progress, liberalism, and modern civilization.” Very revealing. He confirmed his personal ignorance, his bigotry, his failure to understand that humanity was evolving progressively as a community of rational beings and he confirmed his personal misinterpretation of the identity and role of the church. If he had been in any other post at all his outburst could have been glossed over. But he was, to the world’s Roman Catholics, personal successor to the Apostle Peter and absolute head of the body appointed as sole representative on earth of the Messiah. He had to be taken seriously. Among the things which took a blast were freedom of conscience and worship; freedom of speech and press; the authority of civil law; civil marriage; divorce; public education; freedom of association even to form Bible Societies; state acquisition of church property; the right to refuse to conform in matters of religion; associating with non-Catholics; Socialism and, of course, Communism. Among the authorities the pope insisted were his and the Catholic Church’s were the levying of church taxes and advice on personal financial responsibility; intervention; religious examination; temporal punishment; the use of force; control of education; and the rejection of any public worship other than Roman Catholicism in a Catholic country. As if that was not enough, Pius insisted that it was proper for him to govern the papal states; that the church's authority took precedence over all civil authorities; that there could be no national churches outside his jurisdiction; that all clergy were responsible to Rome; that public opinion was not a proper basis for decision making; that there could be no true happiness other than through practice of the Roman faith. And of course Rome was not responsible for any division within the church!⁷⁷

The world staggered from the shock. If it had acted in accordance with the syllabus it would have gone way back into the era of the Holy Roman Empire. The British parliament had a strong incentive to pass its Clerical Subscriptions Act a few months later. The Church of England had a friend in Rome after all, but more and more people in Italy realized that they didn't. Anti-clerical legislation and the resolve to topple papal administration in Rome and the adjoining papal states increased.

ITALY'S RISORGIMENTO: ROME OR JERUSALEM?

The struggle for the reunification of Italy was reaching its grand finale and with the ebb and flow of Europe's wars, Garibaldi made a push for Rome. He was blocked by Napoleon's troops but the papal 'states' were reduced to the city and a small strip of territory around it. Pius was pressed repeatedly to relinquish his political rule and to be content to lead the church, but he and the Curia held to their view that it had to govern some piece of territory to maintain continuity of temporal rule and to demonstrate to the world that papal authority took precedence over civil authority. They saw this as vital to Ultramontanism, or central control of the church worldwide, which was in turn, they claimed, vital to the church's (self)defined role. It followed that if the papal state was eliminated the authority of the papacy would fall and that heretical Protestantism would tend to replace Catholic influence around the world. The overseas branches of the church would not hold together without that strong central authority, the papacy would decline, the branches would each go their own way as schismatic national churches and Catholicism, the "true" Christian Church would fade away. At least the Vatican was being consistent. Its line of reasoning had not changed since the politics of the early Christian era had made Rome the focal point of the church and the seat of its leadership, and the church had proceeded to define itself into perpetuity.

Without realizing it, the leaders of the Risorgimento had joined the philosophical challenge to the whole church to rethink its role and to redefine itself and its beliefs. Essentially they had set out to reunify Italy and to lift the material condition of its people to the level of the bulk of Europe. But now, through their confrontation with the pope over how and by whom Rome should be governed, they had called into question the church's view of itself and its doctrinal basis for that view. It has been said that Rome is to the Christian faith what Mecca is to Islam or Jerusalem is to Judaism. In fact that is not correct.

Jerusalem is the focal point of Judaism because it will be the scene of the Messianic victory, not because it was and is again the political capital of a nation.⁷⁸ It should be and ought always have been the focal point of Christianity for the same reason. Muhammad also taught that Jerusalem would be the scene of the Messiah's victory but, for reasons just as valid as any which led the church to Rome, he nominated Mecca as the focal point of faith until that time. Quite apart from any reason of geography, his objections to the theological aberrations of the Christian church which forced him to organize the believers around him into the body of Islam are the very reasons why he could certainly not nominate Rome or Constantinople. Islam does not operate through an organized institution in the same sense as the Christian Church and its adherents have seen no need for such a centre or for such an organization as the Vatican. Probably the only centre in Islam which bore any resemblance to Rome in its role was Baghdad under the Caliphate.

Why, then, was the government of Rome so vital to the Catholic Church? Could it have simply maintained its offices in the Vatican buildings with the members of its hierarchy being simply residents of the capital of Italy? All Italy and much of the world wanted answers to those questions. They didn't get satisfactory answers because the church could not justify its view and understanding of itself. The world was left to conclude that nothing had changed, that the pope's motive was still political aggrandisement and that the church's ultimate aim was still world domination along the lines of Augustine's "City of God." Quite reasonable conclusions to draw, indeed.

Pius IX seems to have believed that if all the branches of the Catholic Church in countries around the world supported the concept of centralized control and that if they made representations to their governments, those governments would, in turn, back him in his territorial claims. In the meantime Napoleon III could be relied upon to maintain the "integrity" of what was left. The first essential was to secure the support of the whole church and that was not guaranteed. Nationalism was rampant in the church as well as throughout the world community. An appeal for centralized power for its own sake would meet strong resistance. It had to have either a theological or an historical basis and it had to relate to the papacy's claimed scriptural authority.

PAPAL INFALLIBILITY ... AND THE IMPACT

The war-torn and regionally-divisive history of the church made it difficult to justify an appeal purely on historical grounds, but the time could be right. The Apostle Peter is said to have been martyred in Rome sometime between 54 C.E. and 68 C.E. The year of uprisings, 64 C.E., is often thought to be the most likely date.⁷⁹ Celebrations to mark the 1800th anniversary of his martyrdom while Garibaldi was trying to batter down the door could be helpful in establishing continuity of the pontificate in Rome from that time. It was worth a try. It would provide a platform to promote the concept of papal infallibility which, once established, would provide the linchpin of centralized authority and in consequence of that, justification for the papal territorial claims.

The pope is reported to have first raised the proposition of a council to formalize the doctrine of papal infallibility with colleagues immediately before the release of the Syllabus of Errors.⁸⁰ He apparently set up a small working group of cardinals to examine the issue a few months later but no announcement was made until 1867 when five hundred bishops were assembled for the anniversary celebrations and even then no date was proposed.⁸¹ When word of the infallibility proposal leaked out the reaction from the press, governments and churches in both Catholic and Protestant countries was hostile.⁸² Garibaldi had announced that elections for democratic government would be held in areas of the papal states which had been relieved, and on February 29, 1868 the pope retaliated with a decree forbidding Italians to recognize or to take part in such elections. The people were shocked. Then in June came the announcement of a date for the First Vatican Council. It would open on December 8, 1869.

Reports differ on the atmosphere and progress at the council. The first major issue to be debated was a dogmatic statement on the role and "constitution" of the church. There had been many previous statements issued by the church's competing fragments on their understanding and definition of the church and Rome had repeatedly relied on the writings of one or more of the church's "doctors and fathers", turning handsprings to rationalize conflicting aspects of such writings. But now "the church" was about to set down a formal definition as dogma which everyone was required to believe and from which everything else would flow. It was a necessary precursor to the infallibility statement and to a concerted effort to gain "established church" status and priority over all other churches worldwide. The Curia hadn't got rid of that universal church complex. It still saw St. Peters as a temple to end all temples. But neither the basic statement nor the infallibility statement could be finalized in isolation because they had to be linked together. The pope submitted a draft of the infallibility dogma on March 6 1870 and the Council was then able to proclaim a dogmatic statement on the church on April 24 before taking up the major issue of papal infallibility.⁸³

The whole world, Christian and non-Christian alike, was expected to believe that the Roman Catholic Church was the sole interpreter of faith and law and the sole divine judge over the reason and will of man.⁸⁴ Its doctrinal authority and infallibility extended to "certain truths of natural science...(such as)...the existence of substance...(and)...mere human history..."^{85 86} Rome had come down on the side of the Church of England against Darwinism and dogmatized the "fixed creation" of the Book of Genesis.⁸⁷ And the whole world was expected to spring to the aid of Rome because "...the gates of hell, with a hatred that grows greater every day, are rising up everywhere against the church's divinely established foundation with the intention of overthrowing (it)..."⁸⁸ It was no wonder. At least the Council's statement was consistent with the pope's 1868 invitation to Protestant churches to rejoin Rome and attend the Council. They were, he had written in his invitation, "Dissident religious societies...divided among themselves...separated from the Catholic Church...which our Lord founded...(and they could not) be assured of their own salvation." The Catholic Church would, he wrote, "... give again a striking proof of her unity and her invincible life-force...in which alone is kept and transmitted in its entirety the doctrine of Jesus Christ, and where alone are dispensed the mysteries of heavenly grace..."⁸⁹

Then the gloves came off for the major debate. The first vote on June 13 went 451 in favour of "infallibility", 88 against and 62 wanting changes made. A second vote on June 17 went 535 in favour and two against. The other 88 bishops had left Rome to avoid a scandal. The dogma was proclaimed to the world next day, June 18. The pope was infallible. His fellow human beings said so. The church had built a basis on which to press its Ultramontanism and its territorial claims. The bishops and diplomats would soon be able to leave for home to begin their politicking and with a touch of luck Garibaldi would never hold his detested elections. The bishops knew that in setting up that situation they were flying in the face of world opinion and digging deeper gulfs between their Roman Catholic Church and the rest of the Christian community, but what did that matter? They outnumbered the rest by two or more to one and now they would strengthen their political position greatly.

But they hadn't allowed for all the cause-and-effect pressures building up around them. The very next day, July 19, the Franco Prussian War was declared. Napoleon III could spare those troops no longer and they were recalled to Paris. The writing was on the wall. Three days later Pius attempted to mediate between Napoleon III and William I in a desperate last ditch bid to save the papal state but events were moving swiftly against him and Napoleon had no room for negotiation. He couldn't even respond to blackmail. No other monarch responded to the pope's appeals. Not even Austria's. Pius suspended the Vatican Council and released the bishops to return home on September 1st. Napoleon III was taken prisoner by Prussia on September 2nd, a new republic was proclaimed on September 4th and Garibaldi entered Rome in triumph on September 20th after brief resistance by the papal army.^{90 91}

It was all over, bar the shouting. Pius anathematized Garibaldi and declared himself to be a prisoner in the Vatican, while Garibaldi declared the pope's secular authority abolished and the papacy to be independent of the nation. And in that "detestable" democratic referendum one month later the people of the former papal states declared themselves part of Italy with only 1,507 votes cast against reunification out of 167,548 people entitled to vote. By the time many of the non-European bishops arrived home even the shouting was over and few people in the church were prepared to push for military intervention to restore the papal plot against the wishes of the people.⁹²

The world's Roman Catholic people had an infallible pope without secular authority to provide the focal point for their universal faith so they had reason enough to be happy, in spite of unceasing papal complaints about being hard done by. But gradually issues and tensions began to build up. They, and their clergy even more so, had committed themselves to the personal will and unquestioned political involvement and power of their leader in a foreign country. During the following years they were to find that they had walked right into the conflict of interest problem which the church had always accused Jews of having even though the Jews had not sworn personal allegiance to a foreign power. They didn't have one to swear allegiance to. Their only conflict of interest had come from the persecution and abuse of the human rights of their coreligionists.⁹³

GERMANY'S KULTURKAMPF

The most devastating backlash to the Vatican Council's decisions came in Germany, the seat of the Reformation, where scientific research was being pushed ahead at a great rate and where scientists and educators had been shocked by the Syllabus of Errors only six years before. Catholic theologians, a large number of whom were soon excommunicated, joined with scientists at universities across Germany to organize public protest meetings. Bismarck had become chancellor of the unified North German Confederation after the successful war against Austria and the venom of the attacks on the Vatican strengthened his resolve not to negotiate with Napoleon III whose army had been propping up the papacy. But the Franco-Prussian War provided the basis for further rounds of competition of a different nature. It enabled the establishment of the Second German Reich, with William I as emperor and Bismarck as powerful and ambitious Chancellor, and at the same time, although it proved disastrous for France domestically and in Europe, it heralded the beginning of the new Empire Francoi. France was determined to offset its weakened position in Europe with a stronger international position through a vigorous extension of its overseas empire.

Within weeks of the infallibility decision, even before Napoleon had fallen, committees were being set up in Germany to form a breakaway "Old Catholic Church" which did not recognize the decisions of the Vatican Council.⁹⁴ The new breed of reformers approached Bismarck for support and, riding the crest of the wave, he took up their cause with a vengeance. The Kulturkampf was soon in full swing.

The "Old Catholics" met in congress for the first time in September 1871, just a year after the infallibility decision, and three months later Bismarck closed the Catholic Department of the Ministry for Public Worship. For five years Imperial restrictions on the Roman Catholic Church were progressively introduced and tightened, while the breakaway "Old Catholics" introduced a series of reforms. However it was not all a reaction to the Vatican Council. Tensions had been building up during the generation since the Cologne mixed marriages affair of 1837, with the Jesuits reappearing in 1847, and the establishment of a Catholic political party in 1852 which became known, after 1858, as the Center Party.⁹⁵ Regulations for school and pulpit supervision were among the first to be introduced, in March 1872, and it was Germany's turn to expel the Jesuits in July. Then in May 1873 laws designed to eliminate Vatican control over the Catholic Church in Germany were introduced. These had the practical effect of establishing a national Catholic Church by regulating the training and hiring of clergy and by recognition of bishops in the "Old Catholic" Church.

At that point the Center Party pulled out all the stops and with vigorous, divisive campaigning achieved ninety one seats in the Reichstag. But the regulations kept coming. Civil marriage procedures were made obligatory in March 1874 and this led to changes to marriage procedures in the “Old Catholic” wing which also changed its confessional system and discontinued many of the church’s feast days. April ‘75 saw the ending of state funds to all Roman Catholic enterprises throughout the empire except those involving nursing, and in May all Roman Catholic monasteries in Prussia were closed and their orders dissolved. The rash of regulations was completed in July that year when the Roman Catholic Church was obliged to open all its buildings for joint use with the “Old Catholics” whose reforms continued with the ending of celibacy as a priestly obligation in 1878. There the situation remained, with the world experiencing another wave of German religious emigration, but this time it was Catholic, until the new pope, Leo XIII, negotiated a new German Concordat and the dismantling of the Kulturkampf regulations began in 1880.⁹⁶

FRENCH AND SPANISH REACTIONS

Actually the degree of turmoil in Germany was little different to that across much of Europe. In France the Paris Commune uprising took place from March to May 1871, even before a peace treaty had been signed with Germany, and it was suppressed with such ruthlessness that there were 30,000 deaths in one ‘bloody week.’ Efforts to restore the monarchy failed, the Third Republic was proclaimed in 1875, but conflict between monarchists and republicans continued. The Prime Minister was goaded by constant pressure and manipulation into observing that since the dissolution of the papal states Catholicism had become the “Black International” and a menace no less dangerous than the “Red International” of socialism,⁹⁷ and a program of anti-clerical reform began. The growth of Catholic universities in competition with the independent universities angered parliament and in 1880, 74 Jesuit schools and 261 “religious houses” were closed. Clerics and members of religious orders were then banned from teaching religion in public schools and the teaching of religion in public schools was banned altogether a few years later. Similar decisions were being taken in a number of countries and denominational conflict in public education was general throughout the Christian world, but the further removed a country was from the scene of the Vatican events of 1870 the less traumatic the conflict seemed to be.⁹⁸

Spain maintained its record for unending foreign and Vatican interference. Formal links with Rome were severed by the revolution of 1868 and then, for two years from 1873 to 1875, the country was governed as a republic. But a Spanish Republic with an independence in religious affairs posed a threat to all of Europe’s monarchies as well as the Vatican. After constant jockeying by the great powers and a confrontation between France and Prussia over who should provide a new monarch⁹⁹ the monarchy was restored, Roman Catholicism was proclaimed the sole church and the public performance of all other religions was banned. Some sort of repressive stability held for a generation but the explosion came in 1909. Some 68 churches and monasteries were burned and 138 Catholic clergy were murdered. Diplomatic relations between Spain and the Vatican were broken off again between 1910 and 1912, but that is getting ahead a bit.¹⁰⁰ No one could escape the consequences of the church's view of itself and the Vatican's Ultramontanism. Christians around the world were so preoccupied with their own troubles that most of them couldn't care less about what happened to people of other religions. They didn't count anyway because there was no salvation outside the church. The church said so. So why worry about them? Let's just take advantage of their cheap labour. And as for the Jews, the Orthodox and the Muslims ... they were squabbling among themselves and it was time they were brought to heel, except to the extent that they could be useful in a pinch. The Orthodox and Muslims first.

CRISIS LOOMS FOR THE BALKANS

Within Europe the Orthodox and Muslim communities were restricted to the geographically small area of the Balkans, but as a land bridge to Asia this was a region of vital strategic importance to any power which had an interest in the Middle East or Asia, or in access from the Black Sea to the Mediterranean. That made it vital to each of the European colonial powers and Russia. However it was an integral part of the Ottoman Empire and that made it a region of intrigue for the Catholic-dominated Austro-Hungarian dual monarchy which had been reconstituted in 1867. The Austrian concordat of 1855 was terminated in 1868 (the same year as in Spain), state-sponsored elementary schools were established throughout the empire, and both the Polish and Czech regions gained greater influence, official recognition of their two languages and the establishment of a Czech university. But the new imperial government was dominated (perhaps entrapped) by the conservative Catholic party which rejected the monarchy's policy of non-interference in Balkan affairs and maintained a massive military presence around the rim of the Ottoman Empire from the Adriatic to the Carpathian Mountains.

Although the Vatican had not been invited to sign – and had stood aloof from – the Russian Orthodox-inspired Holy Alliance, drawn up in September 1815 to confirm the validity of the decisions of the Congress of Vienna, the Austro-Hungarian military policy was consistent with the undertakings of the Holy Alliance powers. Those undertakings were to govern at home in a Christian patriarchal spirit in accordance with Holy Writ and to practice solidarity in foreign affairs. That meant to protect peace, justice and religion – in the style of the Greek and Russian Orthodox Churches, the Catholic Church (of Austria) and the Protestant Church of Prussia – basing their right of intervention against all liberal and national movements on their responsibility to God as enshrined in the divine right of kings. How could anyone dispute that? Each of the Holy Alliance powers were eager to take advantage of it to nibble away at the Ottoman Empire which was already being weakened by its own internal squabbles, the realignment of principalities and power bases in Rumania and Bulgaria, and a dispute with Greece over Macedonia combined with the decline of the Sultan's authority due to policies of his own.

Russia moved first. It took advantage of the Franco-Prussian war to gain Bismarck's support to repudiate conditions which had been imposed on Russia's right of passage through the Dardanelles by the 1856 Peace of Paris. Turkey objected to the formalization of that decision by the Pontus Conference in London in 1871 without proper consultation about transit through its territory, and its responses led to uprisings by Turkish vassals and, in turn, the Serbo-Turkish War of 1875–77. When the Porte refused to carry out internal reforms demanded by his Christian minority, Russia did what Britain, France, the United States and other colonial powers had done before. It used the need to free the Christians of the Balkans from oppression as the justification for the Russo-Turkish War of 1877–78 and swept through the Ottoman states of Moldavia, Rumania and Bulgaria to threaten the Ottoman empire at its Turkish power base, Constantinople, as well as via the Caucasus. A settlement between the warring parties saw a substantial increase in Russian influence in the region, its uninhibited freedom of passage through the Dardanelles, and the enlargement of the Ottoman vassal state of Bulgaria at the expense of Turkey-in-Europe.

THE CONGRESS OF BERLIN: ARMENIANS IN CRISIS

But while Britain and Austria welcomed the weakening of the Muslim position they objected to the strengthening of the Russian position and that led to the Congress of Berlin in June–July 1878. In territorial terms the net results were that Austria was given ‘administrative rights’ over protectorates of Bosnia and Herzegovina; Rumania, Serbia and Montenegro each became independent within the Ottoman Empire; Bulgaria lost both its recently gained benefits and its regions of Macedonia and Roumelia to Turkey, and, as an autonomous principality, it remained tributary to Turkey; Britain ‘received’ Cyprus as a protectorate; and Russia gained Bessarabia and the major part of Armenia. But other results – which the great Christian powers of Europe and their churches either failed to comprehend or did not care about – were closer relations between Austria-Hungary and Germany; estrangement between Germany and Russia; a deepening of the Austro-Russian conflict in the Balkans; and the aggravation of ethno-nationality friction in the Balkans and Caucasus regions. The consequences of the religious and population centre of the Armenian Christian community, Etchmiadzin, being excised from the Ottoman Empire and grafted onto Orthodox-dominated Tzarist Russia would progressively become apparent from the early 1890s over some four generations.

The Armenian Church is traditionally understood to have been established by two very early apostles during the first century CE while Armenia was a suzerain kingdom on the eastern fringe of the Roman Empire. Its form of Christianity was proclaimed to be the state religion in 301 CE by the Armenian King, Trdat III, and, presumably because of its isolation, it managed to remain aloof from the worst of the controversies of three successive church councils, Nicea (325 CE), Chalcedon (451 CE) and Ephesus (431 CE). Although it is often thought to be aligned with Monophysite theology¹⁰¹ the contemporary Armenian Apostolic Church, a full member of the World Council of Churches, recognizes the status of all three of those councils but bases its Christology on the second, Ephesus, and denies any association with Monophysitism.¹⁰² However, while it avoided the excesses of religious controversy, it was caught in the military dogfights and in 390 CE its strategically important territory was split between Byzantium and Persia, and forty years later the kingdom disappeared. Subsequently its people and its church, both staunchly bonded by Armenian heritage, enjoyed cohesion and relative tolerance, with restricted rights, even though they were scattered over territory jealously contested by Turks, Russians, Arabs and Persians, and swept by waves of military action, migration and countless 'adventures' by European powers.

However, as a result of the Balkans wars and the Congress of Berlin, the tolerance became a thing of the past. During the Russo-Turkish war, in retaliation for the support given by the Christian churches for the Russian-pan-Slavic invasion, the Sultan revoked a parliamentary constitution which he had granted only two years earlier, which had placed all religious creeds and nationalities on an equal footing (as opposed to being tolerated), and this triggered unrest in Armenia. The unrest deepened when, in its weakened position, the Ottoman Empire became increasingly dependent on Europe for investment and infrastructure funds, and deeply in debt to it, and could not resist further territorial losses. Thessaly was ceded to Greece, and France imposed a protectorate over Tunisia in 1881. The Sultan was obliged to place his treasury under the control of the European powers, and Britain occupied Egypt the following year. The Armenians, now divided by the Turko-Russian border as well as facing the loss of their constitutional rights, rebelled. From 1894 to 1896, after some years of terrorism and counter terrorism, the Sultan, ruling through reactionary Muslim clerics and with the European powers still effectively controlling the empire's finances, used irregular Kurdish forces to subdue the Armenian nationalists. Britain, tying its Christian flag to the mast yet again, proposed partitioning Turkey but it was Germany's turn to show its sympathy for the Muslim Turks. In return for opposing the British partition plan it received concessions for the construction of the Anatolia and Baghdad Railway. The Armenian crisis gradually gathered momentum.

LET'S SAVE THE JEWS

Now: the Jews. After the ghettos had tumbled by direction of people like Napoleon and Garibaldi, the church, and especially the Vatican, had to either admit that it had been wrong in forcing the Jewish community into them in the first place or justify what it had done all those years. It is clear from the church's doctrinal view of itself that it was hardly likely to admit being wrong. It didn't. And compared with finding a theological justification for wholesale murder and torture by the Inquisition it was a simple matter to justify locking up a few Jews at night. Everyone knew they had murdered God, or the Son of God, or one part in three of God, whichever way they chose to think of Christ, the Messiah, so that was sufficient justification. It therefore followed that the church was acting quite within its authority as Christ's sole representative on earth in constantly reminding Jews of their corporate crime, in keeping them separate from the "saved" Christian community and in dispensing constant justice. And, to take that line of reasoning to its logical conclusion, there was no reason why that process ought stop whether the Jews were inside a ghetto or whether misguided, politically motivated civil authorities had overruled the church (which, according to the Vatican Council, they had no right to do) and had let the Jews run loose. It didn't. Another "responsibility" the church clung to was the "rescue" of former Jews who had gained the benefits of baptism by some means or another. This was part of the justification for the intervention, force and coercion clauses of the Vatican statements and it was also quite consistent with the defunct and discredited Holy Alliance.

The shouts of anger from the Jewish community in Rome had hardly died down from one such incident when Pius began lobbying for his infallibility. The incident bears something of the mentality of bishops sprinkling boatloads of slaves in Angola and Manoel sprinkling resistant mobs in Portugal to stop the inquisitors from wringing their necks, but the reasoning took a slightly different twist. Edgardo Mortara, a six or seven year old Jewish lad, was kidnapped in Bologna on the pretext that at the age of one he had "submitted" to some sort of baptismal process administered by a servant girl. [If one were to pursue this on the basis of consistent reasoning, taking account of both the Vatican's attitude to the ordination of women and the level of corruption involved in the sale of church offices during earlier periods, this could be interpreted to mean that the pope had been ordaining teenage girls in secret. But the absence of consistent reasoning was seldom an impediment in such matters and in any case the pope was only 12 years away from his infallibility.] Edgardo's father, Ludovico Mortara, was a leader of the struggle for Italian reunification. After the fall of the papal states he brought order into Italian civil law procedures, became president of the Italian Supreme Court and later Minister of Justice, a concept which he had not experienced while living in a papal state. The inevitable conclusion is therefore that the boy's kidnapping in 1858 was a punitive action against his father. Sir Moses Montefiore personally intervened, but this was not to be one of his diplomatic successes. The pope insisted that the boy be brought up as a Christian and he later gained prominence in the church. Very convenient.^{103 104}

However the pope's rejection of Montefiore's approach was not the end of the matter. In yet another classic case of the church's self-understanding and bigotry obscuring the possible consequences of its actions, the incident focussed Jewish attention world wide on the urgent need for one or more representative organizations which could act in the community's interests in matters of justice, law, defamation and political lobbying. Two were set up in quick succession. Firstly, several American Jewish leaders approached President James Buchanan with a request that he intervene with the Vatican on behalf of Edgardo Mortara. He refused to do so on the grounds that intervention might alienate Irish Catholics who were loyal Supporters of the Democrats. As a direct result of his refusal, when representatives of 25 Jewish congregations from 14 cities met early the following year they resolved to establish the Board of Delegates of American Israelites. One of the board's responsibilities was to represent American Jews in future discussions with governments. The first step to counterbalance the disproportionate influence of the church on public opinion and government policies had been taken. Secondly, only twelve months later the Alliance Israelite Universelle was set up, with its headquarters in Paris, to defend the civil rights and religious freedom of Jews all over the world by working through diplomatic channels and to promote harmony through education.

Subsequently, as a result of the divisive Franco-Prussian War, complementary bodies were set up in England (the Anglo-Jewish Association) and Germany (the Hilfsverein der deutschen Juden).^{105 106 107}

The more enlightened churchmen didn't peddle the concept of 'rescuing' baptized Jews but it appears that the vast majority did. The church's official attitudes and human nature therefore combined to prevent the dismantling of the ghettos from having the intended effect. As Jewish commercial and professional capacity and competition for jobs in the community gathered momentum, and as the prestige, influence and wealth of its leaders increased, so also did antagonism and efforts to inhibit their success. Fortunately the influence of humanitarian philosophies spreading by means of books and the press, and also through the state school systems, (all of which the church had made every effort to curb), tended to offset religious bigotry and 'programmed' persecution. As a result physical violence did not reach the intensity which might otherwise have been the case and when it occurred it prompted further efforts at community education.

However, deeply entrenched religious bigotry could not be eliminated in the continuing presence of the overpowering body which had been promoting it for so long, especially when it had refused to admit that it had been wrong even when it was surrounded by Piedmontese muzzle loaders. The Vatican had shown the same sort of determination as the Jewish community when it had been under pressure on many occasions. Direct physical confrontation waned because it could no longer be imposed from a position of power but the basic bigotry simply appeared in revised forms. Psychological intimidation and smear campaigns based on the premise that to be a Jew meant to be a member of a race with decidedly sinister characteristics, backed Europe's Jews into another round of race-based anti-Semitism in a particularly virulent form.

It hadn't taken very long to resurrect the racial misconceptions which Napoleon Bonaparte had slaughtered and buried. Jewish theologians and writers were confused. Mendelssohn, the Enlightenment and the progressive legal emancipation after the collapse of the ghetto system had led to a generation or so of renewed pride in Jewish history, tradition and culture. Writers had eagerly tried to harmonize unaccustomed Jewish freedom under Christian powers with the traditional yearning for release in the Messianic Age. They could hardly believe they had reached the Messianic Age. They were not back in Jerusalem and the Israel of Maimonides' understanding, but their situation had changed radically.¹⁰⁸

ANTI-SEMITISM TAKES ON NEW FORMS

After the revolutionary round of 1848–50 the reality of the new emerging anti-Semitism caused another shift in Jewish thinking. Maybe there was something unhealthy about the heavy emphasis on Jewish tradition in ghetto life after all. Maybe Jewish resistance to intermarriage and withdrawal from active evangelism to encourage converts had been a mistake, even though few people would readily change their basic faith for the doubtful privilege of living in a ghetto.

However such courageous but introverted examination of their own situation and faith by Jewish writers played into the grasping hands of racial bigots. "They even admit it, they are an inferior race" was the sort of comment used to back up many attacks by Christian rabble-rousers from the battered but belligerent and resurgent church.

When economic depression swept Europe after the Vatican Council and the fall of the papal states, (but as a result of the financial speculation which went with the Franco-Prussian War), many people were in a mood to believe anything bad about a Jew and to act on it. The brief honeymoon was at an end.

In Germany Bismarck was in a position of absolute power, his position subject only to the emperor and, under the constitutional arrangements of the day, not even subject to the discipline of parliament. He knew who controlled the purse strings, the relationships which influenced their decisions and the methods by which they manipulated the money market. He was very bitter about Baron Alphonse Rothschild's role in the Franco Prussian peace settlement. Together with King William, Bismarck had occupied the Rothschild chateau, Ferrieres, (at which he had previously been a house guest), to use as Prussia's military headquarters during the siege of Paris. As part of the peace settlement then being negotiated he had demanded six billion francs indemnity to complement the ceding of Alsace-Lorraine, but the representatives of the fledgling French Republic insisted they would have to consult the Baron before they committed the nation to such a payment. Considering that it was the Prussian Elector William's money which had set the Rothschild fortune rolling during an earlier war with Republican France, Bismarck was not at all amused. When Baron Alphonse insisted that the most France could meet would be five billion francs and that all the great merchant bankers of Europe would have to stand guarantors (and therefore back the French economy) Bismarck and King William just had to accept it. However they did so with rather bad grace and insisted that German troops would garrison France until it was paid off over the agreed six years. Later, when the money flowed in France so freely that the debt was paid off in 1875, after only four years, the Chancellor clearly felt the German people had been cheated by the grandson of one of their own court Jews and that preferential treatment for France had added to Germany's economic woes.¹⁰⁹

Bismarck would have been very conscious of his own advice to the government of the day when the Crimean War was breaking, but he seems to have believed that the new German Empire was in such a powerful position that it need not fear a Rothschild backlash if it rocked the Jewish boat. For some time he allowed the gutter press to revile and agitate against the Jewish minority but in 1878 he encouraged the Protestant Court Preacher, Adolf Stocker, in the formation of the Christian Socialist Workingmen's Union (C.S.W.U.) which was bourgeois and reactionary rather than working class and Christian. It took up a program to restrict Jewish influence in business, society and politics and it ran hand in hand with, or possibly as a distraction from, the Kulturkampf which had become a national political embarrassment. Anti-Semitic books soon flooded the market and deputies seemed to compete in making inflammatory speeches in the Diet.¹¹⁰

About the time that the C.S.W.U. was being formed a new pope, Leo XIII, took office and immediately began an intensive campaign towards reconciliation with the powers of Europe. Bismarck was his first and surprisingly willing target. A concordat was signed almost immediately; the dismantling of the Kulturkampf regulations began in 1880 and Bismarck appointed an ambassador to the Vatican in 1882. Only the next year he accepted a knighthood in the Supreme Order of Christ, the Vatican's highest civil honour and one which has been restricted to Christian heads of state since 1966.^{111 112 113} Bismarck had achieved a very honourable volte-face but few people were surprised. The "Old Catholics" had not succeeded in breaking the grip of the Vatican over most of the Catholic population and the Centre Party had become a major political force. State and church-in-conflict were back working hand in glove again. The anti-Semitic program could again be pressed without distraction. It was.

There were 255,000 signatures on a petition demanding the disenfranchisement of Jews which Bismarck received on April 25th 1881 from the newly organized anti-Semitic league. The matter was debated several times and, although it was not formally acted on, Jews found it all but impossible to gain an army commission, senior state offices or chairs at universities without first accepting baptism. It was just like the good old days and relations between Jews and their Christian neighbours fell to the same level of bitterness.¹¹⁴

IT'S RUSSIA'S TURN ... AGAIN

Then world attention swung to Russia where the elite tended to look to Germany for a lead in social, cultural and business affairs. The new anti-Semitism was being readily accepted because of a similar rise in competition in Russia and it was seen as justification for the earlier policy of "containing" Jewish influence within the Pale of Settlement. Alexander II had begun to regret his decision to open the Pale and the degree of economic dependence on Jewish financiers which had resulted from his turning to them for development help after the Crimean debacle.

But Alexander also had other reasons for concern. He knew that the Russian economy was still badly balanced because his emancipation act had been only partly successful. The former serfs were facing poverty. Unrest was increasing and in the same way that the intelligentsia looked to Germany for inspiration, so did the peasantry. That baptized Jewish philosopher/political economist Karl Marx, who had developed such strong views on the influence of organized religion, had said that the Polish question was the most important issue facing Europe's workers. Tolstoy, one of his own intelligentsia, believed that revolution in Russia would be directed not against the tsar and despotism but against the ownership of land.¹¹⁵ But as this was an essential ingredient in the Polish question with well over half the population there being former serfs and with close to four million Jews in the Pale, which basically meant Poland, the problems were all intimately linked. He would have to disentangle them and tackle the land question as a matter of urgency. He was sympathetic, but he had left his run too late.

On March 13, 1881 Alexander was assassinated. When it was learned that the conspirators had met in the flat of a young Jewess it didn't take much of a pretext to start an anti-Semitic riot of incredible barbarity at Elisavetgrad. Officials and troops either joined the massacre or simply didn't intervene. That was April 27th. Kiev and Odessa followed suit, but spread their events over a fortnight in May, and within a few months pogroms had swept one hundred and sixty centres.¹¹⁶ The situation for Jews in Russia and Eastern Europe had reached another critical point. However Jewish self-understanding, the nature of European society generally and the nature of Russian society in particular, had changed significantly since Napoleon. At the same time communications and transport had improved and this crisis triggered reactions other than just mass refugee movements.

One important reaction was that just as in the thirteenth century when King Boleslav welcomed and encouraged Jewish migration into Poland, there were people on the other side of the world who were prepared to extend a welcoming hand. On August 6, 1881, the government of Argentina appointed a special agent to attract Jewish immigration from Russia. No doubt, as in Boleslav's case, humanitarian concern coincided with the economic needs of the country, but it was genuine.

Two other important reactions were the concurrent renewal of interest in Hebrew culture in contrast to the Yiddish culture which had come to dominate Jewish ghetto and community life in Eastern Europe over a long period, and the rebirth of national identity, or the sense of a Jewish society, among the small stream of refugees who made the journey to Palestine. Those settlers did not see themselves as simply 'going up' to the Land of Israel to live and die there but to become part of Jewish society. They set up simple cooperative organizations and established movements which provided the basis of political organizations in due course. Among those settlers in 1881 was Eliezer Ben-Yehuda who became known as the 'father' of modern Hebrew for his efforts to have Hebrew accepted as the language of Jews living in Palestine. His aim was to integrate the religious and secular traditions of Jews who had been scattered in different parts of the diaspora and to provide a bridge between the diaspora and the homeland of Palestine. Through a common language the folklore, festivals and ceremonies of the renewed society could be gathered, redeveloped or constituted anew so that the new Hebrew society could encompass facets of both the original civilization which had been uprooted long ago and those from which settlers were coming to form the new society. It was to be a long hard struggle involving tensions between Orthodoxy and contemporary religious and Zionist understandings, and it had to be based on the teaching and use of Hebrew in schools and in published literature. As a starting point the Hebrew Language Committee was established in 1890 and in a move which showed great confidence in the future the National Library in Jerusalem was founded in 1892. Over the next few years a Hebrew language publishing house, literary magazine, kindergarten, high school, technical college and newspapers were founded and Eliezer Ben-Yehuda produced a Hebrew dictionary.¹¹⁷

POVERTY, REPRESSION, BIGOTRY AND REFUGEE STATUS

Back in Russia there were contradictory decisions by the new government under Alexander III which chose to solve its inter-linked problems not with further concessions but by a determined policy of repression against the victims of poverty and religious bigotry. The causes could stay. It took full advantage of a misinterpretation of both Malthus and Darwin. On August 14, 1881, only a few days after the Argentinian action, Alexander III promulgated a law “for the protection of the (established) system of government” which codified what the state had been doing and provided for “certain of the Empire’s localities” to be placed under either “reinforced safeguard” or “extraordinary safeguard.” The only difference was the degree of repression by the Ministry of the Interior using the martial law facilities at its disposal. The political police became the omnipotent prop for the monarchy without which it had to collapse. Official surveillance, forced labour and exile were a regular part of their armory in protecting “the Sacred Person, the Dignity, and the Supreme Authority” of the tsar.¹¹⁸ Then in January 1882 the Minister for the Interior, Count Ignatyev, announced that Jews, who he blamed for the riots because of their control over commerce and industry, were allowed to leave Russia. A huge wave of emigration to the west began immediately. However only four months later, responding to public pressure, Alexander dismissed the count and confirmed the August laws with severe economic restrictions on the Jewish community. Perhaps Argentina was too remote or people simply did not have time to consider it seriously, but there was not an immediate flood of Jewish migration under that country’s special scheme and large scale immigration and agricultural settlement there only began in 1889. It was further stimulated two years later when Baron de Hirsch established agricultural settlements.¹¹⁹

In the meantime the subversion-prone Jews were subjected to special treatment and counter-reforms and in the oppressive “May Laws” of 1882 indignity was heaped on injustice. The Russian version of the ghetto was about to be born. All Jews were excluded from rural areas, villages and towns of up to 10,000 people, even in the Pale. They could head for the slums of big cities in the Pale, (except Kiev, Nikolaev, Sebastopol and Yalta), they could set up hamlets or shtetls, or they could leave Russia. About 20,000 were expelled from Moscow and 2,000 from St. Petersburg; 700,000 were driven from the rest of Russia into the Pale; 500,000 from rural areas within the Pale were herded into shtetls, and 250,000 along Russia’s western frontier went the same way. A major refugee movement was ‘justified’ to preserve the privileges and power of the Christian monarchy and its parasites, but the consequences were going to be beyond anyone’s expectations.

To begin with, the centre of gravity of the world Jewish population which had already begun to drift towards the United States, lurched heavily in that direction. Very soon the United States would become home to the largest number and the largest concentrations of Jews in the world, outnumbering progressively those remaining in North Africa and the Middle East, then Germany and finally those in Russia and its territories by a big margin. The importance of this would become apparent in about two or three generations as their influence in matters social, economic and political within the United States naturally increased and its highly educated Jewish community assumed – or was forced by circumstances to adopt – a position of leadership in world Jewish affairs. No one and no country could avoid being affected either directly or indirectly.

However in the early stages of the drift the effects were felt in much more mundane ways. Wherever in the world European Christians had settled – and the refugees now followed – ordinary people found that refugees were not just items in a newspaper. They were competitors for jobs, for homes, for places in schools and for food and they received sympathetic treatment from both government authorities and employers because they represented long term economic growth and they were willing to work for their security. This meant that they were a damned nuisance to the ordinary man in the street and they soon became a political embarrassment as well. About two million of them poured out of the Pale through Hungary into Britain, other parts of Europe, the USA and Palestine as well as Latin America. ^{120 121}

DREYFUS IN THE LAND OF HUMAN RIGHTS

Some of the Russian Jewish refugees sought refuge in France where they soon found that the religious tolerance of only a few generations before which had produced the Declaration of Human Rights, triggered the movement for Jewish emancipation, and led to Jews in Algeria being granted French citizenship in 1870, had evaporated. Frenchmen of the 1890s were little different to people anywhere in Europe and they were quite happy to use a Jew as a scapegoat. Jewish recognition of that fact was about to have long term repercussions throughout the world. A French-born Hungarian Catholic army officer, Major F.W. Esterhazy, who had served first in the papal army against Garibaldi and then for Napoleon III against Bismarck, married a wealthy aristocrat, squandered her money and looked for other sources of funds. He turned first to joint ownership of a brothel and then to selling military secrets to the Germans. This could have got him into immediate serious trouble but there was just one Jewish officer in the entire French General Staff and a hand writing examination of intercepted documents just happened to very conveniently lead to him, Captain Alfred Dreyfus. Captain Dreyfus was undistinguished but with an immense capacity for work. He was reserved to the point of snobbishness and morally correct to the point of being a bore. He was arrested in 1894 on the charge of espionage.

Other General Staff officers gleefully began to celebrate the demise of their despised Jewboy, but their glee turned to dismay when the truth was discovered sometime before the trial. Blast! Stuck with him still! But a cover-up was worth a try on the basis that a French aristocratic General Staff officer could never be allowed to face trial for espionage. Dreyfus was court-martialed, publicly and dishonourably discharged, and sentenced to life imprisonment on Devil's Island. French honour was restored, the General Staff was rid of its Jewboy, the public was jubilant because it had been saved from a traitor and the Jewish community was suitably humiliated.

However, a little while later a devoutly Catholic Colonel, Georges Picquart, was appointed Chief of Intelligence. He stumbled onto the conspiracy file. When he demanded that the case be reopened he was demoted and sent to the Tunisian front line for his trouble, but the conspiracy was out in the open. The general staff, state bureaucracy, church and press combined to condemn both Picquart and Dreyfus. France split down the middle with mob street fights and hysterical anti-Semitic violence. Eventually Esterhazy was tried and acquitted, naturally, and Picquart faced trial for false accusation. He was soon joined by Emile Zola, a journalist who accused the government of involvement in the conspiracy, but Zola managed to escape to England. An officer who had helped to fabricate evidence against Dreyfus committed suicide and Esterhazy finally confessed.

The Dreyfus affair had been running for four years when he was ordered to stand retrial. In spite of the facts he was again found guilty, this time of high treason, but the court reduced his sentence from life to ten years because of "extenuating circumstances." Not only Frenchmen but the world was shocked and the cause kept running. Finally in 1906, twelve years after his false arrest, Dreyfus was exonerated by the Supreme Court, promoted to major and awarded the Legion of Honour.¹²² By that time other figures were being groomed for the European stage on which anti-Semitism played full time, but in the meantime the long-running Dreyfus affair had helped to change the course of history.

The proven complicity of the enlightened republican French government in a scheme by its executive defence arm to subvert justice and to use a screen of public anti-Semitism in a cover-up had come in relatively quick succession after Bismarck's and Alexander's blatant efforts to intimidate Jews into subjection. It lifted Anti-Semitism from the level of a political reaction under pressure from religious bigots and gave it the status of a respectable government policy. The new forms of Anti-Semitism were more soul-destroying and had the potential to lead to repression and physical violence on a scale more terrifying than that to which their forebears had been subjected. The ghetto had never been like this. The speed and intensity of the change had been made possible by the newfangled technology. Instant communications by telegraph and telephone; mass indoctrination by newspapers produced at speed because of the linotype; transport to shift civilians or armies long distances quickly, and advanced new weaponry put immense power into the hands of the authorities.

If the Christian church continued on its course, (there was little indication of a change), and if the governments of Europe continued on their courses, (there was every reason to believe they would), then the future for the Jewish community was grim indeed. The dreadful truth settled depressingly on religious and community leaders to whom millions of Jews were turning for assurance. The situation was becoming so critical that it shook the faith of many people whose dedication and commitment to the traditions and self-understanding of Judaism had stood many severe tests.

HERZL'S TRAUMA

Among the people who attended open sessions of the Dreyfus trial in 1895, culminating in his public degradation as an officer, was a Jewish newspaper correspondent named Theodore Herzl. He was neither a religious leader nor a community leader. Born in Budapest in 1860 to semi-assimilated parents whose culture was more German than Jewish, he lived in relative luxury during his pampered youth, studied law in Vienna, dropped it to write instead, and entertained Viennese society with his somewhat cynical morning newspaper columns. He was conscious of his Jewish heritage and suffered or witnessed sufficient anti-Semitism to make him toy with the idea of being baptized.¹²³ His early reaction had been no different to that of Karl Marx father, Benjamin Disraeli's father, and a host of other eminently worthy citizens in every country of Europe.

Herzl, in common with so many of his coreligionists, had been confused by the church's brainwashing into seeing his Jewishness as a strange combined racial and religious characteristic and, as a result, had not succumbed to the pressure tactics. He was deeply shaken by the trauma of the Dreyfus trial and especially by hearing French mobs on the rampage shouting "Death to the Jews!" This experience reinforced his Jewish consciousness and he determined to find an answer to "the Jewish question." The basic problem was to either dismantle, counter or circumvent both the day-by-day harassment of Jews and the growing efforts by the Christian block of religious, civil and political groups to eliminate the Jewish community en masse. Whether Herzl rationalized the problem in quite that manner does not matter. That was the basic problem. But what was the Jewishness or the Jewish heritage which he was trying to rationalize? There had been a great many influences at work on both sides of the Atlantic since the Magyars closed the Viennese-style Reformed services of the Central Association of Hungarian Israelites at Ofen in 1852 to show that Jews were expected to stick with their traditions, so before we look at Herzl's considered response to the situation in Europe we must retrace our steps again, looking first at the United States.

AMERICA'S RELIGIOUS FREE MARKET

Unlike Europe, where Jews at worship, in business or at play constantly had to cope with oppressive government intervention and the pervasive influence of the churches, in America the religious environment was much more relaxed and relatively free of prejudice. Meyer describes it as "a free market of religions" in which a multitude of denominations and sects competed for adherents.¹²⁴ The Jewish population had just trickled in, mainly as refugees from European oppression, and until 1840 there was no ordained rabbi 'to lend the weight of his authority to traditional practice.' All roles and positions of authority in a congregation, whether cantor, teacher or ritual slaughterer, were filled by laymen, most of whom had little training for their responsibilities. There were no formally recognized communities, observance of the Sabbath, religious ritual and dietary laws was a matter of personal decision. Jews enjoyed normal social and business contact with the rest of the community, dressed like those around them, voted in elections, held public office, and appeared to have no qualms about mixed marriages which were not infrequent. Thus traditional Judaism was ripe for reform as the Jewish community grew.

Jews who had experienced or been involved in the Reform Movement in Europe found 'a more hospitable intellectual climate' when they reached America's shores than they had left behind. They could not help but be influenced by the environment in which Christians, although often living in states or communities with a denominational foundation, were eager to cast off the friction and conflicts of their European heritage and saw themselves as 'living revelation' in their 'New Israel' – a country with a profound sense of mission and a divine destiny to lead the world. There were, of course, some exceptions to the general level of religious tolerance and in spite of the Virginia Statute of 1785, Article VI of the Constitution of 1787 and the subsequent First Amendment to the Constitution in 1791, at least two states, Maryland, (the state founded on Catholicism), and North Carolina retained regulations limiting the rights of Jews. A fierce thirty-year battle for Jewish equality resulted in the Maryland General Assembly passing "The Jew Bill" in 1818 to eliminate a religious test for civil office, but the North Carolina restrictions remained until 1868.¹²⁵ However even Jewish leaders, including the pre-eminent American Reformer Isaac Mayer Wise, accustomed to thinking in terms of a divinely ordained role for Israel in the Messianic Era, could relate to the general American Christian perception. Wise accepted that George Washington and his colleagues were 'chosen instruments of Providence' helping to work out a new destiny for humanity in a unique environment of liberty. He believed that Judaism and its people, chosen anew, would play a role in working out that destiny and that progressive, universal and non-authoritarian Reform Judaism would eventually become the common faith of America.¹²⁶

THE CHARLESTON BID TO REFORM JUDAISM

The first organized bid to introduce reforms in Judaism in the United States appears to have been made in 1824, when there was still only an estimated Jewish population of between 5,000 and 6,000 in the total population of the US of about 12 or 13 million,¹²⁷ with congregations and traditional synagogues in five cities all worshipping on the basis of the Sephardi rite. A petition signed by 47 of the 600 adherents of the influential Beth Elohim congregation in Charleston referred to the gradual drift away from the worship of the true God, noted reforms which were being introduced 'even amidst the intolerance of Europe' and requested some similar reforms. Specifically it requested that some of the Hebrew prayers be repeated in English, that there be a weekly discourse in English on the principles of Judaism, that services be shorter, and that contributions not be recognized during the service with 'unseemly tendering of honours.' When their concerns were not given serious consideration some of the petitioners established the Reformed Society of Israelites. They introduced the changes to the liturgy which they had sought but they also adopted a ten-point creed which broke new ground in changing the emphasis of, or in departing from Maimonides Thirteen Articles of Faith. Within two years they had drawn some members from Beth Elohim and attracted new members so that attendance at the society's services reached two thirds of that of the parent congregation.

The Charleston Constitution noted in terms that can only be interpreted as strong criticism of traditional rabbinical Judaism that "the great cause of many of the calamities with which mankind have been so often visited resulted from a blind observance of the ceremonial law, to the neglect of the essential spirit of revealed religion contained in the Law and the Prophets."¹²⁸ The Charleston Creed, linked to the Constitution, then includes these substitutions in matters of faith. (1) Belief that "the soul of man is breathed into him by God, and is therefore immortal" replaces Maimonides' belief that "there will be a resurrection of the dead at the time when it shall please the Creator." (2) Belief that "the laws of God, as delivered by Moses in the Ten Commandments, are the only true foundations of piety towards the Almighty and of morality among men" replaces three articles which refer to the Torah and the totality of the mitzvot as given to (or revealed to) Moses being unchangeable or not subject to further revelation or interpretation, and to adherence to the total Torah being required for divine reward. (3) It omitted belief in "the coming of the Messiah, and (the undertaking to) wait daily for his coming", and substituted clauses which absolutely reject the concept of a person sharing or having any subordinate role in either creation or divine authority. (4) It omitted any direct reference to prayer, placing stronger emphasis on the love of God as the first duty of His creatures and on exclusive adoration and worship of the Creator, while excluding, absolutely, the concept of intercessory prayer and the worship of any "other being." (5) It put a new emphasis on morality as "essentially connected with religion" and "good faith towards all mankind (being) among the most acceptable offerings to Deity."¹²⁹

The Charleston Constitution and Creed, together, were remarkable documents, combining a stronger direct rejection of the Christian concept of the Trinity with acceptance of the Gospel concept of human responsibility before God, as preached by Jesus of Nazareth, complementing the requirement to adhere to the most basic Mosaic Law. They were also remarkable because they reflected a very thoughtful response to the influences at work on both Judaism and Christianity in two environments – Europe and the New World – and because they bore a remarkable similarity to Qur'anic understanding with few, if any, of their authors having come under the influence of Muslim scholarship. The Charleston Reformers had drawn on, and built on, the efforts of the German reformers, but they had added their own touch of reasoning and a new phase had opened in the reform of Judaism world wide. However the path for the reformers was not a bed of rose petals and for the next three generations we must therefore leapfrog backwards and forwards across the Atlantic as Jewish scholars unwittingly prepared for the shift in the centre of gravity of their confessional community from Europe to the United States.

The Charleston reformers were not able to sustain their ambitious drive and within a few years of the publication of the Charleston Creed they had disbanded. Some members of the Society drifted while others returned to Beth Elohim where a new Prussian-Polish born hazan, Gustavus Poznanski, thought to be strictly orthodox, was appointed in 1836 and granted life tenure in 1838. Poznanski soon showed by changes which he introduced that he was not orthodox in the conventional sense. In 1841 he introduced a revision of Maimonides' Thirteen Articles of Faith (as opposed to a completely new creed) which was almost as radical in its impact as the Charleston Creed. He simply changed two articles. Article 12, concerning messianism, he changed to read: "We believe that the Messiah announced by the Prophets is not come, the Prophecies in relation to his coming not being fulfilled." Article 13 he changed to substitute belief in immortality of the soul for resurrection of the body.¹³⁰ The traditionalists formed a new congregation, Shearith Israel, the reformers thus gained control of Beth Elohim and the most influential Jewish community in the United States was again, and permanently, split into Orthodox and Reform congregations. When Isaac Leeser, the influential traditionalist leader of Philadelphia's congregation, then proposed a convention to establish a union of all American Hebrew congregations, Beth Elohim refused to participate, fearing being swamped by ecclesiastical authority "alien to the spirit and genius of the age in which we live, ... wholly inconsistent with the principle of American liberty" and which would be "hostile to the march of improvement or the progress of enlightened and rational reform."¹³¹

NUMBERS BEGIN TO SWELL

Soon after this the rate of Jewish immigration from Europe began to increase because of the round of revolutions and the reactionary oppression of the churches, and many of the new arrivals had been influenced by the Reform Movement in Germany. As a result, by 1855 there were four additional congregations showing some degree of alignment with the reformers and Beth Elohim was no longer isolated. That year the 37-year old Bohemia-born Isaac Mayer Wise who had become rabbi of one of Cincinnati's four synagogues, and who aspired to the leadership of the Reform Movement, proposed a conference to unite all of America's Jewry. He succeeded in gaining the support of enough rabbis of both reform and orthodox persuasion to convene a conference and representatives of congregations in eight cities met in Cleveland, Ohio, in October that year. As the first step towards some form of union, a regular synod, a common liturgy and a plan for Jewish education, they considered and, after much debate, agreed upon a statement which was to provide the basis for future discussions. It had three simple clauses: the Bible is of immediate divine origin and the standard of the Jewish religion; the Talmud contains the traditional legal and logical exposition of the biblical laws which must be expounded and practiced according to the comments of the Talmud; and the resolutions of a Synod made in accordance with these principles are legally valid. However even that brief statement was a compromise and many leading reformers would not agree to take another step on the basis of an obligation to recognize the authority of the Talmud in all matters. The traditionalists and the reformers each went their own way and it would be many years before there was another attempt to bring everyone together.

The reformers grew in strength and numbers as more and more refugees fled from Europe. Each time the church and its reactionary state collaborators tried to suppress reform and modernization in Judaism in Europe in an effort to make it appear to be an anachronism they actually helped to stimulate those processes in the United States and foster the growth of a very influential community. Furthermore, within a few years Americans would begin to return the compliment as, having developed from a base of the German Reform Movement, they became the world leaders in the process and the American approach to reform was adopted in Europe.¹³²

THE NEXT STEP: PHILADELPHIA

In November 1869 two of the radical German-born reformers, Rabbi Samuel Adler and Rabbi David Einhorn, convened a conference in Philadelphia on the basis of the German rabbinical conferences of the 1840s, but only “their theologically educated colleagues, who favor decided religious progress” were invited with the aim of reaching agreement on a Reform platform which would clearly set the Reform Movement apart from the Orthodox traditionalists. On that basis the conference adopted a set of seven principles which, in plain language, can be read as follows. *The Messianic aim of Israel is not the restoration of the old Jewish state under a descendant of David, but the union of all men as children of God in the confession of the unity of God, to realize their call to moral purity. *The second Jewish Commonwealth was not destroyed as punishment for Israel’s sins but in accord with the divine purpose of dispersing the Jews so that their mission to lead the nations of the world to the true knowledge and worship of God can be achieved. *Since the destruction of the second temple the only sacrifices acceptable to God are sincere devotion and moral purity and the sacrificial practices of earlier periods are now only to be referred to in prayers for educational purposes. *It follows from this that any distinctions made between Aaronide and non-Aaronide practices are no longer valid. *The world-embracing mission of Israel and the love of God for all His children is to be given emphasis together with the selection of Israel as the nation to bear the highest idea of humanity and religion. *There is no religious foundation for belief in bodily resurrection and the doctrine of immortality refers only to the soul. *The language of people at worship is to be preferred as the language for their worship and prayer which will therefore be more meaningful, while Hebrew is retained to fulfill the sacred requirements of historical research and study. The conference also formulated a number of laws concerning marriage and divorce, and ruled that circumcision was not to be a test of whether the male child of a Jewish mother was or was not Jewish.

